any controversy—have been most assiduous in reminding the Government that there are problems in Sandwell. My hon. Friends and I have been doing the same. Had there been an opportunity today, I could have elaborated on our problems. We thought that the Government were not listening to us.

Mrs. Mahon: They were not.

Mr. Archer: I am not sure about that. There was no reaction from the Government, and they never did anything about the problems. But they have now announced that there are problems in Sandwell, so perhaps they listened to us after all. But had the Secretary of State asked us for help at any stage, we could have spared him and his Department so much embarrassment because we could have told him the facts.

The high-rise flats in Whiteheath in my constituency have indeed been the subject of many problems. They have been a nightmare for those living in them. But they were empty by the time the right hon. Gentleman made his proposal. The tenants had been moved out and rehoused in other accommodation. Sandwell council—starved of resources as it is—has already spent £4·9 million on rectifying those problems. It is proposing to spend another £2·5 million in the next financial year. The council did not keep that a closely guarded secret; it consulted. Indeed, it even consulted the Secretary of State's Department and spoke to his officials. Had the right hon. Gentleman taken the trouble to ask his officials, they could have told him that they had given departmental approval for the council's plans.

I expect that the Secretary of State will say now, as he said then, that he does not need to know any more because he is already sufficiently informed. I have no doubt that, by now, he will have an interim report from Price Waterhouse, whose staff have been to the Lion Farm estate asking tenants to make statements about how much they appreciate the Secretary of State's concern for them. He must know what the result of the ballot will be. Whether or not there is joy in heaven over a truly repentent sinner, I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that there is joy on the Lion Farm estate. But had he asked us, we could have spared the taxpayer the fees that I do not doubt Price Waterhouse will charge.

The Secretary of State may say that the Government do not need to learn from hon. Members in these debates because they will know soon enough from the tenants. I wonder whether the Secretary of State is still nursing certain fantasies about this. It is possible that he still regards it as an open question. No doubt more taxpayers' money will be poured out to persuade tenants in Windmill lane and Whiteheath to change their minds. The spider will not merely be inviting the flies to come into his parlour he will be employing public relations consultants to issue the invitation. The Secretary of State is entitled to put his case. We are not afraid of free debate. That is what today's motion is about. Now that the tenants are to have the right to choose, I for one will abide by their decision.

One consequence of the way in which the Secretary of State has gone about this is that tenants are clear about the real issues. They do not believe that the Secretary of State has said to his officials, "There are problems in Sandwell. The local Members of Parliament have been right all these years and we must do something for the tenants on Lion Farm estate." The tenants know that it was not like that. They know that it is all part of the Prime Minister's irrational, obsessive, spiteful feud against local councils, especially those in areas such as Sandwell where the electors have dared to select councillors who are not of the Prime Minister's choosing. The tenants know that they are merely pawns in that game.

It may be that even now the Secretary of State will not believe what he hears. No doubt all the letters that tenants receive from the Government and all the space taken in local newspapers will be seen by the Secretary of State as an honest attempt by the Government to enlighten the tenants and explain the facts to them, while all the letters that tenants receive from the local council will be part of an unworthy conspiracy to brainwash and mislead the tenants. When the Secretary of State hears that the tenants' associations on Windmill lane and Lion Farm will be campaigning for a vote against his housing action trust, he will doubtless dismiss them as a gang of irresponsible extremists assisting the local council in brainwashing those simple tenants. The Lion Farm tenants association will go down on the Prime Minister's list of subversive organisations—along with the Church of England, the Church of Wales, the Law Society, the British Medical Council and the Committee of University Vice-Chancellors.

Had the Secretary of State listened, we could have explained to him that it was not like that. I have always wanted to see a flourishing tenants association on Lion Farm, because I believe that people should be represented in many different ways according to their various interests and capacities. I believe that that is healthy. The tenants will not always agree with the council and they will not always endorse the views of local Members of Parliament, but the tenants association is part of the total voice of the people. The Government do not want a pluralist society. They do not want healthy debate in the House. They do not want to leave powers with local councils. They want power to reside in quangos appointed by Ministers and, in the last analysis, they want all power to lead back to the Prime Minister's chair. They do not want to listen to anyone who interrupts the universal chorus of acquiescence.

The House will know, however, that hubris is always and inevitably accompanied by nemesis. Tenants have flocked to join the tenants associations and have rallied behind those associations. The voice of the tenants associations is the authentic voice of the people of Windmill lane and Lion Farm. I have always been proud of my constituents, but I am especially proud that the Lion Farm tenants association is to be the agent of nemesis. I like to imagine those tenants on winter evenings in future years telling their grandchildren how they showed—or perhaps how they discovered—that people carry their destiny in their own hands when they decide that the time has come to exercise their voice.

The Government may silence the Opposition in the House today, but they will not silence the people, and the Secretary of State's Bill may occupy a bigger place in the constitutional history books than he ever dreamed. I permit myself to wonder whether in the future when people speak of Hampden and Pym and the seven bishops jury they may add a footnote about the Lion Farm tenants association.

Sir John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): I have always had great respect for the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer), who has been my neighbour for a considerable number of years. Despite the occasional muddle and wrong-headedness in his speech, I know that he tries most sincerely to represent the best interests of his constituents. I think that I am also a friend, if I may say so, of the exuberant hon. Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds)——

Mr. Faulds: The hon. Gentleman may indeed say so.

Sir John Stokes: —with whose views on the middle east, for instance, I wholeheartedly agree.

As I once had the honour to represent part of Sandwell —Oldbury—and still know the people well as they frequently write to me and I often see them, I listened very closely to what was said. I hope that neither the right hon. and learned Gentleman nor his hon. Friend will take it amiss when I say that the great tragedy for Sandwell is that it no longer has a Conservative Member of Parliament and that in recent years it has been represented first by an extreme Left-wing council and now by a Left-wing council. Knowing those people as I do, I honestly feel that they would have been happier and better off in every way under a Conservative council.

I rarely intervene in debates of this kind, and my intervention will be brief, but in all my time in this place I have seldom heard a speech of such bluff and bluster, of such callous inaccuracy and even cruelty, as we heard from the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) who, alas, is no longer in his place. His attacks on the honour and integrity of people in the other place were entirely uncalled for and would have been actionable had they been made outside the House. I am surprised that the Opposition, who seemed to be having a brief love affair with the people next door, should make comments of that kind.

Secondly the attacks on my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, for whom I have great respect and affection, whom, I have known for many years and whose seat is near mine, were quite uncalled for and utterly disgraceful, as well as bringing in a subject that had nothing to do with the debate. It is amazing that the Opposition, having suffered such a bloody nose in Scotland yesterday, should come here and make such a nuisance of themselves today.

Finally, my constituents next door to Warley—they are very similar people and good Englishmen—cannot understand why I have to waste my time her today, when there are far more important things to do in my constituency. They do not understand why these matters were not dealt with earlier, and they have nothing but contempt for the Opposition.

10.58 am

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): This is an outrageous motion that makes it impossible for us to debate a huge number of important amendments to the Housing Bill. It is the bounden duty of the House to scrutinise and, where necessary, to challenge the intentions and actions of executive government; but how can that duty possibly be discharged if the motion is passed?

It will come as no surprise to the House that my particular concern is with amendment No. 133, for which, to be realistic, there will now be scant, if any, time for meaningful debate. Quite deplorably, the motion makes no specific provision for the amendment to be debated. Yet it affects the well-being of some of the most needful people in Britain today. I refer to people with severe disabilities, some of whom, if the amendment is approved —it was in part unsuccessfully resisted by the Government in the House of Lords—will have the right to buy their homes.

The Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation—RADAR—readily concedes that the amendment removes a sense of descrimination felt by a number of disabled people, but asserts that a much larger number of people with severe disabilities will suffer, now and in the future, the no less real discrimination of being unable to obtain housing in which they can live their lives independently and with dignity.

In many areas, the shortage of appropriately designed and equipped housing for disabled people now verges on famine. They want the House fully to debate their claims before the Bill becomes law, but to save embarrassment the Secretary of State is trying to gag his critics on both sides of the House. RADAR wants local authorities to buy back properties sold by virtue of amendment No. 133 if and when they are no longer required by their purchasers, and also a duty to replace any properties sold to existing tenants. Both propositions will require the release by the Government of new resources, and it was hoped that the Secretary of State would accept today his responsibility to make adequate funds available if disabled people now waiting for suitable housing accommodation are not to suffer the discrimination that RADAR fears. But what time is there now to debate these propositions with the Minister?

During the 1980s there has been a massive reduction in housebuilding by local authorities, from almost 75,000 dwellings in 1978 to under 15,000 in 1987. Within those figures, the number of units of wheelchair housing fell from 827 in 1978 to 184 in 1987, and those of mobility housing from 7,383 units to 902 over the same 10 years.

Those statistics, about which the Government must now be challenged, are deeply disturbing. Many disabled people regard them as proof of shocking neglect. Their significance should be fully debated by the House. They reflect the extremely low priority given to housing provision for people with disabilities by a Government who now want to dodge debate by means of this disgraceful motion. John Stanford, RADAR's housing policy officer, writing about the Government's departure from the priorities of the 1970s, said:

"Policies were developed then which placed consideration of disabled people in the mainstream of housing provision."

That is certainly not true today, yet the motion, if passed, will save the Minister from having to defend his neglect.

The Department of the Environment estimated in the late 1970s—when I was Minister for the Disabled—that 460,650 mobility dwellings and 61,420 wheelchair dwellings were needed nationally, yet by 1986 the total number of mobility dwellings provided by local authorities and housing associations numbered only a derisory 44,125 and the number of wheelchair dwellings only 8,591. Are those worrying statistics not worthy of detailed debate?

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): I should like to refer to a case in my constituency in Southampton, where two mentally disabled persons, a man and his wife—the woman is also physically disabled and in a wheelchair—have been placed on the 13th floor of a high-rise block of flats. I have made every attempt to get them moved to ground floor level, with no success. Some local authorities are completely insensitive to the needs of such people, whether mentally or physically disabled.

Mr. Morris: As I have said, the shortage of suitable housing for disabled people is verging on famine, and the inadequate resources available from the Government have made it impossible for local authorities, of all political persuasions, to help those who most need their assistance.

As the Minister knows, we have now had new figures from the Office of Population, Censuses and Surveys on the prevalence of disability which outdate all previous estimates of need. The new survey, published on 28 September, doubles to 6·2 million the figure on which policies for disabled people have been based. Will the Minister comment on the implications of the new survey for housing policy as it affects disabled people? Again, has the Minister seen the study of housing and support services for people with severe disabilities by the Prince of Wales's advisory group on disability? That report, some findings of which are described as "alarming" by the Wales Council for the Disabled, is aptly entitled "Living Options Lottery" and it strongly underlines the grave shortage—even before the stock is reduced—of appropriately designed and equipped housing for disabled people. The report says that the Government must guarantee fair, secure and consistent funding to create conditions in which severely disabled people can take responsibility for their lives and become integrated into the community. That is the answer to the point raised by the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill).

The Prince of Wales's advisory group shows that, where housing and personal support are available, even the most severely physically dependent person can take responsibility for his or her life and achieve independence and social integration. But what time is available to us to discuss the relevance of that study to the Housing Bill?

The Secretary of State likes to talk in the language of financial constraints, but he must be reminded today that he is involved here in an issue of human rights for people who have the same right as everyone else to be fully a part of society. There is no honour in dodging the debate which we were entitled to expect on that issue. Nor is there any saving in denying disabled people the right to live in appropriately designed and equipped housing. It is self-defeating as well as inhumane to force people into institutions, often at far greater expense to the taxpayer, when, with suitable housing provision and support services, they could live in the community.

What many organisations of and for disabled people want the Minister to accept is that amendment No. 133 has spending implications for the Government which he must now very urgently address. For the House to approve the amendment without any meaningful debate and a definitive statement from the Government on their policies for dealing with its consequences, in terms of new housing provision, would be a gross betrayal of disabled people. I most strongly oppose the motion.

11.8 am

Mr. Timothy Kirkhope (Leeds, North-East): I am pleased to be able to contribute to the debate and support the motion. I was a member of the Standing Committee dealing with the Housing Bill and attended most of the debates in its various stages. It was sad that we had to listen to so much repetition from Opposition Members. It is sad that we have been forced to move this motion to debate the vitally important parts of the Bill that have not been considered because of the delaying tactics of Opposition Members.

I am proud of having been brought up in the north-east and of having served my political apprenticeship there. I was well aware of the political structure of the north-east, which, sadly, has mainly been in the hands of Socialists for too long. After the last war, all parties agreed on the need to construct dwellings for people. The atmosphere at that time in the north-east and elsewhere was non-political; there was a general unity of purpose to provide housing.

Unfortunately, as time progressed, the Labour party politicised local government. It took powers unto itself the like of which I hope we shall never see again. It betrayed the trust of the people of the north-east through its housing powers. The saddest aspect was that criminal action had to be instituted against leaders of the local Labour parties in the north-east in relation to property matters involving the housing of people. That was hardly commendable and must be seen in the light of the expressions of emotion from some Opposition Members about housing and the way in which they think the Government regard it. We have a fine record. The Bill is vital to ensure that that record is enhanced and powers are returned to the people and taken away from those who have betrayed their trust over the years.

I am pleased that we shall be debating the housing action trust proposals. I fail to understand why the Labour party is so opposed to proposals that will be good for tenants and the rundown areas of the inner cities.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kirkhope: I shall not give way. Opposition Members have spoken for many hours over the past few days and months. It is time that we responded to some of their remarks.

There is nothing in the HAT proposals that a decent man who cares about housing could not support in full.

Mr. Battle: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that when he debated this issue with me in Leeds at a meeting organised by the National Federation of Housing Associations he expressed surprise when he was informed that tenants did not have the right to vote or be consulted before being put into a housing action trust?

Mr. Kirkhope: Tenants will be given those rights by the amendments. The hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) and I debated this matter quite fully at several venues. We discussed the consultation process with tenants and their representatives.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): Is not what we are discussing a tribute to the listening qualities of my hon. Friend, who, having heard what tenants were saying, influenced the Government, which led to these proposals.?

Mr. Kirkhope: I should be rather more modest. A number of people influenced that and were part of the discussion process. It is important fully to debate housing action trusts, because consultation is written into every part of our proposals.

[Mr. Kirkhope]

I am worried about the politically active role that has been played by Opposition Members and their local authority friends. They have tried to block consultation and discussion, and to prevent tenants from discovering the full facts. I was astonished that marches supposedly organised by tenants who felt so strongly about the Government's measures had among their numbers many Opposition Members, local Labour councillors, trade unionists and others, many of whom were interested not in housing or improving the lot of tenants, but in causing disturbance and attempting to conceal the Government's view. The people whom we wish to consult are not those people but the true tenants, who have not been allowed any rights by Labour-controlled local government administrations to express those views. Part of the reason why we must step in with HATs is that local authorities have failed abysmally to provide the conditions that people deserve.

I cannot understand why there is so much opposition to HATs, which will give more resources to rundown areas and improve the rights of people who live in them. Why should anybody with the interests of good housing at heart oppose this measure? The truth is that many Socialist-controlled authorities hate the thought of losing any of the power that they hold over people. People are only pawns to Socialists. Opposition Members know that many people on housing estates have been cowed. They have to beg for things and cannot be equal in debate or consultation. Opposition Members regard people who want to be involved in the consultation process as fodder for their directives. They know well that that is what has happened under Labour-controlled local government. They would not dream of giving power to people unless they were forced to do so.

Mr. David Martin (Portsmouth, South): Was not exactly the same mistake made when the Conservative party gave tenants the right to buy their properties? Opposition Members said that the right to buy would not take off and that they would repeal it when they took office. They realised that it was popular and gave people power, and they are making precisely the same mistake with this measure.

Mr. Kirkhope: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for mentioning that subject. It is important to remember the way in which Socialist-controlled local authorities and Opposition Members fought the Government tooth and nail over the right-to-buy provisions. When they failed to persuade through the democratic processes, they did their best to obstruct the implementation of those proposals to prevent people from having the right to buy. It was only when the Government prevailed and insisted on those provisions being instituted that people were able to enjoy them. What has happened as a result? Thousands of people own their own houses, are proud to do so and are looking after them. Those people are now something in their community. They are no longer pawns to be pushed around by local government big-wigs. They are no longer ciphers or appendages to Socialist councillors, to be used at their will. They are individuals with rights and responsibilities and they are proud of it.

That is what the housing action trusts are all about. They will give areas the impetus to improve themselves, give people pride in their communities and make them concerned and interested in their homes and futures. That is why housing action trusts are such an important part of the Housing Bill and why we are determined that people should have those rights given to them as soon as possible.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): The importance of the debate is emphasised by the fact that the Leader of the House and the shadow Leader of the House have participated, as have two Privy Councillors and, the hon. Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Sir J. Stokes), one of our most senior and long-standing hon. Members. There is great concern on both sides of the House about the procedures that the Government are forcing us to accept.

When the Leader of the House introduced the debate, he suggested that we no longer need to debate the Housing Bill because all the Government amendments introduced in the Lords were passed without opposition. He went on to say that the debates in the other place lasted 64 hours. The House of Lords debated at length many new matters, as the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) made clear. There was also a Government defeat in the other place on the voting system for housing action trusts, and that has not yet been debated. Also, Opposition amendments tabled in the other place and accepted by the Government have not yet been debated.

Therefore, there are many matters yet to be debated. I shall not try to list them all, but I shall list some of them to show how authoritarian the Government's motion is.

We have yet to debate the registration of land, the application to Scotland of the new rules for housing association finance, the way in which local authorities will be involved in the payment of moneys to housing associations, and their support in the future.

We have major debates yet to come on housing action trusts, the way in which people in those areas will be able to have a say in their future and how the sick and disabled will be treated in housing action trust designated areas. We have yet to debate the way in which the receipt of money will proceed when housing is sold, as well as the approval criteria for passing on property from housing action trusts and the disposal of property.

Part IV—the most controversial part of the Bill and described by the Government as "tenants' choice"—has yet to be debated. We have yet to debate whether shops transfer if the homes attached to them move out of the public sector. We have yet to debate the position of co-operatives, about which there is a series of amendments, the secrecy of information and the Data Protection Act 1984. We have yet to debate the possibility of sales under the right to buy after transfer out of the public sector, and there is still the major debate on the voting system, which we insist is clearly rigged. There is a problem about the date from which people can be allowed to move into areas on council estates while the tenants' choice procedure is taking place. That could have far-reaching effects on local councils. We have to debate whether areas of the green belt are exempt from housing transfer under tenants' choice.

Lords amendment No. 133, under part V of the Bill, gives the right to buy to tenants of homes converted for the disabled. That has been a matter of controversy on the several occasions on which it has been debated. What happens if the right to buy is delayed? What happens, in national parks, about houses bought under the right to buy? How much of the Bill should apply to Scotland? How much of the Bill should be extended to have stronger anti-racist measures? How much of the Bill should be developed in order to alter the law on agricultural tenancies? What is the effect of the Bill on the Access to Personal Files Act 1987, introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood)? All those matters are yet to be debated, but the Government insist that we have only another four hours for this and one more piece of legislation.

The tragedy is that there is plenty of time before the date fixed for the state opening of the new Session. The guillotine is being imposed to suit the Government. Never mind the convenience of tenants or the millions of people throughout the country—the convenience of the Government dictates whether people will have their rights debated. The business on Monday is of little relative importance. There is a consolidation measure and debates on motions on European Community documents. For the rest of the week we are expected to go away from here content, while many of the issues affecting tenants have not been debated.

If the debate on the guillotine is successful, I will hand to the Secretary of State a list of questions. They are questions that the Government have not yet answered and they deal with the most controversial part of the Bill. Before the debate ends, will the Secretary of State put on record that the correct interpretation of the voting system for tenants' choice is that people who fail to vote will be counted as voting to agree with transfer? He has never answered that question directly. Will the Secretary of State, before the end of the debate, acknowledge that it is possible under the Bill for somebody who has died to be counted as voting yes? Will somebody who dies after the "relevant date" and whose death is not known about by the independent teller be counted as having voted in favour? I know the answer, and the Bill makes the answer clear, but the Secretary of State has not yet come clean. Is it not possible for an empty house or flat to be presumed to have voted yes if the independent teller is not informed when somebody moves away after the relevant date?

Will the Secretary of State answer the most fundamental question of all that has been put to Ministers in both Houses over the past 12 months? Why would the Bill not be improved by a requirement that there has to be a majority vote in favour before a transfer of ownership takes place? Why would an ordinary voting system not be fairer than the proposed voting system? Why invest a new constitutional arrrangement which depends—I shall quote a letter sent to me from the Prime Minister in August—on people "agreeing . . . implicitly through informed acquiescence".?

Why not test whether people acquiesce by the most straightforward and obvious method used in this country every time we have a political election—yes or no? that is the way opinion should be tested. Why do the Government not allow tenants to vote in that way?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman may have noticed that that is what we propose in relation to the ballot on HATs. Why has the Social and Liberal Democratic party tabled an amendment opposing that?

Mr. Hughes: The Government have made a concession on HATs, but, as the debate will show, it is an ambiguous concession. It is not clear whether what was successful as an amendment to the Bill in the Lords will be the same in the amendment in this place. That is why we will debate my amendment and the issue in the next debate.

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman cannot get away with that. He said that the matter should be decided by a majority of those voting. That is not what the Lords amendment said. It said that it should be decided by a majority of those entitled to vote. The hon. Gentleman and his party have tabled an amendment supporting the Lords, and he is now saying that he agrees not with the Lords but with the Government.

Mr. Hughes: That is not correct. The Secretary of State knows that the other place passed an amendment to his legislation to the effect that the change should be approved by the majority of those allowed to vote. We believe that that is the best way of resolving the issue in housing action trust areas. In the Government's own legislation affecting employment law, a simple majority is regarded as being insufficient and probably unrepresentative. As between the option presented by the Government in this House or that which succeeded in another place, the latter is the better of the two.

If the Secretary of State will make an announcement today, as did the noble Lord Caithness on television last Sunday, that the same voting system as he is proposing for housing action trusts will be available to tenants who are at risk of having their properties taken over by private or other landlords, and that he will accept a simple majority of those voting, let alone of those entitled to vote, he will find much less resistance today to the undemocratic proposals that he is making in amendments that we have yet to debate.

Mr. Ridley: It is only two minutes since the House heard the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) say that in relation to housing action trusts, he is in favour of a system whereby a majority of those voting will decide. He has now twisted that statement and said that he does not agree with something that had his agreement two minutes ago.

Mr. Hughes: The Secretary of State could not have been listening. All my comments so far about the voting system have been in relation to part IV of the Bill, which, as the Secretary of State knows, is about not housing action trusts but what he calls tenants' choice, and what we call landlords' choice, and the way in which tenants will have their homes taken from them. All my comments about the voting system have been aimed at that aspect. Earlier, I briefly alluded to the fact that we have yet to debate housing action trusts, and over which the Government were defeated in another place. That is good enough reason for ensuring that there is time for proper debate of all these vital and important matters affecting millions of people—and I am not exaggerating—before the matter is finally resolved in this House.

Last week, the Government published a draft code of practice governing strike ballots. Why do the Government not apply the same test as they adopt there in relation to the Housing Bill? The code of practice states:

"A simple or even substantial majority might not be actually representative if many of those given entitlement to vote in the ballot did not actually do so."

Why have one test for trade unionists and another for tenants? Also, for a school to opt out of local authority control, there must be a majority of those voting in favour, whereas for an estate to opt out, no one needs to vote in favour of so doing, let alone a majority. Housing estates can be transferred without a single tenant expressing a positive view in favour of that action. Why the double standards? Why the inconsistency? Why the Government's hypocrisy in not applying the same laws to some people in this country as apply elsewhere?

It is symbolic of the Government that, at the end of this Session, they introduce an authoritarian measure to guillotine debate on this enormously important legislation. In 1649, the monarch was here one day and the guillotine appeared the next. It is somewhat ironic that in 1988, the Government have to bring down the guillotine on a democratically elected House of representatives so that royal ceromonial may be allowed to proceed, while tenants are not allowed to have their say about the future of their own homes.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): The speech by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) was probably the most vacuous ever made on a guillotine motion since the procedure's introduction in 1881. Having made his speech, the hon. Gentleman has now disappeared from the Chamber.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): Where is the Leader of the House?

Mr. Bennett: I was interested to learn of the number of properties standing empty in the constituencies of Opposition Members, under Labour-controlled authorities. That must be the measure by which we judge the Opposition's indignation. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras waxed lyrical about how disgraceful this Bill is, but perhaps he should look in his own backyard. He is an ex-member and leader of Camden council. In 1987, that authority had 1,069 properties standing empty, accounting for 3·1 per cent. of its housing stock. By 1988, it had managed to increase the number to 1,829. It is not only that Camden council is unable to manage its housing stock, for we know also that it has closed its public libraries, that its streets are not swept, that the roads are left unrepaired, and that the authority is collapsing; its Member of Parliament comes to this House to attack a Bill that will increase tenants' opportunities.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) has not yet spoken in this debate but was prominent in Standing Committee G.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I have been too busy Whipping, trying to get some order into this wretched debate. No wonder I do not have the time to speak in it.

Mr. Bennett: I can never keep up in knowing whether the hon. Member for Newham, North-West is or is not a Whip.

Mr. Banks: They only call me in for the difficult ones.

Mr. Bennett: I am delighted to learn that the hon. Gentleman is an agency Whip and has taken Tory principles to heart in privatising the Opposition Whips' office.

The figures for Newham show that the number of empty properties there in 1987 numbered 2,777, or 8·6 per cent. of its housing stock—the second worst figure in the United Kingdom. The hon. Member may tell the House, as he did in Committee, that a number of Newham's tower blocks are standing empty. I obtained the figures, and I must be fair to the hon. Gentleman. If one excludes categories A93 and A94 on the HIP, being those properties requiring major repairs or where repairs are in progress, one is still left with 1,444 empty properties. That figure still puts Newham in the top 10, even if one excludes tower blocks. So the hon. Members for Newham, North-West and for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) had better start talking about their own local authorities before criticising the rest of us on the question of homelessness.

The hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng), who was present in the Chamber at the beginning of this debate but is now absent, was prominent in our earlier debates this week. On Wednesday he spoke for 40 minutes—and he was not filibustering. The hon. Member for Brent, South ought to have a word with his own local authority and ask why in 1987 it had 745 empty properties, and why by last year the figure had risen to 1,261. He should ask why his own local authority is collapsing around his ears. Why is not the hon. Gentleman present to tell the House what Brent council intends doing to improve the situation? He has taken to heart the comments of his hon. Friend the Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone), who also put in an appearance before vanishing again, and who believes that Brent council is worse than Pol Pot in its administration. Perhaps we ought to remember that.

The hon. Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley), who is an ex-member of Manchester city council, has previously lectured us about the problems of homelessness. Perhaps he will explain why Manchester's local authority has 4,800 empty properties.

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington): Will the hon. Member, to be accurate, tell the House how many of those properties are empty because they are due for demolition as they are unfit for human habitation?

Mr. Bennett: I am flicking through pages of HIP figures so that I may give the House that information. I find that, in categories A93 and A94, Manchester has 1,300 properties under repair out of the 4,800 that are empty. In other categories, Manchester has 1,005 empty properties. In category A96, the number of properties awaiting demolition out of the 4,800 that are standing empty is 30.

Mr. Bradley: If the hon. Gentleman had the up-to-date figures rather than last year's HIP allocation, or if he had taken the trouble to contact Manchester city council to discover how many properties are currently awaiting demolition and then taken those away from the figures to which he has already referred, he would find that the 4,000 he referred to is nearly 1,800. That is the figure the hon. Gentleman should quote to the House.

Mr. Bennett: I have the latest HIP figures and, to be generous, I will double the figure to 60 out of 4,800.

The hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) popped in and popped out earlier. What about the Socialist republic, the Militant town of Liverpool. We continually hear about how desperate things are there. Liverpool comes top of the empty properties league. One in 10 of the council properties in Liverpool is empty. In 1987, 6,955 properties were empty. Let us be fair to Liverpool. I wanted to see whether there was an improvement in 1988, so I considered the HIP figures for this year. Liverpool has managed to do very well. It has increased the number of empty properties from 6,955 to 8,000. That is the record of Socialist Liverpool.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) bored for Britain in Standing Committee. He bored us so much that the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) presented him with a small cup for being the most boring member of the Committee. In Southwark and Bermondsey, just under 2,000 properties were empty in 1987.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: The hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) presented the cup, but the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) was elected by democratic ballot as the most boring member of the Committee.

Mr. Bennett: My hon. Friend is right. It was not a question of a simple majority verdict; the verdict was unanimous.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Unlike the hon. Member for Leeds, North-East (Mr. Kirkhope), who did not speak in Committee, I was present at all the debates and participated in all the major votes. I will continue, with my colleagues, to fight the Bill and the guillotine to the end.

Mr. Bennett: The hon. Gentleman has suffered a lapse of memory. I distinctly remember hearing my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Mr. Kirkhope) speak in Committee. I also remember the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey leaving our deliberations on many occasions to speak to his large team of researchers in the Corridor, to appear on television to tell the public why he did not agree with his party's proposals on its constitution, and why he had decided to become a Liberal member of the Social and Liberal Democrats. We all remember the crisis of confidence that the hon. Gentleman suffered in Committee.

There were 1,952 empty properties in Southwark in 1987. In 1988 Southwark and Bermondsey could not even supply the figure for the HIP.

Mr. Gerald Bowden (Dulwich): Does my hon. Friend recognise that not only is there a disgracefully high number of void properties in the council stock in Southwark, but that its rent debt is now running at more than £30 million? Is that not disgraceful? The South London Press today discloses that one tenant is in arrears for £8,000. Does not that suggest that there is something rotten in the state of Southwark?

Mr. Bennett: My hon. Friend anticipates me because I want to refer to rent arrears in a moment.

Mr. Bowis: Not only are those hideous statistics true, but 1,672 properties in Southwark have squatters. Are not the figures indictments of the municipal failures populating the Opposition Benches?

Mr. Bennett: I want to be fair to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey. Southwark and Bermondsey is not a Liberal-controlled council. The hon. Gentleman lives under a Labour-controlled council. However, let us consider Tower Hamlets, which is across the river from Southwark and Bermondsey. Tower Hamlets has a Liberal-controlled council. It had 2,825 empty properties last year; and of course it has not been able to provide figures for this year.

The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) lectured us from a position of moral superiority in Committee and in this place. He should have a word with his authority about the increases in empty properties owned by Hammersmith and Fulham council. It has 776 empty properties.

Finally, I want to consider that great deprived London borough Hackney. How many times have we heard from Labour politicians that it is the most deprived borough in Britain? Why has it got 3,113 empty properties? Why can it not tell us this year's figures? It does not have the management system to produce the figures.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bennett: No. The hon. Gentleman has only just entered the Chamber.

The Bill is vital for council tenants so that they may have the right to choose landlords. It is vital because it will give them freedom, which they have not enjoyed over the past century, to decide whether they want to continue to put up with the present management and repair system operated by so many local authorities.

I speak from the experience of eight years as an opposition leader on a local council. I witnessed the complaints about the way in which the authority ran its housing repairs; about the length of time that tenants waited for repairs to be carried out; about the condition of estates and the fact that the lights did not work; about the fact that roads and windows were broken and the walls covered in grafitti. I was concerned for the tenants, but that concern was not shared by members of the majority party.

The sheer size of the municipal empires is a problem. Manchester has nearly 90,000 properties. How on earth can it run them properly? How on earth can it manage a property portfolio of that size? That is why tenants are so dissatisfied. That is why the Bill is so important: it will help tenants to choose.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) referred to rent arrears. Rent arrears are another example of what is happening in these municipal empires. In Camden, the borough covered by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras, rent arrears have increased from £4·6 million to £5·7 million, and 56·4 per cent. of tenants are in arrears with their rents. On the HIP submission, rent arrears in Brent have risen from £6 million to £11 million and 70 per cent. of tenants are in arrears with 28 per cent. —more than one in four—owing more than £500. No wonder the borough must send letters to Nigeria to collect rent and that it is not sure how much is owed. That is the problem with the municipalisation practised by the Labour party.

Rent arrears in Manchester have risen from £5·2 million to £8·8 million. In Liverpool the rent arrears figure is £9·5 million, and it could not provide the figures for this year. In 1987 the rent arrears figure for Southwark was £14·7 million and it is £30 million this year. Rent arrears in Hammersmith have risen from £1·9 million to £2·1 million. In Tower Hamlets they have risen from £2·2 million to £2·8 million, and in Hackney from £6·6 million in 1987 to £10·5 million this year.

Mr. Dennis Turner (Wolverhampton, South-East): Is it any wonder that the hon. Gentleman can give us those statistics about rent arrears when we know that millions of people are suffering poverty as a result of Government policies? Is it any wonder that he can quote them when 16 per cent. of people who received housing benefit have had that benefit cut? If the hon. Gentleman answers those questions, he will see that rent arrears have risen because of growing poverty brought about by the Conservative party.

Mr. Bennett: The hon. Member has not been listening. First, all the figures that I have given for rent arrears increases relate to a period before the increases in housing benefit in April.

Secondly, the hon. Gentleman talks about increasing poverty in this country. Why in that case is a man on three quarters of national earnings now 24 per cent. better off in real terms under the present Government than he was between 1974 and 1979? If the hon. Gentleman wants to talk about poverty, let him look at the figures for real earnings between 1974 and 1979. People in this country have never been better off than they are now.

Thirdly, as for rent arrears, perhaps the hon. Gentleman should have a word with authorities such as one in my area which, 12 weeks after the new housing benefit regulations came in, still had not informed its tenants what their rents were. No wonder most tenants were in arrears. That is an example of the incompetence of municipal housing managers throughout the country.

I have spoken for long enough. That will prompt a cheer from the Opposition. Let me conclude by referring back to what Opposition Members said about the Housing Act 1980 and the Education Reform Act 1988—— [Interruption.]

Mr. Irvine Patnick (Sheffield, Hallam): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Is it right for the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) to call my colleague a liar from a seated position?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): It is not in order; but I certainly heard nothing of the kind.

Mr. Bennett: Opposition Members——

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) loves to attack me. He is the only Tory Member in south Yorkshire, where there are 17 Labour Members. I said that the hon. Gentleman should sit down because he had distorted the truth for long enough. I then added, "I am not, of course, allowed to call him a liar."

Mr. Bennett: The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) has not given any examples. He degenerates his entire argument with vague abuse, because he has not the facts at his disposal.

Let us look at the position of Sheffield. My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) has just produced for me a leaflet which I gather is being circulated. Sheffield! That Socialist authority, I gather, has already cut £20 million from its 1988-89 budget, and proposes to cut a further £40 million for the following two years. It has cut 1,000 jobs from its payroll, and has already sold or shut six old people's homes. Bradford is falling behind Sheffield. Sheffield is leading the way, and has already implemented huge rent rises.

Mr. Flannery rose——

Mr. Bennett: If the hon. Gentleman would like to tell me which of those facts is wrong, I will give way.

Mr. Flannery: Has the hon. Gentleman mentioned in this disquisition which shows such a lack of knowledge that, owing to shortage of staff, the DHSS payments forced on people by the present Government have come through much later than they should have on the council estates? That is one of the Government's main responsibilities. Will the hon. Gentleman stop distorting the truth for once?

Mr. Bennett: This must be the first time in the history of the city of Sheffield that anyone has said that the city council is short of staff. Sheffield city council is the largest employer in Sheffield. If the hon. Member for Hillsborough would like to have a word with his city council and tell it to stop employing race monitoring groups, police committees and women's committees and get on with doing the job that a local council ought to do, perhaps the tenants would get their rent details on time, and also get their repairs done on time.

Mr. Flannery: Will the hon. Gentleman explain why, despite what he has said, Sheffield council gets a bigger Labour vote every year while the Tory vote goes down every year?

Mr. Bennett: The hon. Gentleman ought to look at the percentage of voters in Sheffield who actually pay rates. We are introducing the community charge so that everyone in Sheffield who has a vote in the local elections knows the cost of Sheffield city council. At present only a third of voters contribute.

Mr. Patnick: Is my hon. Friend aware that Sheffield city council now has approximately 35,000 full-time employees compared with 30,000 several years ago? Will he compare Bradford's cuts with those that Sheffield has made? Will he also tell us how many old folk's homes Sheffield has closed compared with Bradford?

Mr. Bennett: My hon. Friend tempts me greatly to go down a road that I do not wish to follow. However, when one sees that Bradford is proposing cuts amounting to £6 million compared with the £20 million cuts that have already been made in Sheffield one realises that they are in a different league. Labour-dominated Sheffield is leading the way by showing us what good local government ought to be in the future, even though it has not practised it for the past 20 years.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bennett: No. I do not intend to give way again.

In the 1980 debates on the Housing Bill, Opposition Members told us that tenants would not want to buy their properties and, 1 million tenants later, some of them still believe that. We were told in the debates on the Education Reform Bill in 1987 that parents would not want to opt out. Within weeks of the Bill becoming law, school after school held elections and parents voted by more than 90 per cent. to opt out of local authority control.

The Bill will give council tenants the right to decide whether they wish to opt out of local authority control. It will also end the more than 60 years of rent control that has stultified the housing market and resulted in the lowest percentage of rented accommodation anywhere in western Europe. It has made it difficult for young people to find rented accommodation when they move because they do not qualify for municipal council housing. We shall do away with restrictions that have made it impossible for anybody who owns an empty property to rent it and get a fair return on it. The Bill is vital. The guillotine motion must be passed without further ado.

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in the debate. I realise the passions that have been aroused and the interest that has been shown by my hon. Friends in the Housing Bill. I regret, therefore, that I must move away from that measure and speak about the School Boards (Scotland) Bill, because I wish to oppose the motion.

It is a disgrace that a guillotine motion has been moved on both the Housing Bill and the School Boards (Scotland) Bill. The fact that Conservative Members have decided to filibuster on the guillotine motion shows the lack of confidence that they have in their own arguments. I am grateful to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for this opportunity to oppose the guillotine motion on the School Boards (Scotland) Bill. I do so for three reasons.

My first reason is out of courtesy to the Minister of State, who earlier this morning made the arduous trip down here after the even more ardous task last night of explaining why just over 7 per cent. was a marvellous triumph for the Conservatives in Govan and why just under 40 per cent. was a desperate failure for Labour.

Secondly, despite the mass protests and the massed armies of the SNP last night, I regret that unfortunately not one SNP Member has turned up in the Chamber, even for a minute, to oppose the guillotine motion on the School Boards (Scotland) Bill. I should have assumed that that was the result of the celebrations, were it not for the fact that out of the six hours and 22 minutes that have been spent on the Housing Bill, SNP Members could make only a two-minute contribution—to testify to the opposition to the Bill in Committee by the Labour party.

Thirdly, I oppose the motion because the only silver lining to the Govan by-election—I do not claim that it is a big one—is that it has provided the context for this morning's debate on a guillotine motion on yet another piece of un-Scottish unpopular legislation, which once again will be passed without full debate, although it is opposed by almost every section of Scottish society.

It is patently obvious that I do not agree with the result of the Govan by-election. We all have an interest in understanding the frustration that was registered there. The result of the by-election can be understood in the context of the School Boards (Scotland) Bill being guillotined and pressed on an unwilling Scottish population.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Reid: I want to be brief and, with respect to the hon. Gentleman, he spoke for almost half an hour.

Almost every opinion poll in Scotland shows that the Scottish people oppose the Bill.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Forsyth): I have followed the hon. Gentleman's argument most carefully. He mentioned the Conservative party achieving 7 per cent. of the vote in Govan. That is also the figure which the exit poll showed is the satisfaction rating with Labour Members of Parliament in Scotland. No Labour Front-Bench spokesman on Scottish matters is present. I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman's complaint about the guillotine motion arises out of the fact that all the proposed amendments are positive ones which were put forward by the Opposition in another place and arise out of ideas advanced by the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, which, of course, is dominated by the Labour party. The remainder of the Bill has passed through the House rather ahead of timetable, and the hon. Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mr. Hogg) has taken a positive approach to it and decided to opt out of being on the Opposition Front Bench this morning.

Dr. Reid: I shall come to the Minister's reception of advice in due course. I know that he would not like to mislead the House about last night's opinion poll. Some 45 per cent. of respondents said that Labour Members of Parliament are doing a fairly good or very good job. When it came to asking how well Conservative Members in Scotland are doing, the pollsters did not even bother to ask that question, but merely looked at the by-election result.

Every opinion poll shows that Scottish people oppose the principle of the School Boards (Scotland) Bill. Every eminent educationist and most uneminent educationists oppose it. In spite of the cloak of secrecy in the Scottish Office, it is rumoured that every eminent Civil Service education adviser opposes the principle. Only the Minister can confirm or deny that. He will be aware of the dangers of playing the Scottish card.

The Anglicisation of the Scottish education system has been a major issue and has attracted much attention in Scotland. If the Minister is worried about the lapse into quasi-nationalism last night, he would do well to recognise that a Government who cannot show any magnanimity in victory will breed bitterness and defiance among those whom they think they have defeated.

The strength of many people in Scotland who want the union to end derives from the Government's attitude. That attitude was summed up by the hon. Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Sir J. Stokes), when he said that Oppositions are a nuisance. We understand that Oppositions are regarded as a nuisance, but they are also regarded as somehow subversive to the Government's control. The biggest opposition, which has been regarded as the biggest nuisance and treated with the greatest contempt during the past nine years, consists of the vast majority of the people of Scotland, who share neither the culture not the educational priorities of the Minister and the Government.

I have no wish to avoid the conclusions that must be drawn from the result in Govan—for my party or for any other. Two things were shown last night. Now that the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) has returned, I am reminded that three things were shown last night. The first is that the protest vote was powerful enough to shove the hon. Gentleman back into a kilt, for reasons that are unknown to most of us. Secondly, it showed the frustration of many people in the Scottish electorate at the inability of the Opposition to deliver back a Labour Government in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Forsyth rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. A number of hon. Members still wish to speak on the allocation of time motion. I ask the hon. Gentleman to refer to that motion and not to what happened last night elsewhere.

Dr. Reid: It relates directly to the guillotine on this important legislation. The third reason was precisely what happened last night. It would be an irony if the Minister and his colleagues, who seek to impose a uniform United Kingdom, were in the long run to be the biggest architects of the division of that United Kingdom. But he is heading in that direction.

Mr. Forsyth rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the Minister intervening?

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman is giving way—or has he sat down?

Dr. Reid: I have finished my speech.

12.5 pm

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): I shall speak only for a very short time. Since 9.30 am, our debate has revolved around London and two other great cities in this country. The debate has concerned the mismanagement of local authorities. All the facts and figures about the number of properties kept vacant, awaiting repair, or being used as squats, can lead to only one conclusion—that management is inadequate.

I was involved in our discussions on the Housing Bill 1972. The current measure would have been an ideal Bill for 1972. It is almost impossible to repair some of the damage that Socialist authorities have done over many years. They built high rises and kept people thoroughly under their thumb by making all sorts of housing restrictions, telling people to go away and have more children so that they might qualify for a flat. They told people, "We are in charge of the management of the council properties. We will house you but do not expect to be able to come back for a transfer. You must try and arrange that between yourselves and we shall probably turn you down anyway." I get the impression from my parliamentary advice service that housing departments do not treat people as human beings, but as a nuisance. The staff in the reception areas are not interested in the manifold problems and people cannot get through to any of the officers to complain to the higher spectrum of the department.

People are so dissatisfied that I do not share the fears of the Opposition because I believe that a great number of people will vote to leave council properties. They will want housing associations to take over. In my area, the Stonham housing association and the Swaything housing association have reputations to which the local authority could never aspire. Housing associations have been encouraged to set up blocks of flats or groups of houses —particularly the British Legion, Anchor, Collingswood and Silken housing associations. We have tried to do exactly what the Secretary of State is doing today—to encourage more people to take over the individual managerial problems of providing private rented homes. That will be one of the great successes of the Bill.

I was not a member of the Standing Committee, so I do not know whether the Housing Corporation will receive enough funds for what I believe will be an avalanche of applications from housing associations. We keep hearing about Rachman—I do not know whether he is a housing association. We keep hearing about the bad old days when landlords went through the streets with Alsatian dogs. They are some of the silly red herrings that are part of Socialist folklore. Some Labour Members went through the first Socialist indoctrination on housing, and the catch phrase, "Every landlord is Rachman and every local authority is best at managing housing", came into existence. Those myths have lived on for far too long and must be laid to rest.

Good management is essential in running an estate of any size. If there is good management, a good work force to carry out repairs and sympathetic people to listen to complaints, there will be contented tenants. I throw out a challenge to Opposition Members. If they can put their hands on their hearts and say that their local housing authorities have all those attributes, they must be living in a wonderland that I have never experienced. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will help to resolve the problem. I want to see as many separate landlords as possible, preferably housing associations, in Southampton. If we could have 50 more housing associations and other landlords to take over its 23,000 council houses, housing in Southampton would have a rosy future.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): I shall not waste too many words on what has been said by Conservative Members this morning. They have treated the whole thing as a bit of a Friday lark. Homelessness—the appalling problems of people without anywhere to live—is a joke to most of these juveniles. It is a disgrace and an absolute shame that these important matters are treated with so little regard by Conservative Members. Their only excuse can be that they do not know anything about council tenants and that they are totally politically inexperienced —[Interruption.] That little lad waving his Order Paper —the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett)—made what I thought was the most juvenile contribution that I have heard in a serious debate. He should be ashamed of himself.

We have not had enough time to discuss this measure for a lot of reasons. At the inception of this legislation, the Secretary of State had no intention that these matters should be properly examined. The other night, when we could have sat through until half the next day, at 3 o'clock in the morning the Secretary of State was so exhausted —indeed, so emaciated—that he could not last the night. He slipped off into the dark passages and the business of the House was abandoned.

Then what did the Government do? They did not provide us with time to debate this matter for three days next week, when we could easily do so. The time is there. What did they do? They introduced the Friday filibuster, and all the local lads who can slip off to their London flats later this afternoon were asked, "Do hang around on Friday morning and try to abort the business", which is exactly what they have done. The people of this country are not so easily fooled. One or two communities around Britain may have realised what this is all about.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): Will the hon. Gentleman allow me?

Mr. Faulds: No, I will not allow the hon. Gentleman to speak. We have had enough of the filibuster this morning and I would like eventually to get to the parts of the Bill that we want to discuss.

The obfuscation by the Secretary of State was intentional. This little document "Estate Action Third Annual Report", was, I suppose, slipped out by accident about 20 June. I read the final page of it on 23 June, and wrote to my town clerk, wondering whether he knew about these intentions about housing action trusts affecting an estate in my constituency. He had never heard of it. There had been no discussion and there had been no consultation. We were not officially informed about the Secretary of State's intentions until a cyclostyled letter of 11 July which, after it had been announced, and to which reference has been made by my right hon. and learned Friend, the Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) and which I think is only part of the pattern of trying to keep quiet about these matters so that the public will not tumble what has happened.

I wanted, had there been time—and there still is time if the Government are prepared to provide it next week—to discuss amendments Nos. 72 and 73 because they gravely affect my constituency. I have many hundreds of council tenants on whom one of these housing action trusts, the Government hope, will be imposed. Now what does that mean for them? Windmill lane—[Interruption.] Perhaps if Conservative Members would have the courtesy to listen, they might learn a little about the actualities of life for council house tenants.

The area in my constituency is called Windmill lane. Over the past three or four years, ironically, the local authority has spent a great deal of money on improving the estate. Is this part of a subtle ploy so that the local authority will do its duty and fulfil its responsibilities to those tenants, and the Secretary of State, when the housing action trust is imposed, will claim the credit? I wonder how many other of the housing action trusts intended——

Mr. Simon Hughes: All of them.

Mr. Faulds: All of them. All of them apparently fall into this category. The local authority will largely have done the work, even on its limited funding, and the Secretary of State will say, "This great new Conservative project; look what we have done to these council estates." Well, I do not think that they are going to be fooled.

I have never known an issue in my many years as the Member for Smethwick which has aroused such vehement opposition from council tenants, and it has not been organised with a propaganda campaign. They have not suffered yet—certainly not from the Opposition—the influx of propaganda leaflets that the Secretary of State is now going to shower on them to try to convince them what an excellent project this is. It was a natural reaction when they heard what was going to happen. I will tell the House why.

These tenants—these council tenants—are not fools. My right hon. Friend, Madam Deputy Speaker—the right hon. Member for West Bromwich, West (Miss Boothroyd)—and I know probably more about council tenants than most Conservative Members. We know them as friends. We go there nearly every weekend and meet these people. They are highly intelligent, some of them. They know what the Government intended. They are not as gullible as "the quality" on Government Benches think that they are. My God, to use the word "quality" about this bunch! Their traditional predecessors, the decent responsible one-nation Tories, must be whirling in their graves looking at that lot and what they are doing to the people of this country.

Mr. Adley rose——

Mr. Faulds: I will not give way. The hon. Gentleman came in five and a half minutes ago, and he is not going to interrupt my speech. [Interruption.] He may have been asked to prolong the matter with the filibuster; he is not going to do it to me.

Those people realise the implications of this legislation. They know what it means for them. They are going to lose their security of tenure. Their rents will inevitably go up. The property mafia will be rubbing their hands at the prospects of the profits. They are going to make enormous killings out of this exercise. Rachmanism—a word that was introduced into the English language in the 1960s—is a malevolent, stinking name. I had better warn Conservative Members, there is going to be an addition to that collection of ghastly names. There are going to be —[HON. MEMBERS: "Who?"] We do not know them yet, but they will crop up—names like Rachman, who will make killings out of the suffering and the homelessness of thousands of our constituents, and they will enter the English language by the grace of the Secretary of State, because he will be the one who has given these lads the opportunity to use their revolting greed at the cost of the suffering of the ordinary people of Britain.

If we had not put up an opposition to this so-called ballot, the people of those housing estates would have had to suffer the rigging that the Secretary of State intended in the ballot. He can grin that silly little grin, but that is what the legislation stated and he knows it—and so do all his advisers around him and those on his Benches. Had it not been for the opposition that we put up, that ballot rigging would not have been changed.

However, we have had the reassurance of a letter from the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier) informing those of us whose constituencies are affected by housing action trusts—it was written on 7 November, which is not a very long time ago—that Lord Caithness in the other place, with his vast experience of the way in which council house tenants live—he knows so many of them from going around his constituency at elections and he knows the sufferings of council house tenants—at last, because it was a risky political exercise to introduce a rigged ballot in this particular parliamentary democracy, has been prevailed upon to write to those of us whom it is intended should have housing action trusts forced on our constituencies. I shall read one sentence of his letter of 7 November.

> "We propose that if a majority of tenants who vote in the ballot are against his proposals, the Secretary of State should not lay a designation order before Parliament."

Knowing the reliability and responsibility of this particular Secretary of State, I would have been—no, let me be precise—I should have been much happier if, instead of saying that the Secretary of State "should not lay" the letter had said that the Secretary of State "will not lay". Perhaps that matter will be considered when the Secretary of State replies.

It is quite clear that the genuine opposition of hundreds of thousands of council house tenants to this rotten project is immense. I can assure the Secretary of State that if a proper democratic process is pursued in these matters—and the cheering thing is that the Lord Caithness has come round to accept the democratic principle in Great Britain—if those ballots are held I can assure the Secretary of State that he is wasting his time, the Government's time and the time of the House in trying to impose any housing action trusts on the people of my council estates and on those of Madam Deputy Speaker—no, I must not introduce my hon. Friend into this debate—and on all of us in whose constituencies there was and is an intention to introduce housing action trusts. I can assure the Government that the people concerned will not have it. There will not be a single housing action trust introduced into any of these constituencies.

It is shameful that the Secretary of State, absolutely in keeping with his typical conduct, should try to introduce a measure like this and then do everything that he could before the presentation of the Bill, after the presentation of the Bill and even at this late stage to avoid discussion of these essential issues. Well, he has not managed to do it and the people will not have his silly, limited, anti-democratic ideas imposed upon them.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): The Bill has been before the House for one year. It has been a year of Government incompetence, prevarication and delay since November 1987 when the Government published the Bill, immediately withdrew it, pulped it because of its errors and then had to reintroduce it to the House. Worse Government delays followed. After a searching Committee examination by my hon. Friends, led by my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), when at no time did the Government propose a timetable, they then took the Bill away, kept it hidden from view of the House for three months, from March to June of this year, and then made huge amendments on Report.

At no time have Opposition Members artificially delayed the Bill, although we are implacably opposed to its deeply offensive and largely irrelevant proposals. In the House of Lords 270 further amendments covering 62 pages, were added, again largely by Ministers. The responsibility for the delays to this Bill lie directly with the Secretary of State for the Environment, not with this House, and certainly not with the Opposition. At no time in our interrogation of Ministers have they felt justified until now in asking the House to impose a guillotine.

Ministers admitted weaknesses, errors and confusions by the score in their own legislation. That is certainly the track record of the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave). Deeply unhappy about the Bill that he was asked to take through Committee, he promised change after change after change. He was subsequently pushed out of the way by the Secretary of State in a fit of pique. The hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) was then rolled into view to rescue the Secretary of State and his proposals. She has been contemptuously and abruptly dismissed as well. Still the Secretary of State staggers on with a fanaticism that belies reason and reality in housing policy. The latest hapless victim of the right hon. Gentleman's obsessions, the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier), seems as confused about the Bill's intentions as were his predecessors. That was obvious from his attempt to reply to questions from my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith on Wednesday.

Faced with this chronology of political confusion and administrative bungling, how dare any Conservative Member say that the Opposition are responsible for the time taken to get the Bill through the House? It is the responsibility of Ministers. Even on Wednesday, it was the Government who ran away from the debate. No Opposition Member wanted to pack up the discussions on proposals that included ballot-rigging and distressing and arbitrary powers over people's homes and neighbourhoods. The Government want to rush the Bill back to the other place without providing an opportunity to debate many amendments on matters of substance. We say no to that, and our opposition to it is undiminished.

We have heard a great deal of ranting and raging from Conservative Members about empty properties. Why did we not hear a word about the 5·9 per cent. of Government properties standing empty—the highest percentage of all? Why did we not hear about the one in five Metropolitan police houses that are standing empty? Why was there no mention of the 70 per cent. cut in real terms in housing investment programmes? We heard a great deal from Conservative Members about some local authorities. Why did we not hear that this Government, with hon. Members' support, have cut Camden's housing investment by more than £600 million, Brent's by £280 million, Manchester's by more than £500 million and Liverpool's by more than £260 million?

We heard, with contempt, Conservative Members suggest that people with rent arrears have no problems. Why did we not hear about the eight cuts in housing benefit in eight years? Why did we not hear about that elderly lady—the 65-year-old diabetic—who lost £10·80 a week in April because of the latest cut in housing benfit? That reduced her income, after rent, to £35 a week. Does none of that make any difference to people's ability to meet their rent requirements? Does no Conservative Member ever think about that when he discusses housing problems?

The Bill does not begin to address the real problems in housing policy in Britain. It offers little comfort to those in overcrowded and unfit houses and those on ever-lengthening waiting lists. It offers no hope to the homeless. My right hon. and hon. Friends were right to say that the Bill heralds the return of Rachmanism, the dread of harassment, rent extortion and, probably, criminal activities in the housing market.

As to the conduct of the Bill's passage through the House, as an example of public administration it stinks. The Secretary of State has throughout displayed an arrogant contempt for the parliamentary process. Even now, with only a few hours of parliamentary time left, he and the Cabinet assume that the other place will accept this disgraceful legislation without any further change or delay. I hope that it will not.

The Housing Bill is offensive in its provisions. It has been brought to within a single working day of defeat in this House, and we certainly make no apology for that.

12.29 pm

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): When it comes to the right to reply to hon. Members' questions, the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) leaves me too little time. The Bill has had 250 hours spent on it so far—more than 123 hours in Commons Committee, more than 43 hours on Commons Report, more than 33 hours in Lords Committee and more than 21 hours on Lords Report before it has even reached Commons consideration. There have been hours of painstaking debate on all the issues. My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave), then Minister for Housing and Planning, agreed to make many amendments, but, having been put down, they are a source not of thanks but of complaint from the Opposition, as my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes) so rightly pointed out.

Hitherto, no timetable has been applied to the Bill. Twice the Opposition have tried to abuse that freedom of debate—first on Commons Report and then again last Wednesday. We know the signs well. The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) delivers his sermon at the start of each debate. Then the heavy mob—the hon Members for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer), for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) and for Burnley (Mr. Pike)—assemble behind him. The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) comes in like a cuckoo-clock every quarter hour, saying "Rachman" on one and "Hoogstraten" on the other—and he did it again this morning. There then comes a further reading of the speech from the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney). Meanwhile the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks)—the choreographer of this ballet with which we have all become so bored—flits from Front Bench to Back Bench and then again from back to front and we hear rumours of plans to bus in new recruits at 6 o'clock in the morning. The act is repeated at two-hour intervals throughout the night, and I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Hammersmith who, innocent and ignorant of all this—the Opposition Chief Whip is in bed, of course—delivers his sermon at two-hourly intervals without any change or any relevance to the debate.

The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) has referred to this as a total mess, and indeed it is—a total mess on the part of the hon. Gentleman, the Opposition Chief Whip and all those who have tried to disrupt the proper democratic processes. Throughout the proceedings on the Bill, the Labour party has revealed its passionate defence of the council house system and all that is rotten and wrong in that system. Labour Members ignore all the defects. As my hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) correctly pointed out, they ignore the mounting rent arrears and the growing number of vacancies leading to increased problems of homelessness, especially in a capital dominated by big Labour boroughs. For Labour Members, the only solution to their own inefficiency is to build more council houses. They ignore the importance of the tenant, the importance of choice and the importance of having some competition among landlords to woo the favours of tenants. As my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Mr. Kirkhope) said in his excellent speech, what we are seeking to do in the Bill is to transfer power in housing from inefficient Labour councils to the people—to give people more choice and the opportunity to live a decent life which has been denied by the Labour party for so many years in the boroughs that it runs.

The need for the Bill is urgent. It has been held up by the Labour party for doctrinaire reasons. I invite my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to bring these undignified proceedings—this total mess that the Opposition have tried to create—to an end so that the benefits which will flow from the Bill may start from today.

Question put:

The House proceeded to a Division.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton) (seated and covered): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am breathless, having run across from St. Stephen's House where we cannot hear the Division bell—my secretary's office is in St. Stephen's House—and, therefore, I have been denied the opportunity to vote on the guillotine motion. Many of my constituents are affected by the Bill and I at least want an opportunity to vote. It is scandalous that they have done repair work in St. Stephen's House, but——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. Because of the obvious urgency, I should be grateful if the Serjeant at Arms would arrange an immediate inquiry.

Mr. Cohen (seated and covered): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Will you open the doors briefly to allow me to cast my vote?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As soon as I obtain the information, I shall advise the House.

The House having divided: Ayes 303, Noes 176.

Interpretation

6. In this Order 'the Bills' means the School Boards (Scotland) Bill and the Housing Bill.

Orders of the Day

School Boards (Scotland) Bill

Lords amendments considered.
Lords amendments Nos. 1 to 5 agreed to.

Clause 6

PROCEEDINGS

Lords amendment: No. 6, in page 5, line 10, at end insert "and any legal proceedings or other document to be served on a Board shall be deemed to have been duly served if served at the school on the Clerk or, if no Clerk has been appointed, on the chairman or vice-chairman."

12.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Forsyth): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to consider Lords amendments Nos. 7, 8 and 9.

Mr. Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): I want the Minister to respond to the amendments to clause 6 and perhaps he will, with the leave of the House, also address himself to amendment No. 5 and say why a decision was made to leave out "third" and insert "half".

It will also be helpful if the Minister will explain the role of the clerk. Even at this late stage, there is considerable ambiguity about that. Will it be possible, for example, for a teacher to serve as a school board clerk? If so, what problems does the Minister think might be associated with that event? At other stages teachers have been excluded from being holders of offices on the board, but it now seems that permission will be given for a teacher to serve as a clerk.

There is a further ambiguity. Clause 6 states that the school board shall appoint a clerk. Can that person be an employee of the regional council, and what will be the relationship between the council and its own employee in such a case? In Committee the Minister believed that volunteers could be used to undertake fairly onerous duties.

The relationship of the clerk to the school board remains vague. There is a possibility that a member of the board will also be the clerk to the board and have certain duties deputed to him or her. In other circumstances the clerk might not be a member of the board. It is unusual for a clerk to be a voting member, so some strange relationships could be created.

My final point is on amendment No. 7, which is really very odd. It means that the minutes of a meeting can be composed and approved at the same meeting. We are all aware that normal practice means that minutes of a board meeting are written and delivered to the next meeting of the board. What aspect of amendment No. 7 commended itself to the Minister to allow the highly unusual position where minutes might be written at a board meeting and approved at the same meeting? Perhaps the Minister can see in the amendment some virtue to which I am blind.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Perhaps I can help the hon. Gentleman by referring to amendment No. 5 which has been agreed by the House. It will increase the membership of non-board members on sub-committees from one third to one half. The proposal was made by the director of education in Dumfries and Galloway as the result of its splendid experiment in pilot school boards. The director of education suggested that the change should be made especially in respect of community schools, where larger numbers of outside people might be required.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about the role of the clerk. As he will recall, we had a long discussion in Committee on the clerk's role. The clerk's role is to serve the board and to take minutes. That role will be determined by the board itself.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether a teacher could be the clerk. I recall that Opposition Members were keen to argue in Committee that we should require the clerk to be a local authority employee. We decided that we should leave discretion in that matter to the boards. Therefore, the board may appoint a teacher or anyone else as clerk.

I was slightly surprised that the hon. Gentleman described amendment No. 7 as odd, because a very similar amendment was tabled by the Opposition in another place. Amendment No. 7 meets the concern expressed by Opposition Members and others that, without authentication, board minutes and those of committees might be open to challenge.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I support my hon. Friend the Minister, and I am somewhat surprised that there is no education spokesman on the Opposition Front Bench. That is strange when we are discussing a major Scottish Bill. Perhaps the spokesman is absent because of the disarray after last night's disaster in Glasgow.

With regard to amendments on procedure, my hon. Friend will be aware that we have run a pilot scheme in Dumfries and Galloway. The scheme has been very satisfactory and issues of procedure have not arisen. The election of members, the arrangements for clerks, and other procedures have all worked satisfactorily. That shows that the amendments tabled in another place are worth while and fit in very well with the recommendations made by the Scottish Education Department to Dumfries and Galloway. The pilot scheme was excellent and it will help with the establishment of school boards later next year.

RELATIONS BETWEEN BOARDS AND PARENTS

Lords amendment, No. 10, in page 7, line 42, after "(a)" insert

"as often as appears to them to be necessary but, in any event—

(i) not more than 12 months after their establishment, and

(ii) at intervals of not more than 12 months after the first such report, make a"

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.—[Mr. Maclean.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this we may take Lords amendments Nos. 11 and 12.

1 pm

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): I am curious about the words:

"not more than 12 months after their establishment, and . . . at intervals of not more than 12 months after the first such report".

Is it really envisaged that the school board will promote contact by reporting to parents at no shorter intervals than 12 months? What kind of contact is that? It is almost like the contact that the Tories have with Scotland as a whole—the annual visitation as they float in, are rejected and float out again. I know that the Tories did very badly last night, with only a 7 per cent. vote, but at least they managed to save their deposit, on which they should be congratulated. If they are to leave such a long period between compulsory discussions, it will be a shame if they do not at least learn the lessons of last night, pay some attention to the people of Scotland and recognise that they regard the Bill as having been foisted on them by No. 10 and its Scottish minions on the Front Bench.

The Bill is not wanted in Scotland, and one of the reasons is the delay before a full report is given to the people. I hope that we at least will have our report from the Front Bench so that we can make our final decision.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I think that the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) is chancing his arm somewhat in referring to last night's by-election. It must be the first by-election in history in which the protest voters have been against the Opposition rather than the Government. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the figure of 7 per cent.——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It seems that in this instance yesterday and yesterday creeps in this petty pace from day to day. I hope that hon. Members will stick to today's business.

Mr. Forsyth: Perhaps I could address my remarks to tomorrow. The hon. Gentleman asked why there was provision for reports to be made only every 12 months. If he reads the Bill, he will find that clause 13 provides for parents to demand a meeting at any time. He will also find that boards have a specific duty to promote contact with parents, and to establish parent and parent-teacher associations. The Bill provides for a minimum requirement to report on a regular basis, which we resisted in Committee, but we were pressed by the Opposition to include the provision. We would, however, expect boards to report on a regular basis as part of their wider duties. To help the Opposition in Scotland—and they are certainly in need of help at present—we were prepared to accept an amendment along these lines.

HOUSING ASSOCIATION GRANTS

Lords amendment: No. 51, in page 38, line 20, leave out "Corporation" and insert

"Housing Corporation and Housing for Wales"

1.5 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 52, 54 to 58, 60 and 64 to 71.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: These amendments are essentially of a technical nature. Their main purpose is to ensure the proper application of part II of the Bill to Scottish Homes. That is done by deleting the grant-making powers contained in clauses 50 and 51 for Scottish Homes because that body has its own grant-making powers under section 2 of the Housing (Scotland) Bill 1988.

The function of the Housing Corporation in Scotland is being taken over by Scottish Homes. Scottish Homes is being given powers separately to do that. Therefore, the amendments make for both consistency and clarity. The matter is dealt with in this Bill because housing association legislation has been United Kingdom legislation in the past.

Lords amendment No. 52 agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 53, in page 38, line 34, at end insert—

"(3A) On such terms is it may, with the appropriate approval, specify, the Corporation may appoint a local housing authority which is willing to do so to act as its agent in connection with the assessment and payment of grant under this section; and, where such an appointment is made, the local housing authority shall act as such an agent in accordance with the terms of their appointment.

(3B) In subsection (3A) above, "the appropriate approval" means the approval of the Secretary of State given with the consent of the Treasury."

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. David Trippier): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider Lords amendments Nos. 59 and 61 to 63.

Mr. Trippier: These amendments deal with aspects of the grant regime for housing associations established by the terms of the Bill and make provision for transitional arrangements as the Bill comes into operation. The House will recall that we debated the role of local authorities in relation to housing association projects both in Committee and on Report. The then Minister for Housing was able to tell the House on 13 June that, as announced a little earlier, the Government had decided to maintain the present system under which local authorities were able to sponsor housing association projects.

Under the Bill it will be for the Housing Corporation to pay grants on such projects and the Bill as it stands is quite adequate to enable that to be done. The House was right to reject an amendment on Report that sought unnecessarily to make explicit provision for grants to be paid on schemes sponsored by local authorities.

While the Bill was in the other place, however, we considered whether there were any useful provisions that could facilitate the local authority funding the process. Under the current legislation where housing grant is paid by the Secretary of State, he is empowered by section 49(5) of the Housing Associations Act 1985 to appoint a local housing authority to act as his agent in respect of paying the grant. We had dropped that provision from the Bill because at the time that the Bill was introduced it was not intended that local authorities should be able to continue their sponsorship role. However, as that position has now changed, we think that it is only right to reintroduce a provision for local authorities to act as agents. I am certain that Opposition Members will welcome that provision.

Lords amendment No. 53 provides that where a local authority is willing to take on this role it is empowered to act as the Housing Corporation's agent in connection with assessing and paying capital grant. It means that the local authority, acting under the general rules of the Housing Corporation, will be able to assess how much grant a scheme that it has funded is entitled to receive.

Lords amendments Nos. 61, 62 and 63 are minor and ensure smooth transition to the financial regime for housing associations established by the Bill as opposed to that established by the Housing Associations Act 1985 in areas where a commencement order would be inappropriate.

Lords amendments Nos. 61 and 62 are necessary to ensure that the arrangements for dealing with surplus rental income can operate in relation to accounting periods which straddle the commencement date. Lords amendment No. 63 was introduced to give the Secretary of State the authority to delegate to the Housing Corporation after enactment of the Bill work which remains under the arrangements of the 1985 Act regarding revenue grants and the recoupment of surplus income.

HOUSING ACTION TRUST AREAS

Lords amendment: No. 72, in page 46, line 19, after "order" insert

"after the conduct of a ballot as specified in section 61(2) below, (and subject to the provisions of that subsection)"

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): I beg to move, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider the following: Government amendment (b) to the Lords amendment.

Lords amendment No. 73.

Government motion (b) to disagree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Government amendments (c) to (e) to the Lords amendment.

Mr. Ridley: I agree with the Lords that there should be a ballot. That is the subject of this debate.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ridley: No. Let me get started.

I accept the spirit of the Lords amendment but, as I shall explain, I differ with them on the means by which a ballot should be delivered.

The purpose of housing action trusts is to put right what the hon. Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds) and the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) were complaining about earlier—the estates of dilapidation and severe disrepair. As the right hon. and learned Gentleman said, they have a problem. The problem may be the result of bad design leading to dirt and graffiti, a high level of crime, high vacancy rates, high rent arrears and wretched living conditions in many areas of the worst council housing in the country. We all know of such areas because Opposition Members have for many years drawn attention to them and the need for more help for the worst public housing.

I believe that it is right that we should give people who live in such conditions the opportunity to have more choice and diversity and to have repairs and improvements done to their homes. There should be a new way in which to improve the worst estates. One can oppose such a policy only because tenants want to live in such conditions, which I cannot believe possible, or because tenants have been misinformed about what a HAT will do and what will happen after HATs have been established.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): Does the Secretary of State realise how much anger he creates among the residents of such estates when he describes them in that way? Many of the estates that have been chosen do not fit his description. One, in Sunderland, has had about three years of work done on it. The work is still being carried out and is well advanced.

It is to a high standard and there is a very low level of crime, graffiti and vandalism. That is true of almost all the selected estates. The truth is that the Secretary of State has chosen areas that he can sell off, not the worst areas.

Mr. Ridley: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman. I have seen all the areas myself. I have seen what the vacancy rate is, crime records held by the police and many other bits of information——

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ridley: I have a lot to say. I shall give way to the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), but after that I would prefer to get on with what I have to say.

Dr. Cunningham: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for giving way. We all know that, thanks to him, we are short of time. Although we do not agree with the principle, why did not the Secretary of State discuss the matter with the local authorities and the tenants before making his designation? Then he could have been sure of getting it right and dealing with those areas with the worst problems. He has made no attempt to do that. He has designated the areas that he chose to suit his own ideological purposes.

Mr. Ridley: I do not understand how this measure could conceivably benefit any ideological purposes. Opposition Members have been demanding action on the worst council estates in the country. The worst estates were to be determined by the consultants' report, which I have not yet received.

Opposition Members and the councils in their areas have gone in for a campaign of gross misinformation about what HATs will mean. Sandwell NALGO has been saying:

"The security of every tenant will change if a HAT is allowed to take over.".

That is quite untrue. The establishment of a HAT will make no difference to tenants' status rights or rent. Lambeth NALGO has been telling people:

"The estates will most likely be sold to a private company whose only interest will be making a profit".

In Sandwell tenants were told:

"... under private landlords you will see your rents soar ..."

None of that is true. It is a gross misrepresentation. We have stated quite categorically and made it a statutory requirement in the Bill that HATs may transfer property only back to the councils or to landlords approved by the Housing Corporation. Those landlords will be required to demonstrate stability, viability and a commitment to the long-term provision of rented housing at rents within reach of those in lower-paid jobs. Rents will be frozen in advance of improvements and thereafter will rise at the rate of council rents.

Another case from Sunderland involved scare stories that home owners who bought their houses under the right to buy would have them compulsorily repurchased to make way for redevelopers. That is a quite disgraceful claim; it is not remotely true.

Another disgraceful claim was that HATs could lead to discrimination and harassment. That has absolutely no basis in fact and it is belied by the statutory requirements for HATs to promote racial equality, to prevent sexual discrimination and to pay special attention to the needs of disabled people. At the end of the period of the HAT—which we hope will be soon—tenants can opt for the right to buy, to form a tenants co-operative with help from the Housing Corporation, to have their property transferred to a housing association, to go to an approved private landlord—I emphasise the word "approved"—or to go back to the council. We have undertaken to give additional borrowing approvals to councils so that, if they wish and if the tenants wish, they can buy back the property at the end of the period. That is the deal we have offered, but the misinformation that has been prevalent throughout the affair has obscured that deal and focused on the ballot.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Ridley: I shall give way in a moment.

Ministers and I have been round all the HATs and have listened to what the people have said, except on the occasion when the tenants walked out, to which I shall refer soon. We have heard wildly exaggerated fears that have been sown in their minds, and the absence of a ballot was the one clear point to unite opposition. I came to the view that real arguments were impossible to get across if the ballot question was obscured. Let there be a ballot. I am proposing that there should be a ballot. Then there will be only one issue. Which is more important—the political opposition of the Labour party, or greatly improved living conditions for the people in those areas?

There is no other way in which large sums of money can be targeted on especially deserving estates. The current capital expenditure system means that receipts lie where they fall and are not available in other areas. I cannot distribute capital allocations taking account of where there are no receipts and the need for the local authority to spend. That is one reason why we shall propose a change to the present capital control system. But we have proposed Estate Action help. The hon. Member for Warley, East was waving a copy of its report, which shows that funds will be targeted on an estate in his constituency. Although the funds for Estate Action will be increased from £140 million this year to £190 million next year, such allocations will have to go round estates in about 100 local authorities and could not be used to concentrate funds only in some local authority areas.

The problems of the worst council estates and the most rundown areas remain to be resolved in any way that we can find. I addressed the problem fairly and squarely—there is no other way of doing it—by bringing to the House a proposal that we should have the power to designate an area as a housing action trust and to concentrate resources in that area. The provision for the next few years is £192 million. But the Opposition obstruct, delay and cause scaremongering, and when we give them the very thing that seemed to be preventing people from accepting the idea they accuse the Government of blackmail and of whatever excuse comes to mind next. "Blackmail" means extortion of money; it means hush money. It does not fit the picture of a Government openly offering £192 million during the next three years to six local authorities and their tenants.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Can the Secretary of State tell the House and those tenants why, if he has decided that the estates need repair and improvement—which they do—he is unwilling to offer the money on the basis of a partnership agreement with the local authority in each case, with satisfactory controls by his officials? Then the worst estates could be improved, but on the basis of agreement as opposed to disagreement.

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman has not been listening. I explained how the capital allocation system works and said that I could not achieve those aims with the present instruments. I cannot give excessive capital allocations to one authority without removing them from another. That is why I propose this special device, which the hon. Gentleman supports in principle. We must consider the co-operation of the local authority. If the tenants and the local authority do not want a housing action trust, under the amendment that I propose they will not have one. There will be no housing action trust where there is no co-operation.

Mr. Spearing: I agree with the Secretary of State that there has been misinformation. A little while ago he talked about what would happen when housing action trusts came to an end. Has he seen the pamphlet issued by his Department entitled "Housing Action Trusts"? It states:

> "If you went back to the local authority you would remain a secure tenant. If you transferred to a housing association or other landlord, you would have a new form of tenancy, an assured tenancy, which would give you broadly the same security of tenure as you have now".

Surely that statement is incorrect, because, if it were the same, the assured tenancy would not be necessary as it would be secure. Surely that is just as much misinformation as anything that the right hon. Gentleman accuses me or my hon. Friends of creating.

Mr. Ridley: No, it is not true. The new housing association assured tenancy that is in this Bill is not identical—[Interruption.] No, I said that the housing association assured tenancy is not the same as the present secure tenancy that a council offers. That is why I said that it is not. I did not say that it was the same. I said in the pamphlet that the hon. Gentleman has, that they were broadly similar in terms of security.

Mr. Spearing: Or other landlords.

Mr. Ridley: If it is another landlord, not a housing association, the hon. Gentleman will perhaps know that the tenants charter requirements will be binding, contractual and supervised by the Housing Corporation, so that no landlord who has not signed up to the same principles as are involved in housing association secure tenancies will be allowed to take over from a HAT, either when a HAT is dissolved or on resale later, after they have acquired housing from a HAT and wish to sell it. The conditions are binding for all time. That is justification of what I said to the hon. Gentleman.

Only two nights ago, before we got to the amendment—I have no complaint about that—the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) expressed concern on behalf of Lambeth tenants living in bad housing. I agree that there is much bad housing in Lambeth. The hon. Gentleman said that I am bribing them to vote for a HAT. Perhaps I should remind him of the meeting that he attended with the council leaders in my office on 27 July. After 15 minutes, the tenants walked out, with the council representatives following them. They did so, they said, because unless they were given a ballot they were not interested in talking to me or to anyone else about a HAT. But I listened, and I am now offering them a ballot. I have done exactly what they asked and what the hon. Gentleman said that I should do. He now says that I am contriving an argument and that I am bribing them or denying them resources. That is the extent of the political manipulation and misinformation to which the hon. Gentleman has stooped.

Mr. Fraser: Will the Secretary of State tell me why, at Question Time last Wednesday week, he said that they should not have a ballot? When did he change his mind? Is it not true that, according to the briefings to the newspapers last Monday, it was made quite clear that, if people did not vote for a HAT, they would not have access to the £192 million? Is that confirmed today? Does it amount to a form of bribery?

Mr. Ridley: I announce decisions when they have been taken and agreed by my colleagues. On Wednesday last week, those decisions had not been agreed by my colleagues. As soon as they were agreed by my colleagues,

I announced them. I had to announce them because the amendment had to be tabled on Monday. It seemed to be reasonable at least to inform the public on Sunday rather than wait for them to read the amendments on Monday morning. I gave the information as quickly as I could.

I wonder whether Opposition Members should consider whether I am trying or they are trying to deny tenants the £192 million that I am making available for HATs. Perhaps they have forgotten their own words.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle) rose——

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman seeks to intervene. Let me quote his own words in Standing Committee. He said:

"we do not want to be accused of suggesting to local authorities, once the Government have declared housing action trusts, that they should not co-operate with the Government and take as much of the Government's resources as possible through housing action trusts to encourage the improvement and upgrading of estates.

If there are limited resources and the Government are to make them available only to areas where housing action trusts are declared, or provide limited resources elsewhere and extra resources to housing action trusts, no local authority in its right mind would turn that money away or refuse to co-operate to obtain the money for the tenants' benefit."

Mr. Roberts rose——

Mr. Ridley: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman when I have finished the quote.

Mr. Roberts: The Secretary of State has not finished the quote—that is the trouble. He is quoting selectively. I went on to say that we do not believe that this is the way to make the money available. We believe it should be given to the local authorities. The local authorities should be given resources because they could do the job if they were given them.

1.30 pm

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman cannot get away from the finality of those statements and, if he tries to do so, I shall quote a third passage from his speech. After saying that he did not like the idea, the hon. Gentleman said:

"We are not saying, however, that if the Bill is enacted and housing action trusts are introduced, local authorities should not try to make them work and use the extra resources available for the tenants' benefit."—[Official Report, Standing Committee G, 11 February 1988; c. 754-55.]

It seems impossible that the Bill will become law and that it will contain the HAT proposal. Labour Members should reconsider whether it is wise to continue to make this subject a political football when the interests of the very people whom they purport to represent and whom they seek to help are being jeopardised by they campaign of misinformation and the totally false information that they are giving.

The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West began his speech by saying that he acknowledged that there was a problem. He went on to say that he wanted to help tenants but he then talked in Battle of Britain terms about how he hoped that they would have a victory in defeating the housing action trust. That is not in the interests of the tenants. That is putting politics before the interests of his constituency. He made the most disgraceful blatant plea that the steamed-up anger of the tenants, which he has promoted, should be allowed to prevail over their own interests.

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West): I was merely seeking to report to the right hon. Gentleman what I had not had the opportunity of reporting in any other way—what the tenants themselves are saying. I said that I am perfectly happy to leave the decision to the tenants; that is exactly what I want.

Mr. Ridley: Well, we agree on the last point. We are leaving the decision to the tenants. That is no longer a contentious issue. Let me take this a stage further for the right hon. and learned Gentleman. If we are now leaving the decision to the tenants, and if that money is available in my public expenditure line—the right hon. and learned Gentleman can see that it is—what will he advise his tenants? Will he advise them that they should seek to make use of and take advantage of that facility? If not, I must advise him that, if we do not find an estate which is in a bad condition and which is willing to accept a housing action trust, I have no alternative but to return that money to the Treasury because it is in a certain line and allocated for a certain purpose—[HON. MEMBERS: "Blackmail."] There is no way in which that money could otherwise be made available——

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): That is blackmail.

Mr. Ridley: If the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) calls that blackmail, he does not know what the word "blackmail" means in this case. It is extraordinary that year after year he says that there is a need for more expenditure for the worst council estates, but when the money if offered he tries to persuade tenants not to accept it. Then when they do not receive it, he calls that blackmail.

Mr. Winnick rose——

Mr. Ridley: No, I shall not give way. The hon. Gentleman has a lot to learn about this.

We should give the tenants a vote, and the best way of arranging that is that the majority of those who vote should prevail. It is a yes or no question.

I am sad that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey has put his name to a motion stating that he supported the Lords amendment in the form in which it was drafted. I know that he has since removed it, but it was a mistake for him to put his name to it in the first place if, in the light of what he said earlier——

Mr. Simon Hughes: It has not been removed. The preferred voting system for both HATs and tenants' choice is one that ensures that more than half of those eligible to vote do so and that there is then a majority in favour. That is what the other place achieved for HATs, but, sadly, it missed it for tenants' choice by just two votes. If the right hon. Gentleman had accepted that for HATs and, through an amendment, for tenants' choice, we should have been a great deal happier.

Mr. Ridley: The Lords amendment, with which we are suggesting the House disagrees, provides for a majority of the tenants eligible to vote, not for a majority of the tenants who actually vote. What the hon. Gentleman has said conflicts with that. He is trying to have it both ways.

I commend the system of voting that the Government have proposed. I have had to redraft some of the Lords amendments for technical reasons, and I shall explain them if it is the wish of the House. The fairest way to carry out a ballot is by majority of those who vote.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I appeal for brief speeches from Members on both sides of the House because of the prevailing circumstances. In deciding who shall catch my eye, I shall take into account the length and frequency of interventions.

Dr. Cunningham: The House, those listening to the debate and those reporting it could be forgiven for overlooking the fact that we have just heard a speech from a Secretary of State who has been a member of successive Administrations who have, as a deliberate and systematic act of policy, reduced housing investment programmes, in real terms, by less than 70 per cent. That underlying fact —no accident, but a deliberate and regular act of policy —lies at the heart of many, although not all, of the housing problems that the right hon. Gentleman now says he so urgently wants to address and correct. It is an act of the greatest hypocrisy for the Government to say that they have at heart the best interests of those who have suffered those cuts, after almost 10 years of deliberately disabling the ability of local authorities, elected by those people, to deal with housing, neighbourhood and community problems.

We simply cannot stomach that from the right hon. Gentleman without saying that it stinks of hypocrisy to say that the Government are concerned about the very problems for which they are fundamentally responsible. Whichever way the right hon. Gentleman comes at the issue, HATs are a central Government imposition on people, their homes and their neighbourhoods. It is yet another example of the Government's manic determination to circumvent elected local authorities. It is no good the right hon. Gentleman saying that there is no element of coercion. It is coercion to say that unless people do what he wants them to do, their housing problems will be left unattended and no money will be made available. Nothing could be plainer than that.

I certainly welcome the Secretary of State's belated recognition of and conversion to the idea that tenants actually have some rights. We said at the outset that people should have been consulted and that they should have the right to vote. I can imagine the reaction in parts of Mayfair, Park lane or even Cirencester and Tewkesbury in the Cotswolds if a Labour Government had said, "We shall take action in Parliament to change the tenure of your homes and we shall not consult you about it." There would have been a riot. Indeed, it is amazing that those who will be affected by HATs have been so tolerant.

It has taken a year for the message to sink in. Even now, although the right hon. Gentleman has said that he accepts the spirit of the Lords amendment, he is nevertheless trying to fiddle even that.

Mr. Ridley indicated dissent.

Dr. Cunningham: The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head. I shall come to the evidence in a moment.

When I said earlier that the right hon. Gentleman's and the Prime Minister's ideology was the driving force behind the proposals, he denied it. Let us examine that denial. In common with many other people, the Opposition now have the advantage—despite the Government's attempts to deny it both to us and to the people affected—of the report by the property investment company Peat, Marwick, McLintock. On page 13a the report states:

"HATs—The desired end result drives the means of achieving the result", and the goal is spelt out unequivocally as "Successful transfer to the private sector".

The whole object of the exercise is to transfer the properties to the private sector whether the tenants like it or not, and it is utterly dishonest for any Minister to pretend otherwise. It was a remarkable act of candour for the Secretary of State to say that everything was explained by the consultants' report, but the trick was that he never intended us or the tenants to see the report. [HON. MEMBERS: "How did they get it?"] I do not know how they got it, but I am very glad that they did, because another feature that I cannot stand about the Secretary of State and the Government is the way in which they continually come to Parliament with legislation but deny evidence about it to the House and to the people affected. If the right hon. Gentleman's trickery is exposed, that is ultimately so much the better even for him, not to mention the House of Commons and the tenants.

My hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) recently asked what was the cost to the taxpayer of the consultants' reports. The Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier), replied:

"The costs of these consultancy studies, which are still under way, are commercially confidential."-[Official report, 2 November 1988; Vol. 139, c. 685.]

The Comptroller and Auditor General may have something to say about that. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax will continue to pursue the matter because she is absolutely right to seek to put on record the cost to the taxpayer of the ideological nonsense being perpetrated by the Government at the taxpayers' expense.

I therefore have to say, as gently as I can, that we simply do not believe what the Secretary of State has said to the House today.

We welcome the Lords amendment because it strengthens the tenants' position. If the Secretary of State had been consistent and said from the outset that tenants in proposed housing action trusts could have a vote and that in both that situation and in the pick-a-landlord scheme the vote would be on the basis of a simple majority, everyone would have been content, but that is not what he is proposing. Yet again, he is being deliberately inconsistent. The difference between the Lords amendment and the right hon. Gentleman's counterproposals is extremely important. The Lords amendment guarantees that a ballot will be held. The right hon. Gentleman's amendment does not give that unequivocal guarantee.

Mr. Ridley: Yes, it does.

Dr. Cunningham: The Government amendment gives the Secretary of State all the choices. He will decide whether a ballot is appropriate. He chooses whether to hire an independent body to carry out the ballot, and he chooses the independent body. If the Secretary of State decides against an independent body, he arranges for a ballot to be conducted in the way that he thinks best.

Mr. Ridley rose——

Dr. Cunningham: I shall give way in a moment.

1.45 pm

There are no rights and guarantees for tenants in the Secretary of State making all these decisions. The right hon. Gentleman may want to intervene to say what he will write into the Bill. Words spoken in the House in debates are not worth the paper on which they are written in respect of giving people fundamental rights. Repeatedly, Ministers in this and previous Thatcher Administrations have given commitments in the House which subsequently have been cynically and deliberately disregarded. /Interruption./ I do not know what the Under-Secretary of State is laughing at. We do not find any of this funny. If the Secretary of State wants to say that he will write into the Bill an unequivocal guarantee of a ballot, that is fine. If he is just going to say that that is his intention, that is certainly unacceptable.

Mr. Ridley: I agree that all this bumf about which the hon. Gentleman complains is worth nothing, particularly if it is not read. Let me read the amendment to the hon. Gentleman:

"no order may be made under section 60(1) above in respect of that estate unless a majority of tenants eligible to vote have approved the proposal."

That is unequivocal, clear and——

Dr. Cunningham: What does it mean?

Mr. Ridley: It means "vote for." It says "approved." If one votes against it, that is not approving. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman did not have to be taken through that point. If that is what he thinks, he has not left his private school.

Dr. Cunningham: Perhaps the Secretary of State or the Under-Secretary of State will explain why they should say that the Secretary of State decides whether a ballot is appropriate. Why should that caveat be in the legislation? Is the Secretary of State saying that that will be removed? Will he decide whether a ballot is appropriate? Will there be a ballot? [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer"] I am happy to give way to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Ridley: In respect of declaring housing action trusts, the governing subsection in clause 61 is subsection (2). I have quoted it once and I shall quote it again:

"no order may be made . . . in respect of that estate unless a majority of tenants eligible to vote have approved the proposal."

Mr. Spearing: Not by ballot.

Mr. Ridley: By ballot. The clause goes on to describe how it is to be done. It could be a ballot or a poll. The difference is that one is postal and the other is not. There are two possibilities: it could be organised directly by my officials or I have the power to delegate it to the Electoral Reform Society. I am happy to tell the House that the Electoral Reform Society has agreed to operate these ballots, so I am able to delegate this function to it.

Dr. Cunningham: I still say that, as written, the right hon. Gentleman's proposals are ambiguous. It is no good his saying that we should stop saying that. Our interpretation of and advice on what he proposes is that, unlike the Lords amendment, which he seeks to change, his proposals are ambiguous. That is a strong point.

In earlier exchanges, the Secretary of State failed to explain why the areas that he has chosen were so designated. We have argued that there are areas of far greater need, with much greater problems and difficulties, than those designated for his housing action trusts. If the right hon. Gentleman says that he wants to help the people facing the worst problems, why has Hulme in Manchester been ignored.? Why have areas of deck-access housing not been included in HATs?

People may think that HATs are well named. There will probably be little action and there is little trust of them among the people who will be affected. The Secretary of State's arguments do not wash. He has chosen areas for designation that he knows will suit his ideological purposes, which are spelt out in the report to which I have already referred. The whole sorry story is one of an attempt to mislead not only hon. Members but the people who will be affected, of prevaricating before appearing —but only appearing—to consent to a ballot in every case and of trying to coerce people in the direction that the Government want them to take by saying, "If you do not support us, no money will be spent on your housing difficulties." It is all too typical of the Government's housing policies, which owe everything to dogma and ideology but nothing to solving housing problems.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): Although there are some abiguities in the clause and amendment that the Secretary of State has not explained, the most remarkable feature of the debate was his statement, "I agree that there shall be a ballot." That is a remarkable reversal of the position that he had so adamantly taken and that he and his junior Ministers had supported in debate in the House and in the House of Lords for a long time.

My constituency contains no fewer than six HATs. About 2,500 families in Tower Hamlets are to be taken from the control of the local authorities and placed under the jurisdiction and powers of HATs. The Under-Secretary visited York hall in my borough on 17 October 1988 to explain why the Government would reject the Lords amendment. He said that there was no chance of balanced and informed opinion if tenants were consulted about whether they wanted a HAT. That was an extremely arrogant statement. I have much confidence in the ability of tenants in my borough to decide sensibly what is in their interests, and, even though it has come late in the day, I welcome the Secretary of State's change of heart or intention.

I should, however, like to make one or two further points in my brief intervention. I support the view, which has already been articulated, that it is not true that a HAT must be established selectively to assist run-down estates. If the right hon. Gentleman had some administrative problems or difficulties in allocating additional funds to the estates action programme or the priority estates project, which I introduced some years ago, he could easily have dispelled them by seeking additional powers from the House.

Having cut two thirds of the allocation to local authorities for housing investment programmes, it is logical that what is left for local authorities to spend should be targeted in the best and most direct way possible. I do not object to that, but it should be done by the local authorities with the Department, not in spite of it, and properties should not be taken out of their control as landlords. The overall control of the modernisation of an estate obviously falls to the contractor carrying out the job.

Ms. Mildred Gordon (Bow and Poplar): Does my right hon. Friend agree that when the Parliamentary

[Ms. Mildred Gordon]

Under-Secretary of State came to York hall, he tried to tell tenants that there was too great a percentage of council housing in Tower Hamlets? The tenants made it clear to him that they needed more, not less, council housing so that they could be housed at affordable rents. When he told the tenants that they had been misinformed, the tenants' answer was that they were well informed and knew the difference between assured and secured tenancies, which the Under-Secretary of State did not. He tried to tell them that they were the same. The tenants also know that if their tenancies are eventually transferred to private landlords, they will face service charges and rents that they cannot afford. They know that money can be given in other ways.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The intervention of the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Ms. Gordon) is longer than a speech. I hope that she will resume her seat.

Ms. Gordon: It is not the worst estates but the best locations that have been chosen for HATs.

Mr. Shore: I thank my hon. Friend for the additional points that she made about the meeting at York hall in Tower Hamlets.

If the Secretary of State has £192 million that he wishes to spend to deal with problems on the worst estates in the country, it is entirely within his power to discuss and agree with the local authorities which estates should be involved and then to allocate the money and see that it is spent for no other purpose. Therefore, the idea of HATs becomes irrelevant, unless there is an ulterior purpose. That ulterior purpose has been expressed and is rightly feared by tenants. It is to bring about the dissolution of local authority housing in a new way by assisting the transfer of such estates to private landlords and housing associations.

The new provision to assist local authorities to reacquire HATs came late in the day and is part of the retreat of the Secretary of State and his Ministers from the original purpose of HATs. Now he says, "They can opt to go back to the council at the end of the HAT period." At this late stage he has answered the question, "What if the council does not have the money to buy back at the new inflated price?" He said, "I will make special money available."

All those arrangements will need to be scrupulously and carefully examined if there is to be any serious change of opinion among the tenants affected by HATs. The tenants are concerned that they should continue to have the security that goes with secured tenancies and that they should have the right, which goes with democratically elected landlords, to be able to approach the responsible member of the council rather than have to negotiate with private or other landlords on the matter of contracts and law.

Mr. Fatchett: I shall speak specifically about Holton moor estate in my constituency, which has been designated as a housing action trust area, but what I say will apply to the Seacroft and Gipton estates, which have also been designated, which are in the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey).

First, the Secretary of State's decision to designate Holton moor as a housing action trust area has caused a great deal of disquiet and upset. If the right hon. Gentleman will study the criteria published by his Department, he will find that the essential characteristic of a housing trust area is that it is deemed to be run down. Tenants of Holton moor strongly object to their estate being described in that way. Earlier, the Secretary of State told the House that he had visited every HAT area. Unless he did so under the cloak of darkness, he never visited Holton moor in Leeds. If he had, he would have encountered a great deal of opposition to his Department's designation.

Secondly, the Secretary of State takes no account of the effective action that has been taken over a number of years to improve Holton moor's housing and environment. There has been substantial local authority investment, which is already showing significant results. There is an agreement with a local housing association to take over a block of maisonettes there, which will in itself improve the area. The old West Yorkshire county council has improved the estate's overall environment. If the right hon. Gentleman visits Holton moor, he will find not a run-down estate but an area that is improving because of local authority intervention.

My final point is that although we welcome the ballot, we prefer the House of Lords definition. The ballot is not a measure of the Secretary of State's success or of his conversion; it is a major triumph for tenants of housing action trust areas throughout the country who have expressed their profound objections to his proposals. In one sense, I thank him for them, because he has brought to the tenants of Holton moor, Seacroft and Gipton an awareness of the points at issue that has never previously existed. As a result, there have been many tenants' meetings and campaigns.

When the Holton moor, Seacroft and Gipton ballots take place, the Secretary of State's proposals will be overwhelmingly defeated. If the tenants of those estates had seen the right hon. Gentleman's performance this morning, their conviction to rebuff his proposals would be stronger still. Blackmail of the kind hinted at by the Secretary of State today—"If you do not vote for my proposals, you will get no money for your estate"—will not work. People have courage and principles and they will not be browbeaten by the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Mr. Gerald Bowden (Dulwich): I wish to speak briefly but firmly in favour of housing action trusts. The majority of the cases that come to my advice surgery—and Opposition Members say that they share this experience—relate to housing matters. Most of the letters in my post bag also relate to housing inadequacies of one type or another suffered by my constituents in Dulwich and Southwark. They are increasingly experiencing homelessness and difficulty with obtaining transfers, with waiting lists, repairs, squatters, and from rent and rate debt amounting to above £30 million. Those tenants who do pay are subsidising those who do not. They increasingly encounter difficulties also in respect of lawlessness and violence on the estates on which they live.

In such circumstances, my right hon. Friend's proposals offer a positive and flexible way of dealing with those problems. It is inexplicable that Opposition Members implacably oppose an attempt to make improvements in an area that desperately needs it. In a by-election that is currently under way in my constituency, there is a stage army of agitators running around and sowing the seeds of anxiety in the minds of tenants who are already trapped and imprisoned in their flats, with no opportunity of escape. They are being told that all of the proposals that we are debating today will be for the worse. Nothing is further from the truth.

For that reason I wholeheartedly support the idea of the two HATs proposed for Southwark. I offer my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State the opportunity to consider other estates in my constituency which might benefit from that treatment. However, I have one anxiety. After people in HAT areas have experienced the improvements that will flow from the trusts, they will want to be reassured that they will not be thrown willy nilly back on to the mercies of local authorities. They will want reassurances that their right to remain in some form of tenure other than that of council tenants will be safeguarded. They must be reassured that the range of tenures offered to tenants now will be available when HATs have reached maturity. With those reassurances, experience and time will prove that HATs are a major step forward in the provision of public sector housing. I give the concept of HATs my full support and I urge the House to do the same.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The Secretary of State for the Environment introduced the Housing Bill on 19 November last year. When he proposed housing action trusts he will recall that there was no provision for tenants to vote. There would be a vote in this place, but nothing else. Three hundred and fifty three days later, on Sunday television, the Minister for Housing, Environment and Countryside, Lord Caithness, announced that there would be a vote.

It says something about the Government's attitude to tenants that it took them to the last fortnight of the Session before they conceded that there should be a vote and that effectively to nationalise a change of tenure of housing for thousands of people should not have been contemplated without a vote.

Sunday's broadcast was unusual because the programme was followed by a press release from the Department of the Environment. That is not normal practice on a Sunday. The press release was unusual because it stated:

"Government Announces a Ballot on HATS.

Lord Caithness said:

'When we announced our proposals for Housing Action Trusts in July, we said we would take account of local views in deciding whether to establish them. We have spent the past few months listening to what people have to say.

Local authorities and tenant groups have greeted the Government's proposals with suspicion and hostility. Mainly, they claim, because no ballot had been allowed for."

The Government cannot have been surprised at the response that their idea and visits received because, until a few days ago, tenants were told that they would have no vote. The introduction of the vote is a substantial improvement which I welcome.

My only remaining point relates to the kind of ballot, and the Secretary of State referred to that earlier. An amendment was tabled in another place that the ballot should express the wishes of a majority of those eligible to vote. The Government's concession on tenants' choice includes a proposal, agreed by the other place, that there should be a minimum turnout of 50 per cent. The Secretary of State was right—I stressed that point to the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) earlier—in his interpretation of the wording of his amendment which makes it clear that there must be a ballot or poll—there is no substantial difference between those two.

Mr. Ridley: One is a postal operation and the other involves sticking paper in a ballot box.

Mr. Hughes: I accept that a proper vote must take place. The Secretary of State has said that he will use one of the options to delegate the power to conduct the vote to an independent agency, namely the Electoral Reform Society. That is very welcome. However, it would have been better if the Secretary of State had accepted the amendment as drafted in another place, relating to the majority of those eligible to vote in favour, rather than the majority of those who turned out either in a postal or personal ballot. In the Government's own words, it is right to be suspicious of a major change if it is not certain that a real majority is in favour. Only the other day, the Government said of trade union reform:

"A simple (or even a substantial) majority . . . might not actually be representative if many of those given entitlement to vote in the ballots did not actually do so."

Because we believe that a majority of eligible tenants as well as a majority in the overall vote should be in favour, we shall support the Lords amendments and oppose the Government's change, which, although an improvement on the original position, is still not as good as it could or should be.

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): My starting point is the interests of the tenants on the North Peckham and Gloucester grove estates, whom I was elected to represent. I also represent their concerns for their children and for future tenants who will need housing on such estates.

I take it ill that the Secretary of State, who represents a constituency in Gloucestershire, should tell me that he knows more about what is in the interests of the tenants on the estates that I have mentioned than they do—and more than me, the Member of Parliament elected to represent them. Perhaps I can enlighten the right hon. Gentleman by telling him that in Peckham there is a rare degree of unanimity on this issue. Tenants, the councillors elected by them, those who work in the housing service—many of whom are themselves tenants on those estates—and I, as their Member of Parliament, believe that the present position is not satisfactory. We feel that the quality of service that tenants receive is not good enough, and that the design of the buildings needs improvement.

No one, least of all the tenants, is complacent about the circumstances in which they currently live. But they all believe, as do I, that working with a council that is properly funded by central Government is the route out of the present problems. None of them wants housing action trusts, especially if they are imposed by a Government who think that a ballot should not be allowed because they will not be able to tell the difference between genuine information and misinformation. They are insulted by the idea that a housing action trust is to be imposed on them and the right to vote only dragged out in equivocal terms by a Minister who has been forced back by political reaction to his proposals.

All the tenants in the North Peckham and Gloucester grove estates know that it now takes longer to obtain Health Service treatment and benefits, and that those benefits are not enough to live on. They have seen the deterioration of public transport in south-east London, on which they have to depend. They have no confidence in the solution that the Government wish to impose. I hope, therefore, that the Secretary of State will accept the Lords amendment, which would allow tenants a watertight ballot and prevent his equivocations from being forced on them.

Mr. Fraser: I speak on behalf of the tenants of 3,000 dwellings on the Old Loughborough, New Loughborough and Angell Town estates in Brixton. Two of those estates belonged not to Lambeth council but to the GLC, which was forced to hand them over to Lambeth with insufficient investment to bring them up to date. The blame for the problems in two thirds of the properties, therefore, does not lie with Lambeth council.

The Secretary of State wholly misunderstands the decision by tenants about HATs. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman), I have encountered considerable dissatisfaction among tenants about the management, investment and design of their estates, and a wide measure of criticism about Lambeth's services and some of its housing officers. It would be silly for me to deny that.

I was genuinely surprised at the unanimity of the opposition to HATs. I had thought that some people, if not a majority, would speak in favour, seeing HATs as a solution to some of their problems in getting improvements carried out. If the Secretary of State thinks that NALGO has influenced tenants, he has made a great mistake. He has misjudged their political reaction, and he had better come to terms with that fact.

2.15 pm

A very happy development at a late stage in the Bill is that there is to be a ballot, but I want to turn to the more sinister side of it. Unless tenants vote for the local authority's loss of democratic accountability and for the privatisation of revitalised housing estates with a good future, the Secretary of State has made it clear that not a penny of additional resources will go to those who reject housing action trusts.

The Secretary of State has referred to estates that he has described as dilapidated and in a state of disrepair. If people choose to reject housing action trusts, there will be the same dilapidation and disrepair and the same frustration. Whenever there is rain, water will still come into the flats from the balconies and flood them. The heating will remain unsatisfactory. Water will leak between one flat and another across heavy concrete barriers. Asbestos will need to be removed and insulation will still be needed. Cavernous, unused garages will remain hostile and depressing. Those are the unsatisfactory features of some estates where murders, rape and many other serious offences have been far too common. Conditions will remain exactly the same, but treatment will depend not on the merit of the argument but on the outcome of the ballot. That is callous.

The Secretary of State objects to the terms "blackmail" and "bribery". I think that they call it pork-barrelling in the United States. If people do not vote for the right decision, there is no Government investment. That seems to me to be a callous, unprincipled and perverted use of public money. Poor tenants are being punished for pitting their judgement against the Secretary of State's wishes. He proposes that the professionals should be put in charge of the tenants. I want tenants to be in charge of the professionals.

I have put my tenants on the Angell Town estate in touch with Oxford polytechnic school of architecture. It now acts as their professional adviser. The tenants resent the idea of housing action trusts because, using their own professionals, they have developed both inner city and estate action schemes to improve their estates.

The tenants thought that they had the confidence of the Housing Corporation and the Department of the Environment. However, the Department of the Environment turned on them, as it turned on the tenants of estates in other parts of the country, and sought to seize the estates from them. The tenants have won a considerable victory, but I want my tenants to have the victory not just of the vote but of a Government assurance that they will not be punished for the choice that they have made and for their success.

Mr. John Heddle (Mid-Staffordshire): I voted in favour of the guillotine motion because I want this legislation, which formed a major part of the Conservative party's manifesto at the last general election, to receive Royal Assent as soon as possible so that municipal harassment, misleading information and the threats that have been made to tenants in certain housing action trust areas can be redressed. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and his colleagues in the Department of the Environment will then be able to publish unbiased, straightforward literature that explains the rights that the members of housing action trust boards will have when the Bill becomes law.

I have to declare an interest. Together with right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House, I am an honorary vice-president of the Building Societies Association. The building societies and other responsible financial institutions have a responsibility and duty, as well as an opportunity when housing action trusts have been established, to play a specific role in improving their neighbourhoods. That point was expressed most eloquently by my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden). Such areas have been starved of investment and care by housing departments. One has only to examine Lambeth, Southwark and Tower Hamlets and their rent arrears and voids to realise that their housing stock has not been cared for as it would have been if the tenants' voice had been heard more loudly and sympathetically.

I welcome four things which have come out of today's debate and which also came out of our debates in Committee during the summer. First, through the powers devolved to the Housing Corporation by the Bill, my right hon. Friend will seek legally binding guarantees on rents from future landlords, whoever they may be. Secondly, local residents and people who live in a HAT area can be represented on the HAT board. Thirdly, new landlords, whether from the private sector, the voluntary housing movement, housing associations or building societies such as the Nationwide Anglia, will need approval from the Housing Corporation. Fourthly, HATs will have a duty to co-operate with local authorities which ask for assistance in discharging their responsibilities to solve the problem of homelessness.

I believe that the housing action trust is a further imaginative way in which to improve the environment in parts of the six selected boroughs.

Mr. Spearing: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. During his speech, the Secretary of State read a statement about ballots. During the Division which is to take place shortly, will he check that his quotation was from the Bill that was sent to the other place and not an amendment put in by somebody else? There has been some confusion, and I hope that the matter can be clarified before the debate on the next group of Lords amendments.

Mr. Ridley rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State is trying to catch my eye. Does he have the leave of the House to speak again?

Hon. Members: Aye.

Mr. Ridley: With the leave of the House, I should like to reply. I was quoting from the amendment which I have tabled on the Order Paper.

Mr. Soley: The Secretary of State's error was to quote from the Lords amendment. He will need to check the record, but that is generally understood to be the case.

Mr. Ridley: I immediately apologise.

I must reinforce, for the benefit of the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), that there is no way in which I can designate a HAT under the amendment that I have proposed unless a ballot has taken place and the majority of those who vote and are entitled to vote are in favour of it. He is quite wrong to doubt that.

There is one unresolved issue—whether the ballot should be conducted directly by me or whether it should be conducted by an independent body such as the Electoral Reform Society. Those are the options for which the amendment provides. I am happy to say that the Electoral Reform Society will, I think, agree to conduct ballots, so there will be no need for me to do it. I prefer it that way.

The hon. Member for Copeland and the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) complained about cuts in housing investment. When we consider housing capital, we have to take into account the growing quantity of receipts available to and spent by councils. On that basis, spending by councils on housing has increased from £2·251 billion in 1980-81 to an estimated £3·375 billion in 1988-89. That is not a cut of 70 per cent.—it is an increase of about 50 per cent. That is a point which I must get the right hon. and hon. Gentlemen to understand. The difficulty is that, within that greatly increased total, receipts lie in areas that are often quite different from where the needs are. Therefore, I cannot increase allocations—indeed, I have to reduce them—because I have to accommodate the fact that councils have the right to spend 20 per cent. of those receipts, and nearly always do so.

The total figures have risen greatly, but I concede that in the process the areas of greatest need have suffered because allocations have been reduced. Therefore, if we want to give an area special help, we have to find some device such as the one that I have proposed—the housing action trust—to bring new money outside the capital control system to that particular area. That is what I have sought to do.

Dr. Cunningham: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for giving way and for confessing on the record that because of Government policy the areas of greatest housing need have suffered expenditure cuts. That is what he has just admitted. Why has it taken him so long to be honest with the House?

Mr. Ridley: I did not say that those areas suffered cuts in their expenditure, I said that there had been cuts in their capital allocation. That has never been concealed. It is public knowledge that during the past eight years there have been progressive cuts in capital allocations for the reasons that I have just given, but total spending has increased. The hon. Gentleman has never been able to understand that. I hope that he understands it at last.

Mr. Shore: I do not wish to mislead the House, but surely the figures that the Secretary of State has quoted are current prices and were not adjusted for changes in price during the eight years. Although the figures, allowing for inflation, are up, there has been a reduction in real terms.

Mr. Ridley: I was quoting the cash prices. Even then that is not a 70 per cent. cut. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman understands that, but he should have a word with his hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) and explain the difference between allocation and spending which his hon. Friend has consistently failed to understand.

Turning to the right hon. Gentleman's later point, it would be possible to legislate some biased system, to give some extra money over and above the normal allocation to certain councils. That would be possible, but we are not proposing to do that. I shall not switch money to councils which have vacancy rates, have failed to collect rents and rent arrears and have the sort of management records that we have heard about this morning. It is better to switch that money so that it goes to repair and not to the various evils we have been discussing.

I must tell the hon. Members for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) and for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) that that is not blackmail. If estates refuse to accept a housing action trust, all that will happen is that they will go back into the current system of capital allocations plus 20 per cent. of housing receipts which are available to be spent, plus estate action provision which will be available to all councils as it is now, on an equal and fair basis. We are offering the tenants of the estates a priority, and they can turn it down. That is not a punishment; it is a conscious decision. I hope that I have now cleared up that point.

The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) described the amendment as equivocal. It is not. It is typical of the misunderstanding or the misinformation which she deliberately spreads. I do not accuse her of deliberate misinformation, but she does not understand. If she is going to talk to her tenant constituents, will she please take the trouble to get it right? There is nothing equivocal about the amendment. There will be a ballot and a decision by a majority of those who vote. If she, as a Member of Parliament, cannot get that right, how on earth will she give her constituents the proper information which they need?

Mr. Soley: There is genuine confusion. Perhaps the Secretary of State has been advised by his solicitors. Two choices are open to him: first, to hand over the job to an independent body, which he has said he wants to do; and, secondly, to conduct a ballot or poll if he thinks fit. In the second case, the key words are "ballot or poll". We are not sure whether a vote is implied by the use of the word "poll". A ballot must be a vote, whereas in everyday parlance a poll does not necessarily mean a vote.

2.30 pm

Mr. Ridley: I am advised by the parliamentary draftsmen that they are the correct terms to use if we wish to cover the two possibilities of the Electoral Reform Society deciding, first, to have a postal ballot or, secondly, to set up boxes in polling booths into which people may place their votes, as we do when we vote in parliamentary elections. The phrase that the draftsmen suggested is apparently a well-known phrase that covers either alternative. I give that assurance to the hon. Gentleman, and I hope that that point will no longer be a subject of questions.

I agree with the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney that we should put tenants in charge of officials instead of officials being in charge of tenants. But does he believe that the tenants on the estate in his constituency, or those in the constituency of the hon. Member for Peckham, are in charge of the officials who run those housing departments? If they are, I can assume only that they must like living in such conditions. But of course they are not. Tenants need liberation. There is now no reason why Labour Members should not decide on a free vote whether they put their political prejudices in front of the interests of their constituents.

Question put, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment:

Amendment (b) made to the Bill in lieu of the Lords amendment, in page 46, line 19, at beginning insert

'Subject to section 61 below'.—[Mr. Maclean.]

Clause 61

CONSULTATION AND PUBLICITY

Lords amendment: No. 73, in page 47, line 10, leave out subsection (2) and insert—

"(2) The Secretary of State shall, in each estate in any area in respect of which he proposes to make a designation order, make arrangements for the conduct of a ballot of tenants in the estate, and no order may be made under section 60(1) above in respect of that estate unless a majority of tenants eligible to vote have approved the proposal.

(2A) For the purposes of subsection (2) above, the Secretary of State may make regulations to provide for the definition of 'tenant'."

Question, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment, put and agreed to.

Amendments made to the Bill in lieu of the said Lords amendment: (c) in page 47, line 10, leave out subsection (2) and insert—

'(2) Where the Secretary of State is considering a proposal to make a designation order, he shall use his best endeavours to secure that notice of the proposal is given to all tenants of houses in the area proposed to be designated who are either secure tenants or tenants of such description as may be prescribed by regulations.

(2A) After having taken the action required by subsection (2) above, the Secretary of State shall either—

(a) make arrangements for such independent persons as appear to him to be appropriate to conduct, in such manner as seems best to them, a ballot or poll of the tenants who have been given notice of the proposal as mentioned in that subsection with a view to establishing their opinions about the proposal to make a designation order; or

(b) if it seems appropriate to him to do so, arrange for the conduct of a ballot or poll of those tenants in such manner as appears to him best suited to establish their opinions about the proposal.

(2B) If it appears from a ballot or poll conducted as mentioned in subsection (2A) above that a majority of the tenants who, on that ballot or poll, express an opinion about the proposal to make the designation order are opposed to it, the Secretary of State shall not make the order proposed.

(2C) The power to make regulations under subsection (2) above shall be exercisable by the Secretary of State by statutory instrument which shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.'.

(d), in line 14, leave out 'or steps taken'.

(e), in line 15, leave out 'or subsection (2) above as if taken' and insert 'above as if undertaken'.—[Mr. Maclean.]

Lords amendments Nos. 74 and 75 agreed to.

Clause 74

TRANSFER OF LAND AND OTHER PROPERTY TO HOUSING ACTION TRUSTS

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): We now come to Lords amendment No. 76, with which we shall take amendment (a) thereto and Lords amendment No. 120.

Lords amendment: No. 76, in page 56, line 13, at end insert—

("(5A) Where an order is made under this section—

(a) payments made by a local authority as mentioned in subsection (5) above shall be prescribed expenditure for the purposes of Part VIII of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 (capital expenditure of local authorities); and

(b) unless the order otherwise provides, payments made to a local authority as mentioned in subsection (5) above shall be regarded for the purposes of the Part as sums received by the authority in respect of disposal falling within section 75(2) of that Act."

Read a Second time.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I beg to move, as an amendment to the Lords amendment, after 'authorities)' in sub paragraph (a) insert

'and the amount of expenditure prescribed for an authority under the said Part shall be adjusted by the amount of any such payments'.

We shall not ask the House to divide on this amendment—[Interruption.] I could be pushed. However, we will save the surprise for a little later.

We do not like the Lords amendment because it suggests that if the property taken over by a HAT is given a positive value, the money that the local authority receives will be treated as a capital receipt, and currently only 20 per cent. of such receipts can be spent in any one year. The Government have issued a consultation document suggesting that in future 75 per cent. of capital receipts will have to be applied against debt. Any local authority, such as Newham, that is desperately trying to provide homes for the homeless, or to repair ageing or defective stock, will have to come to a halt in 1990-91 if it has any debts outstanding. Such treatment of capital receipts will inhibit the ability of local authorities to deal with problems in their stock.

Of course, that is really what the Government want. They are setting up local authorities so that they fail as landlords. The Government want to ensure that local authorities cannot carry out major repairs or improvements so that they can take away even more properties. The spiral of loss of stock without compensation and without the ability to improve remaining stock will continue, yet the best evidence shows that disrepair in the public sector stock is not the fault of the local authority landlord. The Audit Commission made that quite clear in its 1986 report.

The position is complicated because the Chancellor, in his Autumn Statement, announced a cut in housing allocation of 26 per cent. in real terms. Where will the money come from to pay a dowry to a HAT? Unless an increase in local authorities' proscribed expenditure is announced, that money will have to come from other housebuilding programmes. That is grossly unfair. If we did not have this nonsense of a procedure this afternoon, we would press the amendment to a Division.

Mr. Ridley: I can answer the hon. Gentleman briefly by telling him that amendments Nos. 76 and 120 bring payments received by a local authority on transfer of property to a HAT or under tenants' choice within the normal workings of the capital control system. As the hon. Gentleman said, under the present regime 20 per cent. of housing receipts are available to be spent each year on a declining basis. If we switch to the system described in the consultative document, authorities will be able to spend 25 per cent. and the remaining 75 per cent. will be applied to debt. There will thus be an increase from 20 to 25 per cent.

The hon. Gentleman asked about a dowry if the stock is of negative value. My officials recently discussed this with local authority associations at a meeting of the Housing Consultative Council and noted the desire of the associations that additional resources should be made available if dowries were required. It will be some months before sufficient information is available on the valuation of properties to be transferred to HATs, but I assure the hon. Gentleman and the House that we shall consider the matter sympathetically at the appropriate time.

Mr. Tony Banks: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

RIGHT CONFERRED BY PART IV

Lords amendment: No. 81, in page 69, line 14, leave out "any freehold" and insert

"the fee simple estate in any"

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.—[Mr. Maclean.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 82 to 85, amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 85 and Lords amendment No. 127.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I wish to raise just one question about Lords amendment No. 85 and amendment (a). I have given the Minister notice of my question and I hope that he will be able to give a clear answer. The amendment probes the question whether when premises owned by a local authority comprise both residential and commercial premises—for instance, a shop with a flat above—those premises are included or excluded from the tenants' choice provisions. I have had inquiries from shopkeepers with residential premises owned by the local authority in Jamaica road in my constituency. The Lords amendent, which has been described as a technical amendment, appears to include such shops. I should be grateful to know for certain whether that is so.

Mr. Trippier: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me notice of his question. It is possible for the freehold of a shop to be transferred under the tenants' choice provisions if it is part of a building which satisfies the conditions delineated in clause 92 and 94 or is added to the acquisition at the suggestion of the landlord under clause 97(1)(d). The effect is not brought about by new paragraph (a) in Lords amendment No. 85 and it would not be a relevant consideration whether the tenant of the shop lived in council premises.

Mr. Simon Hughes: With the leave of the House——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman cannot speak for a second time at this stage, but if he waits until I propose the question on amendment No. 85, he can seek to catch my eye.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos, 82 to 84 agreed to.

PROPERTY EXCLUDED FROM RIGHT

Lords amendment: No. 85, in page 71, line 14, at end insert—

"(1A) In the application of subsection (1) above to property falling within section 92(1)(b) above, a building or part of a building which, apart from this subsection, would not be regarded as occupied for residential purposes shall be so regarded if—

(a) it is or is intended to be occupied together with a dwelling-house and used for purposes connected with the occupation of the dwelling-house; or

(b) it is or is intended to be used for the provision of services to a dwelling-house which is comprised in a building falling within section 92(1)(a) above."

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment—[Mr. Maclean.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) wish to move his amendment (a), leave out lines 6 to 8, paragraph (a)?

Mr. Simon Hughes: I shall be brief. The Minister has confirmed that there is a risk that people with residential and business premises——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I did not call the hon. Member to make a second speech. I was asking whether he wished to move his amendment (a) formally or to withdraw it.

Mr. Hughes: May I have permission, with the leave of the House, to respond to the Minister?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With the leave of the House, the hon. Member may speak again.

Mr. Hughes: The Minister has confirmed what we feared. I shall not proceed with my amendment because I do not wish to detain the House by forcing a vote now. It is a sad and unfortunate additional provision in the Bill, which was not clear before, that residential and now commercial premises will be included in tenants' choice and the unsatisfactory system which it will provide. For the reasons that I have given, I shall not proceed with my amendment.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 86 to 95 agreed to.

Clause 99

TENANTS CONTINUING AS TENANTS OF LANDLORD

Lords amendment: No. 96, in page 74, line 34, leave out "may" and insert "shall"

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following: Lords amendments Nos. 97 to 102 and 106 to 109.

Lords amendment: No. 111, in page 76, line 13, leave out from "if" to "exceeds" in line 14 and insert

"in response to the consultation under section 101 above,—

(a) less than 50 per cent. of the tenants to whom that section applies have given notice of their wishes in such manner as may be prescribed; or

(b) the number of tenants to whom that section applies who have given notice in that manner of their wish to continue as tenants of the landlord"

Amendment (b) thereto, at end, insert—

'(aa) the number of tenants to whom that section applies who have given notice in that manner of their wish to become tenants of the applicant is less than 50 per cent. of the total number of tenants to whom that section applies; or.

Amendment (c) thereto, at end, insert—

'(aa) 50 per cent. or fewer of those eligible to vote in the consultation process under that section have given notice of their wish to transfer to the applicant; or'

Amendment (d) thereto, at end, insert—

'(aa) 50 per cent. or fewer of those voting in the consultation process under that section have given notice of their wish to transfer to the applicant; or'

Lords amendment No. 112, in page 76, line 15, at end insert—

"(2A) In any case where a tenancy is held by two or more persons jointly, those persons shall be regarded as a single tenant for the purposes of subsection (2) above and, accordingly, any notice given in response to the consultation under section 101 above shall be of no effect for the purposes of subsection (2) above unless it is given by or on behalf of all the joint tenants."

Amendment (a) thereto, leave out from 'jointly,' to end, and insert

'each of those persons shall be regarded as a qualifying tenant for the purposes of subsection (2) above.'.

Lords amendments Nos. 113 and 115.

Mr. Trippier: All the amendments are concerned with the interrelated questions of entitlement to consultation under clause 101, how votes are registered in the majority calculation under clause 102 and the provisions for excluding houses and leasing-back flats under clause 99.

Lords amendment No. 96 provides that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State "shall" rather than "may" make regulations under clause 99 about exclusions and lease-back. There was never, in practice, any doubt that he would.

Lords amendment No. 108 was tabled by the Opposition in another place and accepted there on the Government's advice. It clarifies—as was virtually in all circumstances already the case—the point that a qualifying tenant, to be entitled to vote, must still occupy during the consultation period, under clause 101, a dwelling that he occupied on the date when the application was served.

Lords amendment No. 111 was tabled by my noble Friend the Earl of Caithness in another place. It follows an arrangement proposed earlier by the Opposition there. It provides that an applicant may not proceed unless at least 50 per cent. of those eligible to vote do so one way or the other. I hope that this additional guarantee against the outcome of an application being decided by apathy will be welcomed by hon. Members on both sides of the House.

In practice, we believe that there will be great tenant interest in the opportunities offered by tenants' choice and that this turnout figure will be met in all cases where there is a good prospect of a successful transfer. It also removes a possible anomaly by ensuring that "no" votes cast by long leaseholders count towards the blocking majority required under clause 102 if the application is to be prevented from proceeding.

Amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 111 would set the minimum turnout required for a transfer at not 50 per cent. but 100 per cent. That is unreasonable, not least because the 50 per cent. figure came originally from an amendment moved by the noble Friends of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) in the other place. I disagree with it 100 per cent.

Amendment No. 112 clarifies that joint tenants will have one vote, which must be cast jointly. This is the right arrangement because qualifying tenants' votes, as well as contributing collectively to deciding the outcome of the application, will also determine individually whether their home stays with the existing landlord or transfers to the applicant. Families and households will decide which way their shared decision should go. The same decision is made by almost every owner-occupied household at some time or another. Because of the effect on individual tenancies, the separate voting entitlement proposed for joint tenants in amendment (a) is not practicable.

The remaining Lords amendments—Nos. 97 to 102, 106 and 107, 109, 113 and 115—put the Secretary of State's powers to prescribe descriptions of tenants for consultation under clause 101, and leaseback under clause 99, into a form which allows the links between the two processes to be completely and satisfactorily followed through. They will, for example, allow him to ensure that commercial tenants are entitled to consultation under clause 101 on a similar basis to long leaseholders. They will allow him to ensure that successors to a qualifying tenant during the period between the relevant date and consultation get a vote. They will allow him to arrange that flats which the landlord should be able to hold on to indefinitely—old people's or handicapped people's flats exempted from the right to buy—are leased back under clause 99 as a matter of course.

Amendments (a), (b), (c) and (d) to Lords amendment No. 100 go to the heart of the issue. The amendments to Lords amendment No. 111 would all prevent an application from proceeding if less than 50 per cent. of eligible tenants voted positively to transfer. I cannot advise the House to accept the amendments. They would disturb the balance that we have carefully struck in the Bill to facilitate change for those tenants who want and need it, while providing the strongest possible safeguards for individuals.

I remind the House that the terms of approvals given by the Housing Corporation under clause 93 will require potential applicants, wherever practicable, to take part in a preliminary competition to establish initial tenant preference. My noble Friend announced in Committee in another place that the successful competitor will have to demonstrate initial "in principle" support from at least 10 per cent. of tenants before he can go ahead.

The conditions of applicant's approval will oblige them to keep tenants informed about progress with the application. When the time for formal consultation arrives, tenants will have a contractual offer of new tenancy terms from the applicant. At the same time, but quite separately, they will receive, from the independent teller, their ballot form, accompanied by comprehensive information about the process, including the consequences of voting either way or of abstaining. If any eligible tenant fails initially to vote, or returns an invalid ballot paper, the independent teller will call back and help tenants, if they wish to do so, to cast a valid vote.

When the vote is counted, we shall have taken every realistic step to ensure that tenants have known about the process, the implications of voting and not voting, the contents and status of the applicant's offer and their individual rights. A secure tenant who does not want to transfer need not change landlords against his or her will. Against that background, we believe that it is right to provide that those who, having heard all the arguments, have no feelings strong enough to vote either way, do not damage the opportunities of those who need and want change.

Mr. Soley: The Government got themselves into such a mess that they had to impose the guillotine motion. The House is having to deal with amendments in an undesirable fashion.

A number of amendments in this group, and in following groups, are desirable, but some are undesirable. I shall be speaking in favour of amendment No. 108 and the amendments to amendment No. 111. We are opposed to amendment No. 207, but in favour of amendment No. 208. For reasons that the House will understand—people outside may not understand so easily—we shall vote on some of those issues. We might support some of the associated amendments even if we vote against the others.

Having said that, this is an important group of amendments and we would have liked to spend more time on it. It deals with the scheme launched by the Government—"Pick a landlord." It should be called, "Pick a tenant." The first point—I have made it before but I shall make it again to the new Minister because he may not have heard it—is that if it is so wonderful for a tenant to be able to change landlords, why does it not apply to the private sector for non-resident landlords? Rights are supposed to be universal. I want the message to go out loud and clear that the Labour party has not been opposed to people being able to change their landlords. That has happened in Glasgow and Sheffield where local authorities have led the way.

It is important to know—I want this on the record for Conservative Members who take an interest in these matters—that under a future Labour Government tenants of non-resident private landlords will be given the ability to change their landlords. That means that all those pushed out into the private sector by this wretched Bill will have a chance to turn the decision around. That choice is denied them today. It also means that the tenants of the Rachmans and van Hoogstratens of the world will be able to go to their town hall, local housing association or housing co-operative and ask them to take over the tenancy. Subject to certain rules and regulations that need to be applied, they will have that right. Private landlords, whether they are taking over council properties or are already operating in this area, had better be aware of the implications of that if they prove to be bad landlords.

It is my judgment—it has always been the Opposition's judgment—that most people do not want to change their landlords. Most people—particularly in the public sector—are satisfied. We know from independent polls that the public sector is popular in most areas. There are areas where it is unpopular from time to time and tenants need to be given additional powers.

A landlord may make an offer for council properties. We should note that individual tenants do not say, "Will you come in?" As a group they may be able to ask a housing association to come in, but that is not what usually happens. A private organisation may take an interest in a set of properties and tell the local authority that it is interested in taking it over. The local authority will be obliged by law to provide all the information on the properties such as rent levels, rent arrears, empty properties, the cost of caretaking and so on. Only then will there be the so-called vote.

The important point is that it is not only people who abstain who are counted as being in favour of a transfer. In the other place when my noble Friends were moving amendment No. 108, it was clear that empty properties and people who had died would be included in the vote as having voted in favour of the takeover. That amendment has now been accepted and the Government, after much criticism from me, members of my party, and tenants have changed their opinion and we welcome that.

The Government talk about my hon. Friends whipping up fear and hysteria around the country. We have not done that, but the Government have. If I had been asked to organise a meeting of 200, 300 or 400 tenants on a housing issue, I would have said that I could not do it. However, as soon as the Government published the Bill and tenants became aware of its implications, not just public tenants but private tenants, they began to ask us to hold meetings. That happened in Conservative-controlled areas with non-political tenants' associations. If the Government need any evidence about that, they should ask the Association of District Councils and Lady Anson. The ADC is controlled by the Conservative party, but it does not agree with the voting system. The National Consumer Council, hardly a Labour party organisation, described the system as, "inertia selling."

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman has referred to the meetings held throughout the country. He must be aware —I can verify this—that a considerable number of the meetings, particularly those about HATs, were attended by members of Militant and the Socialist Workers party. Is he happy to be associated with those people?

Mr. Soley: I am happy to be associated with the tenants. It was they who organised and ran the meetings, and I am 100 per cent. with them. I do not care a damn about fringe individuals from the Left or the Right, including Tory party members, attending those meetings. If they were tenants, they were welcome. It is tenants who have fought and won the battle over housing action trusts, and they will win again with our support. There are bound to be groups from the Left, Right and centre, and from no political affiliation, who will attend tenants' meetings. It is the tenants who have our support and who lead the movement against the Government's proposals.

Mr. Trippier: May I have the hon. Gentleman's assurance that in the likelihood of misleading information, from whatever source, being given to tenants in the run-up to any form of ballot, and if it is proved to his satisfaction that it is misleading, he will publicly condemn such literature? Yes or no?

Mr. Soley: No problem. The Minister is right to say that deliberately misleading information has been produced. That has been done at the taxpayer's expense and distributed by the Department of the Environment. I quote from the leaflet, "Government Proposals for Housing: Tenants' Choice"—and that is misleading in its own right:

"Each tenant who was eligible to vote would have to decide whether to vote 'yes', vote 'no' or abstain. It would be very important for you to consider fully and carefully all the arguments for and against a transfer. There would be plenty of time for this. But once you had decided to transfer, you would not be able to change your mind."

Any tenant reading that paragraph would believe that he had three choices—that he could vote yes, no or abstain. That is a lie paid for by the taxpayer.

It is a lie because if one abstains, one is counted as voting yes. The National Consumer Council describes that as inertia selling. I give the Minister this opportunity. He wants me to condemn misleading information; will he join me in condemning that leaflet and say that he will withdraw it, also ensuring that a new leaflet is distributed making it explicit that if a tenant abstains from voting, he will be counted as having voted in favour? Yes or no?

Mr. Trippier: What is said in the leaflet is correct. I am prepared to say on behalf of the Government that if at any stage misleading information is given to tenants, and it can be proved by the hon. Gentleman that it is misleading, certainly I shall either publicly apologise or correct it. I put to the hon. Gentleman again a question that I asked of him a few moments ago. If it can be proved that misleading information, on whatever system, has been given to tenants, will he publicly denounce it?

Mr. Soley: I have said yes to that already—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] Yes, I did. It was on the record before and I shall put it on the record again now.

The Minister asked me to prove the existence of misleading information. Does he accept that the National Consumer Council agrees with me that the system proposed can be described as inertia selling and that it has stated that publicly? Does he also recognise that inertia selling is not only frowned upon but is in certain circumstances, illegal? In view of the offer that the Minister has just put to me, will he acknowledge the proof provided by the National Consumer Council that the leaflet is misleading? Will he withdraw it and replace it with a clear statement that if a tenant abstains, he will be counted as having voted yes? Will the Minister give a direct answer to that question?

Mr. Trippier: I do not accept that that is a lie.

Mr. Soley: But then there is the opinion of the National Consumer Council. Will the Minister pay attention before the civil servants trouble him? He has the whole quote before him. He is on the spot now and knows that he is in difficulty. He says that he wants to get rid of misleading information, but the leaflet does not say that if a tenant abstains, he will be deemed to have voted yes. The National Consumer Council's view is that such is inertia selling. That is the independent proof for which the Minister asked. Will he withdraw the leaflet? Why should the taxpayer pay for a lie put out by the Government?

3.15 pm

Mr. Trippier: As far as I am aware the hon. Gentleman is quoting from the leaflet. It is on the record, he has referred to it and he can read it again in Hansard. On page 8 there is a question:

"Could my home be transferred over my head?"

To which the answer is:

"No. Tenants who voted 'yes', or who abstained, would become tenants of the new landlord."

Mr. Soley: Precisely. That is what the National Consumer—[Interruption.] The Minister is trying very hard to get out of a hole. I make this offer to him. He should go to the National Consumer Council and take its advice on the wording. The Minister's example appears on the following page. The previous page refers to the voting system——

Mr. Trippier: No.

Mr. Soley: Will the Minister stop interrupting and muttering into his chin and listen for a moment. The position is clear. The National Consumer Council, the Association of District Councils, which is controlled by the Conservative party, and every organisation outside the House agree with me that this information is misleading. I say that it is a lie. The Minister knows what is on the page. He is aware that on the following page it states:

"Could my home be transferred over my head?"

To which the answer is, "No". However, it can be transferred in certain circumstances. The real answer to that question is yes and I will deal anon with the circumstances in which that can happen if I have the time. The answer in the document reads:

"No. Tenants who voted 'yes', or who abstained, would become tenants of the new landlord. But nobody who had voted against the transfer would be transferred against their wishes."

The part that matters appears under the heading:

"How would I decide whether I wanted to vote to transfer?"

[Mr. Soley]

We should remember that the other quote is from another part of the document—and that is the part which the National Consumer Council, the Conservative-controlled ADC and everyone else claim is inertia selling. It is misleading and the independent proof comes from the National Consumer Council. The biased proof comes from the Conservative-controlled ADC. Many other independent and political groups say that it is dishonest and paid for by the taxpayer.

The Minister has done enough wriggling now. The answer is clear. He is not prepared to withdraw or alter misleading information.

Mr. Trippier: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Soley: I will give way only if the Minister will put it on the record that he will withdraw the leaflet——

Mr. Trippier rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. One hon. Member at a time.

Mr. Trippier: How on earth could I be expected to put right what is clear to everyone inside and outside the House? It is absolutely clear. The hon. Gentleman is on a very weak point. There is no way in which one could misinterpret the words. I will read them out again so that they are on the record a third time. Why on earth does the hon. Gentleman think we included them?

"Could my home be transferred over my head?

No. Tenants who voted 'yes', or who abstained, would become tenants of the new landlord."

It is crystal clear.

Mr. Soley: I have two points. Let me try to persuade the Minister. First, will the Minister leave this House and ask the National Consumer Council—which I presume he accepts is an independent body—and the Conservative-controlled Association of District Councils whether they accept that the wording is misleading? They say it is and I believe that they are right.

On the next page there is a question:

"Could my home be transferred over my head?"

The leaflet answers emphatically, "No", adding:

"nobody who had voted against the transfer would be transferred against their wishes."

That is incorrect.

Again I challenge the Minister. The leaflet ignores the position of licensees who will be denied any right to vote, including people allocated homes on an estate subject to an allocation, who could well have their homes transferred over their heads without having any say in the matter. It is therefore misleading—[Interruption.] I wish that the Minister would stop getting so agitated and would stay quiet for a minute. Will the Minister say that he understands my point and is prepared to go to the National Consumer Council and the Conservative-controlled ADC and take their advice. Will he do that?

The Minister will not change it. As we have heard, he is not prepared to withdraw misleading information which is in fact a lie, paid for by the taxpayer.

Mr. Trippier rose——

Mr. Soley: I shall not give way to the Minister any more. We have had enough prevarication and avoidance. The implication is clear. If the Minister will not take the advice of the ADC or the MCC, that tells us what we already know. As I said to the Secretary of State the other night, the Minister and the Government have managed to create unnecessary terror and fear among many tenants, particularly elderly people who remember the Rachmans of old. Why should they be placed in that position?

If Conservative-controlled organisations such as the ADC arrange meetings that conclude that the information is misleading, am I to disagree when I know that they are right?

Mr. Trippier rose——

Mr. Soley: No, no, the Minister must sit down. He is not prepared to intervene with an admission that he will not follow the example of independent organisations. It is incredibly dishonest of him to argue, as he has, that tenants will be given a choice. At best, this is a one-way ticket to a private landlord.

When challenged, the Government began defending their action by saying that if someone did not bother to vote it would mean that they did not mind going to a new landlord. That was the previous Minister's defence. Then the Government got into trouble. I gave an example—which, incidentally, would still apply—of a service man fighting in the Falklands. Let us suppose that the Government had imposed this new system. Even with the Lords amendments, if the service man was in the Falklands for three months—unless he found time to stop the battle for a few minutes, consider the available information and then vote—he would come back to find his home transferred over his head.

Does any Conservative Member wish to defend that? The Government are all for defending the troops in the Falklands while they are working to get the Government out of a hole created because they cannot run a defence policy. At the same time the Government are prepared to take homes from service men while they are clearing up the mess.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): I am sure that the fighting forces will be pleased at the first sign of support that they have ever had from the hon. Gentleman. But he is basing his claim on what I would call a Powellite line of argument. The line of argument hangs together, but to accept it we must accept the basis of the argument, which is untrue.

The hon. Gentleman is not being forthcoming or honest about the time that the process will take: it will take a long time. He and his political friends have not been telling the truth about that to council tenants up and down the country.

Mr. Soley: In fact it will not take a very long time, but I understand the hon. Gentleman's point.

This is what we shall do. The next time that General Galtieri invades we shall ask him to make sure that the war lasts a short enough time for troopers to be able to vote. The point is that in this case if tenants abstain they vote "Yes", and in no other democratic system does that apply.

Having spotted that they had got into trouble, the Government then tried another line of defence. They said, "It is all right, you can stay with the council." That again was inertia selling: they did not tell tenants that they would have to pay the rent set by the new landlord, despite remaining council tenants. They did not tell them that they would have to pay all the service charges set by the new landlord. They did not say what would happen if a local authority had not transferred all its stock, and wanted to transfer that as well. And the Government wonder why tenants are afraid.

The draft industrial relations code about which the Government are now talking insists on a much larger vote even on a work-to-rule. Workers do not even have to go on strike for the Government to want a 70 per cent. vote. It is different then, is it not? What about abstentions in those circumstances?

The Secretary of State is determined to push tenants into the private sector. The Peat Marwick report says so. The previous Minister also said so in Parliament. The Secretary of State says that he wants all local authorities to give up council housing. However, the Government have seriously misjudged the popularity of councils and councillors. Although tenants often rightly criticise their councils and councillors, they know that they can elect them. They also know that they cannot elect or remove a Mr. van Hoogstraten or a Mr. Rachman. That is what they are afraid of. That is why the Government have whipped up so much fear and hysteria.

Such an important debate should never have taken place under a guillotine motion, but what I say in this Chamber is not nearly so important as what tenants, both private and public, feel about the Bill. At the end of the day they will decide. The Government have politicised tenants in a way that they could never have dreamt was possible.

Mr. Trippier: I think that I can be forgiven for smiling wryly——

Mr. Speaker: The Minister needs the leave of the House to speak again.

Mr. Soley: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Minister spoke for a long time and persistently interrupted me while I spoke. A number of Back Benchers on both sides of the House would like the opportunity to speak.

Mr. Speaker: Does the Minister have the leave of the House to speak again?

Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The voting system that the Government are trying to railroad through Parliament is far worse than the legislation on which it is allegedly based, the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980. Under this system, it is clear that if tenants do not vote it will be presumed that they are in favour of being transferred to a private landlord. The non-vote will be counted as a "Yes" vote. I have asked the Secretary of State questions and I have given him a list of those that so far remain unanswered.

Even the Prime Minister did not realise the draconian nature of the measure that her Ministers in the Department of the Environment were proposing. She said on 23 June this year that if the majority of tenants agree, their tenancies can be transferred. I told the right hon. Lady that that was not what the Bill said. She had no answer. Eventually, after two letters to Downing street, she replied in the middle of August. She said:

"Tenants who choose to transfer, whether they express that choice explicitly by a vote in favour, or implicitly through informed acquiescence, will indeed have agreed to the transfer."

From the highest authority it is now abundantly clear that, according to the Government, the majority who must agree is made up not just of those who vote "Yes"—and there need be none of those—but of those who do not vote at all. The Prime Minister claims that she is the senior democratic statesperson in the world, but she now says that voting does not matter: that what matters is that views should be expressed "implicitly through informed acquiescence."

What is it that makes a system of voting by silence, by informed acquiescence, better than a system under which people are asked whether they want to vote "Yes' or "No"? The Government have made it clear in the case of trade unions that even a vote of 70 per cent. in favour may not be adequately representative.

I am a lawyer. It is a principle of English law that silence normally means no. Halsbury's "Laws of England" make it clear that one cannot bind an offeree as an offeror against the latter's will by expressly stipulating that if the offeree does nothing he will be bound to a contract. Does the voting system that the Bill opposes break the principle that silence in law normally means no? If it does not break that principle the Minister and the Secretary of State have not yet explained why it does not do so.

A distorted, biased voting system is the plainest evidence that the Government are not concerned about tenants' choice. Their primary purpose in introducing the Bill is not that tenants should choose, but that council estates should be demunicipalised and privatised. Tenants are seen as a barrier to the Government's will. The role of tenants is to see whether they can get enough people together to stop the Government's steamroller rolling on. The Bill is not concerned with tenants' choice, tenant initiative or tenant freedom. Today is a sad day. The Bill represented an opportunity to maximise freedom for tenants to get together to improve their position. Instead, the bill is the product of a Government who put theories about private being good and public being bad before the minds, hearts and aspirations of people throughout the land.

We would have chosen to vote on amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 111, but because of procedural technicalities that will not be possible. Because we have no choice as a result of a guillotine being in place, we shall vote on Lords amendment No. 96. We shall oppose the Government to show that some hon. Members still understand democracy. We will show them that some hon. Members will fight for democracy and will resist democracy being perverted by a Government who are in power on a minority of votes and who clearly do not understand what democracy is about.

When the House votes it decides by a majority, but when tenants vote they will have a fixed system. The sooner the Government learn that they cannot fool tenants, the better it will be.

3.30 pm

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: I have some sympathy with the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) in wanting some answers from the Minister. The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) said that certain things should be on the record. It should be on the record, therefore, that the Minister is unable to answer this debate because the Labour party refuses to allow him to speak again.

Mr. Trippier: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for the courtesy that he has extended to me, which is in stark contrast to that which was not extended to me by the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley). Does he agree that the by-election result in Govan is relevant to what we are discussing today as we are giving——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have only three more minutes, and I do not think that we should go into that subject.

Mr. Hughes: I agree with the thrust of what my hon. Friend said. We have such strong opposition to this group of amendments because councils, especially Labour-controlled councils, will in future be exposed to competition and the prospect of another landlord taking over their estates.

The hon. Member for Hammersmith is keen to tell us that the Bill is already a failure, but it is not yet on the statute book. He tells us that it cannot work in various respects. He should give it some time to operate before he comes to such a conclusion.

Mr. Winnick: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: Certainly not.

The London borough of Lambeth has already said that it must get its act together and improve its services to its tenants or they will vote with their feet. That is what the Labour party is so afraid of. It recognises that tenants will vote with their feet and——

Mr. Paul Boateng (Brent, South) rose——

Mr. Winnick rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. Member does not wish to give way, hon. Members must resume their seats.

Mr. Hughes: Opposition Members realise that once council tenants know that they can get away from the slum landlords that Labour councils represent, they will take that opportunity.

Mr. Soley rose——

Mr. Hughes: I do not have any time. For the hon. Member for Hammersmith——

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would you not say that it is a gross abuse of the House for an hon. Member who voted in favour of the guillotine motion and who has not been here most of the afternoon to try to——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order. Mr. Hughes.

Mr. Hughes: I think that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) needs an eyesight test.

Mr. Soley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: No, I am not giving way.

The reality is that the Labour party does not like this measure. That is understandable because it is going to lose control of its estates.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: I am certainly not giving way.

I wish to put on record—as this is an afternoon for getting things on the record—that during the process of consultation——

It being six hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion relating to the School Boards (Scotland) Bill and Housing Bill (Allocation of Time), MR. SPEAKER proceeded, pursuant to the order this day, to put the Question already proposed from the Chair.

Mr. Simon Hughes: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Because of the guillotine, we have obviously had a limited number of opportunities to vote. Two amendments were proposed to the Lords amendments by the Opposition, and those were dealt with in Divisions Nos. 482 and 483. The results were Ayes 68, Noes 169 and Ayes 65, Noes 159, respectively. May we assume that, with the Government's policy in the Housing Bill, as in both cases the Noes did not constitute a majority of hon. Members in this House, the Ayes have it and will continue to have it in future?

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE

Resolved,

That this House do meet on Tuesday 15th November at half-past Nine o'clock.—[Mr. David Hunt.]

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(5) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.)

CRIMINAL LAW

That the draft Criminal Justice Act 1988 (Offensive Weapons) Order 1988, which was laid before this House on 19th October 1988, be approved.—[Mr. David Hunt.]

India (Sikh Community)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. David Hunt.]

4.25 pm

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): I wish to take this opportunity to bring to the attention of the House the plight of the Sikhs in India, an issue which, for some reason best known to the Government, has not been raised in the Chamber before. That omission by the Government could well be due to embarrassment, to say the least.

Just before independence the Constituent Assembly in India agreed a package of proposals called the Objectives Resolution which guaranteed the autonomous status of Sikhs in the Punjab. The British Government accepted the validity of the Objectives Resolution and, on the strength of that, granted India independence in 1947. Unfortunately, with the coming of independence, the guarantees given to the Sikhs were not honoured and the constitution was changed to reflect the interests of the Hindu majority.

Since then the British Government have said and done nothing over the years to correct that position, despite their direct involvement. We have continued to give aid to India as though money had gone out of fashion. Between 1978 and 1987 Britain has given about £1·6 billion in overseas aid and India has topped the league table of recipients in each of the past 10 years.

There are about 8,000 Sikhs in my constituency, the vast majority of whom are decent, hard-working people who want to live in peace with their neighbours and make a positive contribution to the community. Judging from reports that I have read of debates in the American Congress, the same is true of Sikhs who reside in the United States and of Sikhs the world over.

In India the Sikhs constitute about 2 per cent. of the population, but produce a quarter of India's gross national product. Sikh farmers account for 73 per cent. of wheat and 48 per cent. of rice produced in India. Many Sikhs have made a valuable contribution to the professions, to the military and to the Government of India.

I do not have to remind the House, especially at this time of the year, of the contribution that Sikhs have made in two world wars to defend the freedom and security of the United Kingdom. The list of decorations won by Sikh soldiers is a credit to their loyalty and devotion to our country.

Given that background, one would have thought that the Indian Government would have recognised the contribution that the Sikh community makes to the world and would treat it with the respect and understanding that it so richly deserves. Unfortunately, the opposite is the case.

While Rajiv Gandhi, the so-called leader of the world's largest democracy, struts like a bloated peacock on the international stage, condemning South Africa for its alleged abuse of human rights, he has been responsible for the murder, torture and imprisonment without trial of thousands of his fellow countrymen and he has left a great many others fearing for their lives.

Rajiv Gandhi is aware of and supports unlawful killing and widespread torture by his own security forces and the police. He is aware of and supports arbitrary arrests and prolonged detention without trial. He is also aware of and supports extrajudicial execution, which is unlawful killing by the Government or Government-backed forces. Rajiv Gandhi is aware of and supports the killing of political activists as a result of fake encounters staged by the Indian police. The most widespread reports of these killings and other atrocities come from the Punjab, one of the regions where the security forces enjoy immunity from prosecution when exercising shoot-on-sight powers—powers given to them by the Indian Government led by Rajiv Ghandi.

According to an Amnesty International report, of August this year, more than 70 young Sikhs were killed by police in fake encounters in Amritsar in the month of August last year. The Indian Government have done nothing to investigate those claims; they have simply issued blanket denials and ignored any representations made to them.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Dicks: No, I will not. We all know of my hon. Friend's support for the Indian Government and their behaviour.

Mr. Jessel: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for an hon. Member to attack the head of a very friendly Commonwealth country in such a manner without giving other hon. Members the right to intervene?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. It is contrary to our conventions to attack the head of a friendly state unreasonably, but equally no hon. Member has an obligation to give way to another.

Mr. Dicks: I shall not give way to my hon. Friend, because he supports the Indian Government and Rajiv Gandhi and the atrocities committed by the Indian Government in the name of so-called democracy.

Dozens of prisoners are reported to have died after torture in police stations, according to the review. Those most at risk of torture are political prisoners, many of whom are Sikhs. The most persistent allegations of torture of political prisoners have come from the Punjab, the home of the Sikhs, where prisoners have said that they were hung from ceilings with their hands tied behind their backs, beaten and given electric shocks. According to the Amnesty International report, those responsible for torturing prisoners are almost never brought to justice: they are allowed to continue along their evil path uninterrupted by the so-called democratic regime.

Amnesty International has also highlighted the fact that hundreds of political detainees have been held for four years under special security laws which lack basic legal safeguards. As would be expected, they include more than 300 Sikhs held in Jodhpur prison since June 1984, many of whom have been detained for non-violently expressing their political feelings.

How dare Rajiv Gandhi lecture the South African Government on human rights when evidence from Amnesty International and information received in this country by Sikhs from friends and relatives living in the Punjab show that without doubt blacks in South Africa are far more likely to have their human rights recognised by their Government than are the Sikhs by theirs. The Sikhs have to endure considerable suffering and injustice, and they do so with great dignity and courage.

The Indian Government claim that Sikh violence has been taking place in the Punjab area, and around the Golden Temple in particular. They have produced no evidence to substantiate that claim, and as entry to the Punjab is severely limited many people, including myself, doubt the truth of those claims. Most of the Sikhs with whom I have come in contact, both here and abroad, are seeking a peaceful solution to the Punjab problem and a recognition of their position by the Indian Government.

Those interested in democracy should be pressing the Indian Government to behave in a reasonable and responsible manner, while at the same time bringing pressure to bear on them to recognise the human rights violations that have taken place. Unfortunately the British Government are taking a different view. They are turning a deaf ear to the cries of Sikhs in Britain who are concerned about the suffering of friends and relatives in India, and at the same time they are turning a blind eye to reports from organisations such as Amnesty International, which provide clear evidence of that suffering.

On 31 October this year I asked my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary whether he would make a statement on a recent report by Amnesty International entitled, "India—A review of Human Rights Violations." His answer was no. On the same day I asked him what representations he had made to the Indian Government about the alleged violation of basic human rights, as reported by Amnesty International. Again, his answer was no. I also asked whether he would publish the evidence on which he based his view that the judicial system in India protected the rights of minority groups such as the Sikhs. His answer was no. On the same day I asked whether he would receive a deputation from the Sikh community in Britain to discuss the allegation of violations of human rights in India. Again, his answer was no.

Finally, I asked whether the Foreign Secretary would use his good offices to persuade the Indian Government to grant me an entry visa to visit the Punjab and make contact with relatives and friends of my constituents. He replied that it was a matter for the Indian authorities.

Let me also bring to light an immigration case that is interesting to say the least. Until March of last year a Mr. Gunga Singh Dhillon, a Sikh with an American passport, had been allowed unfettered entry to the United Kingdom. However, when he arrived in August of last year he was prevented from entering the United Kingdom and sent back on the next available plane without being allowed access to a telephone to contact his solicitor or a Member of Parliament.

On making inquiries on behalf of Mr. Dhillon, I was told that he had been excluded for reasons of national security. I then asked what had happened between March 1987 and August 1987 to make the Home Office take this action. I was told that, even as the Member of Parliament involved, I could not be given that information. I am aware, however, as is Mr. Dhillon, that the Indian Government had brought pressure to bear on the British Government to ensure that Mr. Dhillon was not allowed to enter the United Kingdom. This gentleman—well respected in America and known to both Republican and Democrat politicians on Capitol Hill—was denied entry to this country to see his family, at the whim of the corrupt Indian Government.

On the evidence of the replies that I have received from the Foreign Office and the attitude towards Mr. Dhillon by the Home Office, it seems to me that the British Government are taking a blinkered, not to say hypocritical, view of the situation in India. Our Government have never been slow publicly to condemn South Africa whenever an allegation of the violation of human rights has been made. They have intervened personally in the case of a group of black Africans, known as the Sharpeville Six, who are awaiting execution for crimes committed in the Republic. The Government, without any evidence being available at all, were quick to condemn the Iraqi Government for allegedly gassing the Kurds living in the north of Iraq. Even the Prime Minister, on her recent visit to Poland, spoke out in favour of freedom and justice for the people of that country.

Why, therefore, when it comes to India, does the British Government's attitude change dramatically? The evidence suggesting widespread violation of human rights is overwhelming. The man who is responsible for implementing that policy, the Minister of Home Affairs, Mr. Buta Singh, sought a bribe from me when I last visited India before he would respond to my request for information regarding a constituent of mine, Mrs. Kuldip Kaur, who had been wrongly imprisoned in India. That man asked me face to face for a bribe before he would take any action on my behalf.

Mr. Jessel: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for a Member of Parliament to take advantage of parliamentary privilege to accuse a Minister in the Government of a friendly Commonwealth country of a corrupt act when that Minister is not here to reply for himself? Is that not grossly improper and an abuse of the House, and is it in order?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I doubt whether it is out of order, but it is hardly consistent with the conventions of the House. I ask the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) to bear in mind that the 20th edition of "Erskine May," on page 431, states:

> "Opprobrious reflections must not be cast in debate on sovereigns and rulers over, or governments of, independent Commonwealth territories or countries in amity with Her Majesty, or their representatives in this country."

I hope that the hon. Member will bear that reference in mind.

Mr. Dicks: I thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for that ruling, but I remind you that when I made the same claim in December 1986 during an Adjournment debate I was neither stopped nor corrected. I made the same allegation, because it is true. I was there; I know that it happened. Mr. Buta Singh then had the opportunity to take whatever action he wanted against me, but he did not do so. My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) bleeds too much for the Indian Government. He should be more objective and take off his blinkers. He would then understand and appreciate the problems that the Sikhs face in India.

There is overwhelming evidence from many quarters that the Sikhs are being persecuted by the Indian Government in general and particularly at the hands of the Prime Minister, Rajiv Gandhi. Only a few days ago his Minister of Commerce called at No. 10 Downing street. Among other things, I understand that he asked whether the policy that is about to be introduced to control the appearance on television of IRA terrorists could be extended to include members of the Sikh community living in Britain.

Given that background, there can be no justification whatsoever for the British Government's continued support of the Indian regime. If they are to continue to comment on human rights issues around the world, they have a duty loudly and clearly to condemn the abuse of human rights and the persecution of the Sikhs in India. A foreign policy based on selectivity, hypocrisy and double standards may be good for the Foreign Office, but it is not good for the British Government or the British people. It will be seen by many as yet another example of the Foreign Office putting its own interests before those of Britain.

It is not with any pleasure that I speak on this subject today. I do so because I believe that Sikh people in India are being persecuted by the Government there. The Sikh community in my constituency and elsewhere in the United Kingdom are worried about relatives and friends in India. They can get no access to them, and their Members of Parliament cannot in most cases.

The fault lies at the feet of the British Government of 1947 who accepted the word of the Constituent Assembly that Sikhs would be protected in the new constitution. The moment that that constitution came into operation after independence, the Indian Government ignored their obligations regarding Sikhs and their autonomy in their own state of the Punjab and rewrote the constitution to protect the interests of the Hindu majority. That was an appalling thing to do, but the British Government sat back and made no protest.

It is surprising that I have to raise this important matter on the Adjournment because the British Government—of the party to which I belong—have flatly refused to answer my questions fully and frankly. They have flatly refused to condemn the Indian Government, although they condemn the South African Government. The Government have also refused to bring the issue before the House and the British people. The Government meet and greet members of the Indian Government all over the place. They recognise the so-called status of Rajiv Gandhi as an international politician of repute—a man who goes with a begging bowl looking for aid wherever he can get it, but who has given the Sandinista regime $10·4 million of aid. How can a country which demands aid from us afford to give aid to an evil Left-wing regime in Central America? We must have answers to these questions.

The Indian security services operate within the Indian community in Britain, but the Government are doing nothing about it. The Sikhs in Britain need their families and friends in India to be protected. They need Government support in their effort to get justice in the Punjab. They are not all terrorists, if, indeed, any of them are. Most are decent, hard-working people who love this country. Indeed, they love the British Government—the Tory Government, in particular—and have a high regard for our Prime Minister. Why are their views not heard? Why do the Government not respond to them? Why do we continue to bend the knee to this evil Government in India?

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. William Waldegrave): My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) has spoken in his characteristically robust way and I have listened to him with attention. The Foreign Office has a broad back. It can even put up with the criticisms of Mr.

David Hart in The Times—that great commentator on international affairs—but I was a little struck with my hon. Friend's accusation of hypocrisy. I know that my hon. Friend takes a robust view about, for example, terrorism in other forms, and quite rightly. He is robust about terrorism in Northern Ireland. I believe that he is robust in his belief that the Iraqi Government have a legitimate interest in putting down a minority rebellion among Kurdish resistance fighters or terrorists—it depends which side of the argument one takes—in northern Iraq.

The perspective with which one approaches these issues is crucial. My hon. Friend rightly said that our relationship with India is old and close and that there is a burden of history on it. It is reinforced by many contacts, the greatest of which is the presence in the United Kingdom of 800,000 people of Indian origin who have made their home here. Among them, the Sikhs are the largest group and total more than 300,000. I entirely agree with my hon. Friend that they have made a valued contribution to many areas of our national life. They are hard-working, loyal and excellent people. I have some in my constituency and share my hon. Friend's view. I share their concern about the terrible and tragic events that are taking place in the Punjab.

We should, however, remember one fact. Sikhs have played a distinguished part in the life of independent India and have continued to be represented, I believe, out of all proportion to their number, among India's leading politicians, public servants, soldiers and business men. As my hon. Friend said, the vast majority of Indian Sikhs are law-abiding citizens. But a small minority, which had never commanded a majority of democratic votes in the Sikhs' home state of the Punjab, has sought to obtain by violence what it clearly could not hope to secure by a democratic campaign—the dismemberment of the state of India.

The Sikh population represents about 60 per cent. of the population in the Punjab and is scattered elsewhere thoughout India. As my hon. Friend said, the Punjab is the richest state in India, thanks to the energy of its—mainly Sikh—farmers, the extensive irrigation works undertaken originally under British administration and the "green revolution" achieved more recently.

So it is not true to say—and my hon. Friend did not say it in his speech, but it has been said—that Sikhs in general are underprivileged or second-class citizens. However there are those in the Sikh community who have become very concerned that the processes of modernisation have damaged the traditional Sikh way of life. They have expressed concern—which may be legitimate—over access to water and other farming resources. There is also the grievance about the promise made in the 1960s to give the Punjab exclusive control of Chandigarh—the new city built when Punjab was divided in 1966. For all I know—and my hon. Friend is far more learned than I am in these matters—they may be legitimate grievances, but I know that he will want to join me in urging that they must be pursued by legitimate democratic means.

The main Sikh political party—Akali Dal—has long pursued some of those concerns with legitimate campaigning. That is fair enough, but my hon. Friend recognises that there is a minority who have taken the other line and have pursued the route of violence. Indeed, the casualties have been very great. I am advised that Sikh extremists have killed more than 2,400 people so far this year and more are dying every day. There have been indiscriminate bomb attacks and a wide variety of the terrorist techniques with which I fear we are all too familiar in the modern world. There have been further attacks in recent weeks. Bombs killed 21 people on 1 November, and another bomb attack on 4 November left 27 dead.

The Indian Government have tried to respond to those activities. And I am sure that my hon. Friend, faced with the much smaller scale of terrorism in Northern Ireland does not doubt that the British Government are right to pursue vigorous means to supress that terrorism.

Clearly, the allegations to which my hon. Friend has referred, which have come from Amnesty International and from representatives of some of the Sikh community, must be properly investigated. I challenge what my hon. Friend said. Whenever we believe and have evidence that human rights are at risk, the British Government say so, but we must try to judge in our relationships with other countries which other countries have a system of law. In its most recent report, Amnesty International refers to the fact that there are legal remedies in India, although they may be slow—as they may be slow in Britain and in other countries where the rule of law is in place—there have been cases where allegations have been properly investigated and action taken against the perpetrators. That must colour our judgment of the situation. There is democratic Government and the rule of law in India, so the situation there is quite different from that in many countries in the world where neither exists.

The activities of the terrorists are not confined to India. In October 1985 a plot was uncovered to assassinate Prime Minister Gandhi during his visit to the United Kingdom. A moderate Sikh leader, Tarsem Singh Tor, was murdered in January 1986; another, Darshan Das Vasdev, was shot dead in November 1987; and three other attempts were made or plotted on the lives of leading Sikh moderates. In all those cases, those responsible have been tried and convicted or charges have been brought. It is intolerable that people living in this country and enjoying the liberties of British citizenship should abuse those liberties to promote a violent and anti-democratic threat to India.

Faced by the fact that we share a terrorist threat against our people, we have been closely in touch with the Indian Government during the past few days to find ways of strengthening our co-operation to combat the activities of extremists within the framework of our laws. We continue actively to look for ways of working still more closely together. That co-operation is something to which the Indian Government understandably attach great importance, and it has assumed a central place in the political relations between the two countries.

But legal or administrative measures are not what will, in the end, defeat extremism in India or anywhere else. What is necessary is that the extremists should be shunned by society at large and should no longer be able to call on the tolerance or passive acquiescence of people who do not share their extremist beliefs. I agree with my hon. Friend that the vast majority of Sikhs in Britain are moderate, decent people.

The extremists number perhaps a few hundred at most, but organisations are active in the Sikh community whose main purpose is to offer help and support to the extremists in India. Those organisations seem to be able to draw on the moral and financial support of many Sikhs in Britain who do not share that objective. I call on all decent Sikhs in Britain to ensure, before they give their support to an organisation, that they are clear about its intention. We have had to fight a similar campaign for many years among decent Americans of Irish extraction, who have often fallen into the same trap in relation to the provisional IRA. Unless they are perfectly certain that the organisation in question has no truck with violence, they should have nothing to do with it, and those who give even the most passive support to extremism must bear some share of the condemnation for the misery of the Punjab and the suffering which that conflict has brought to India as a whole.

I have already implied that it is perfectly possible that in a bitter terrorist war the servants of any Government of any country may from time to time abuse their authority. What matters is the action that that Government take to bring to book those who have broken the law. In response to earlier reports by Amnesty, the Government of India said that specific charges of alleged violence are thoroughly investigated, and where such charges have been proved exemplary action has been taken against the guilty.

India is a democratic and independent state. Its constitution formally prohibits discrimination on grounds of religion or race. Its people are subject to the rule of law —a rule of law to which Britain contributed more than a little. Remedies are available within the Indian legal system, as Amnesty itself acknowledges. In its latest report, Amnesty says:

"National and local bodies in India, including the Supreme Court and high courts in the various states, do important work to protect . . . fundamental rights."

Amnesty also recognises the important role played by civil liberties groups and by India's free press.

Mr. Dicks: Will my hon. Friend bear in mind the case of my constituent, Mrs. Kuldip Kaur, who two years ago was imprisoned on no grounds for eight months, and was then released and told that she was completely innocent. I have written twice to and telephoned the Indian High Commission asking whether it will consider paying compensation to that lady, who has lost eight months of her life and is now suffering mentally, as is her family. Will he take up this case with the Indian Government, bearing in mind what he said about the Indian judicial system, to see whether the system will ensure that that lady is recompensed? She has a piece of paper from the Indian Government saying, "We have made a mistake; you are completely innocent", but it took them eight months to reach that decision and she has lost eight months of her life.

Mr. Waldegrave: Off the cuff at the Dispatch Box, and without examining the case, I cannot say that I will take it up. I shall certainly consider the case and write to my hon. Friend about it. His representations have helped to produce justice in that case, which to some extent proves that my comments have some validity—that the normal open lobbying procedures with which we are familiar can have some effect.

My hon. Friend has drawn attention to alleged violations of human rights in India. We make clear, in public and in private, our views on the need for all Governments to respect human rights.

I return briefly to the original question asked by my hon. Friend: what is the effect on Anglo-British relations of the situation of Sikhs in India?

Mr. Jessel: On that point about relations between Britain and India, is my hon. Friend aware that the vast majority of hon. Members on both sides of the House greatly cherish the historic ties of friendship between Britain and India——

Mr. Dicks: How does my hon. Friend know that?

Mr. Jessel: —and that this was shown on Wednesday when 45 Members of the House attended a function of the Indo-British parliamentary group at India house? That is the view of most hon. Members. My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) is right over the top.

Mr. Dicks: They all had a free curry at the Indian Government's expense.

Mr. Waldegrave: Against the background of tragedy and terrorism, it behoves us all not to do anything to encourage the spilling over of those bitternesses in Britain. On the contrary, we should argue for moderation and for a democratic means of solving the problems which may have a legitimate basis but which must be solved through the ballot box if this House is to remain true to its tradition. Nothing that we say or do today should give the least encouragement or quarter to those who follow the route of violence.

I have listened with care and interest to what my hon. Friend said, and I urge him to work with us to bring this tragedy to an end.

Oral Answers to Questions

SOCIAL SECURITY

Unemployed and Low-paid (Support)

1. Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what he estimates will be the combined effect of the various changes in Government support for unemployed and low-paid people, including the impact of the freeze on child benefit and all other relevant decisions; and what he estimates will be the net effect in cash terms and percentage terms on the weekly income of a couple with two children with (a) no earner in the family, (b) a single earner on £100 per week and (c) a single earner on £150 a week.

The Minister of State, Department of Social Security (Mr. Nicholas Scott): Next April's uprating directs substantial extra help towards lower income families. All children's personal allowances in income support, family credit and housing benefit are being increased by 50p over and above the amount needed to maintain their real value. Higher children's allowances in family credit and housing benefit will maintain the cash gap and encourage people with families to work rather than be unemployed. However, it will not be possible to say what the overall effects on families will be until income tax rates and allowances, and changes in real earnings, are known in April.

Mr. Michael: In the light of that obscure reply, will the Minister consider the position of an unemployed family on moderate rent and rates, with two children aged 14 and 16 years? Does he agree that if the father moves from being unemployed to a job paying £100 a week he will be less than £7 better off in terms of money in his pocket, with the greatly increased costs attached to employment such as travel to work? If the man moves to employment that pays £150 a week, will the Minister accept that he will be only £8 a week better off as a result, with further losses in benefit? Does the Minister agree that there is a worsening poverty trap? The Chancellor of the Exchequer is throwing money at the rich, but he is doing nothing for the poor —[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman's long supplementary question is unfair on those who will follow him. I appeal to hon. Members to ask short questions.

Mr. Scott: A number of factors, not least the growth in earnings, could have a profound effect on the net position in which people find themselves next April. Assuming an uprating in line with inflation, my calculations for the hon. Gentleman's two examples are £10 and £20 respectively, not £7 and £8. The essential feature is that in both instances the man would be better off by working. Under the system over which the Opposition presided, he could well have been worse off.

Mr. Jack: Does my hon. Friend agree that the proposed computerisation of social security offices will do much to ensure that benefit claimants receive the benefits to which they are entitled, and will deal with much of the criticism of the service that is offered by local offices?

Mr. Scott: We have already taken some important steps to improve the service that we deliver to the public from local offices. We are determined to continue with the improvement. We are introducing the largest computerisation programme that there has ever been in Western Europe. When that has been completed in 1991, I am sure that we shall be in an even better position than we are now.

Mr. Kirkwood: Does the Minister accept that the changes in April heralded an increased emphasis on targeting? Has he had a chance to study the report of the Citizens Advice Bureaux, in which it is stated that 82 per cent. of claimants were worse off after the April changes? Does that not cast doubt on the Government's policy of increasing the targeting of benefits?

Mr. Scott: I have the highest regard for much of the CAB's work, but I believe that the report was flawed in two important respects. The conculsions that were drawn from it were even more flawed. First, the work was carried out only one month after the new benefits were introduced in April 1987. Secondly, it would not be surprising if claimants were unsure about their entitlement under the new system, because it had been introduced so recently. The sample consisted of people who were sufficiently worried to go into the citizens advice bureaux. So it was not typical of the broad mass of income support recipients.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: Is my hon. Friend able to make any comparison between this Government's record in that area and that of the Labour Government run by the then right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth?

Mr. Scott: The most important point is that our predecessors in the Department of Health and Social Security and the Government as a whole had the courage to tackle the ramshackle structure of supplementary benefits and associated benefits and to replace them with something that is simpler and easier for staff to administer and for claimants to understand and which removes the worst aspects of the poverty and unemployment traps.

Mr. Flynn: Following the Minister's non-answer to the question raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael), does he agree that recent changes have increased the size of the poverty trap, leaving millions of families floundering on low incomes with their escape route cut off? Does he agree also that someone may still lose more than £1 in income by earning an extra £1? Some families need to earn an extra £90 a week to increase their income by a mere £18. What does the Minister intend to do to help those families? What lifeline will he offer them when he has needlessly added the humiliation of poverty to those who already suffer the daily insult of low pay and unemployment?

Mr. Scott: I warmly welcome the hon. Member to his new responsibilities and look forward to crossing swords with him in the future. We have deliberately put an extra £70 million into uprating to provide special help for low income families whether on income support or in work. As I said earlier, it is all very well to claim that we still suffer from some aspects of the poverty and unemployment traps as a result of the need to withdraw benefit as earnings increase. Not many people would disagree with that. However, the Labour party in government presided over a system in which gross imcomes could double before there was any net increase in take-home pay. We have abolished that.

Brent Offices

2. Mr. Boateng: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he has any proposals to close social security offices in Brent.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Peter Lloyd): No, Sir, but one may move to better premises in the district.

Mr. Boateng: When will a final decision be taken about the relocation of offices in my constituency? Does the Minister recognise that the freeze on staff pending relocation is causing a deterioration in the service at existing offices in Brent? Will he undertake to consult local advice agencies, for example, the citizens advice bureau, law centres and the housing advice centre, before taking a final decision?

Mr. Lloyd: We intend to take a decision very shortly. I realise that the delay in taking the decision does not help the local staff situation, particularly as the problem that led to the decision to relocate stemmed from the difficulty of retaining and recruiting staff, which meant that services to claimants have not been as good as they should be. As it is a matter of improving services to the constituents of the hon. Member and others in Brent and inner London, we are sure that the agencies to which he referred will be pleased with the result in due course.

Family Credit

3. Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are the latest figures for the take-up of family credit.

The Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. John Moore): Since the start of the new scheme, just over 400,000 claims have been received. At the end of October over 248,000 families were receiving family credit. In addition, on the latest information available, 56,400 claims were on hand, but in 36,4000 of those we were waiting for replies to inquiries to employers or to the claimant.

Mr. Field: By what date do the Government expect to achieve their 60 per cent. target take-up of family credit? Given that child benefit was frozen to target resources on the poorest, if that modest target is not met by then, will the Government reconsider their strategy?

Mr. Moore: The figure is still nothing like as good as I should like it to be. It is nearly 40 per cent., and there has been a slower start than we expected. I expect to see encouragement from hon. Members on both sides of the House, because I remember that Opposition Members thought, sensibly, that family credit was an intelligent way in which to help families.

The hon. Gentleman will join me in being delighted that although the take-up rate is not what we should like it to be—I shall not give a date because we are about to introduce new take-up campaigns—the amount of money being expended, which is of relevance to the issue, is in excess of the £400 million that we thought might be available in this area; in other words, more than double what was going to family income supplement.

Mr. Couchman: As an employer of many part-time staff who are not on generous incomes, I am not aware of ever having been informed either of the former FIS or of family credit. Will my right hon. Friend, when he sends out national insurance notification in the next few weeks, inform employers accordingly, so that they may advise their staff of this benefit's availability?

Mr. Moore: My hon. Friend makes a very good point. I had thought that the Department of Employment carried out a programme during the latter part of the summer to attract the attention of employers, both large and small, to the opportunities that exist and the current position. We are considering this area, as I clearly said in the uprating statement, and repeat now. Those who would like to see people in low-paid work should note the sensible remarks of the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) in an article in The Guardian on 9 November when he said that the objective of welfare policy for the 1990s should be to reward people on low incomes who try to improve their own and their family's lot. Any extra activities in that area from all parts of the House that can enhance that objective will be welcome.

Mr. Andrew MacKay: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the disturbingly low level of family credit take-up could be improved if one could ensure that the mother was more often the recipient?

Mr. Moore: I tried reminding the House in the uprating statement, and I re-checked before questions today, that the mother is the person able and liable to claim family credit. Several right hon. and hon. Members seem to be in some doubt about this point, but that is provided for under the Social Security (Claims and Payments) Amendment Regulations 1987, under section 1(1)A of the Social Security Act 1986. It is clear that only in exceptional circumstances will family credit go to the father rather than to the mother.

Mr. Wigley: Is the Secretary of State aware of the difficulties faced by the self-employed and those on low pay—especially those working in small-scale agriculture or tourism? Is the Minister aware also of the requirements imposed by local offices for applicants to produce audited accounts for the six months prior to the date of their claim? Is he further aware of the tremendous bureaucratic imposition and cost that that requirement involves? Has the right hon. Gentleman yet found a way of streamlining the procedure so payments may be made more quickly to people in need?

Mr. Moore: The hon. Gentleman makes a sensible contribution, because we all have the same purpose in mind. There has been some debate on the point that he raises. The intention was to improve the opportunity for such employers. Consultations are under way and I hope that the very point that the hon. Gentleman makes will be taken out of debate, because I want to see take-up encouraged rather than discouraged.

Mr. Robin Cook: Has the Secretary of State forgotten that there is a long history of means-tested benefits failing to hit their targets? Does he recollect that family income supplement never reached more than half those entitled to receive it? Now that family credit has failed to achieve even that pass mark, why does the right hon. Gentleman not accept that if he really wants to target help on mothers, the only guaranteed way of doing so is through a decent level of child benefit?

Mr. Moore: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will consider more carefully at this early stage of family credit the proposition that seems to be creating difficulty for his party. I refer to the moral difficulty in which he might find himself in trying to disagree in the long term with serious attempts to help specifically families in work on low incomes. I would have thought that ours was the sensible way to address national policy, whereas in an interesting magazine interview that I read in the latter part of the summer, the hon. Gentleman makes it clear—[Interruption.] I know that the hon. Member has difficulty with some of his hon. Friends below the Gangway, but I shall endeavour to answer the specific points that he made in a long article in Poverty, in referring to the nature of what I thought was his party's views on the subject:

> "The objectives of the Government in redefining the welfare benefit system away from the concept of a national social insurance which protects everybody into a system which helps only those who, as they put it, are in need . . . What we propose is the precise reverse."

That does not seem to be the view of the hon. Member for Birkenhead. When the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) is less confused, I hope that he will join me in trying to target additional help more effectively through family credit.

Personal Pensions

5. Mr. Summerson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what special financial incentives are being provided for people to take out personal pensions.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: People who take out personal pensions before April 1989 can backdate membership to April 1987. They are also eligible from that date for the special 2 per cent. incentive payment, which is payable until April 1993.

Mr. Summerson: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply and congratulate him on his first appearance on the Front Bench. How many people have opted to take out personal pensions since the new arrangements were introduced earlier this year?

Mr. Lloyd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I can tell him that 110 schemes have been set up and that 102,000 individuals have taken out personal pensions. If my hon. Friend would like to look at the Financial Times of 31 October, he will see a report which says that the figure > "from a straw poll of life companies, shows . . . the personal pensions market was extremely buoyant in its first three months."

Mrs. Mahon: Does the Minister agree that, given the small numbers on state earnings-related pensions receiving more than £15 a week—33,000 men and just over 4,000 women—the decision to reduce that entitlement in 1999 should be reversed? Will the hon. Gentleman draw those small numbers receiving just £15 a week to the attention of the Chancellor, who believes that there are large numbers?

Mr. Lloyd: It is an excellent time to make a necessary change when so few numbers will be affected. The problem in the next century will be the burden on the working population. The alternatives which we have introduced will mean that more and more people will have a second pension. They will be properly funded. Those people will not be a burden on the working population. Indeed, they will find additional finance for investment in industry.

Staffing

6. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action he has taken in response to the findings of the Moodie report on social security staffing.

Mr. Moore: I have made clear my determination to secure improvements in service to the public. My Department's investment of £1·2 billion in developing our operational strategy is directed at that objective. So is the Moodie report on our local office network. I commissioned it and I welcomed it on its publication in June. I have already accepted in principle its recommendation that those elements of local office work which do not require face-to-face contact with the public should be moved out of some hard-pressed offices.

Mr. Sumberg: I acknowledge the tremendous work done by the officers at my DSS offices in Bury. Does my right hon. Friend agree on the need to improve the take-up of benefit by our constituents? Would not the hiving off of some services on an agency basis assist in meeting that objective?

Mr. Moore: The specific question refers to relocation, and I am waiting for the final Moodie report on whether an agency system would improve the service to the customer. Our prime concern must be how to ensure that the claimants, wherever they are in the kingdom, are looked after best. I am obviously delighted to look to an improvement in opportunities, especially for the hard-pressed regions, many of which might find the proposed changes of benefit to them.

Mr. Leighton: Will the Secretary of State admit that, as the amount of benefit paid out since April has diminished, his intention is to reduce the number of people employed in DSS offices? Is that not a mistake? Is this not a golden opportunity to keep those staff on to provide a better service and, in particular, to run a take-up campaign among those who are entitled to benefit but who are not claiming it?

Mr. Moore: The hon. Gentleman is right. Because of the reduction in unemployment, the simpler income support claimant forms and the way in which the whole system is being helped, there has been a considerable reduction in work in our offices. The hon. Gentleman was wrong not to realise that that is being used throughout the system—I have travelled extensively around the benefit offices to check on this—to improve delivery of service. Comparing income support with supplementary benefit, the national average clearance time for claims has fallen from over 11 days at the end of 1987 to five days in September 1988, and I expect it to improve. The error rate has decreased. We are using the enhancement of the staff to improve our services, and staff are not being lost as a consequence.

Benefits

7. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received about the level of social security benefits following the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Autumn Statement.

Mr. Scott: After the—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) does not do badly in this place. I have to consider those hon. Members whose questions appear on the Order Paper.

Mr. Scott: After the expressions of opinion in this House, we have received a handful of letters from members of the public.

Mr. Thurnham: In view of the welcome continued falls in unemployment, will my hon. Friend say what effect that is likely to have on the total level of expenditure on benefits?

Mr. Scott: Throughout the public expenditure survey period we expect that there will be substantial reductions in the need to pay unemployment benefit because of the continued growth in the economy. We shall have to decide during the public expenditure survey round how our resources should be deployed.

Mr. Orme: What consultations did the Chancellor of the Exchequer have with his Department before his briefing a week ago last Friday to certain Lobby journalists?

Mr. Scott: It is fairly well known that we discuss all these matters during the course of the public expenditure survey each year. We did so last year, and we shall do so again next year.

Mr. Baldry: Would not a period of silence on pensions by the Opposition be worth while? The Labour party cheated pensioners out of nearly £1 billion——

Mr. Speaker: Order. As with questions to the Prime Minister, the hon. Member must ask questions for which the Secretary of State has responsibility.

Mr. Baldry: When my hon. Friend replies today to questions on this year's uprating in the Autumn Statement, will he take time to point out to the House and the country the contrast between the period 1974 to 1979 and today? The Labour Government failed to pay the Christmas bonus in 1976 and 1977. They cheated pensioners out of £1 billion by changing the basis on which pensions were uprated, and swindled pensioners out of massive amounts of savings by an economic policy that led to high inflation. Would not a period of silence by the Opposition on pensions now be worth while?

Mr. Scott: It would be worth while and much appreciated, but I fear that we are unlikely to get it, despite the fact that the Opposition know as well as we do that when they were in office pensioners' incomes increased by about 3 per cent. over the whole period, whereas under this Government they have increased by some 23 per cent.—twice as fast as those of the population as a whole.

Mr. Dalyell: Further to the unanswered questions by my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme), was it on the Friday, the Saturday or the Sunday that DSS Ministers were first told and consulted about the Chancellor's briefing?

Mr. Scott: I have nothing to add to the reply that I gave to the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme).

Mr. Roger King: Is my hon. Friend aware of the widespread support for the Government's policy of targeting resources where they are most urgently needed, and especially of the great increase in family credit that his Department has just announced, so long as those additional sums of money go to those in need? Will my hon. Friend consider new initiatives—through the schools, for instance—to inform those families in need that the money is available?

Mr. Scott: We want to maximise the take-up of family credit in particular, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has already alluded to the steps that we shall be taking to achieve that aim. I know that my hon. Friend recognises—and I hope it is widely recognised—that had we uprated child benefit in this uprating the poorest families would not have been helped. The steps that we were able to take have targeted help on those on low incomes, whether they are on income support or in employment.

Mrs. Fyfe: What advice would the Minister give to one of my constituents, a 43-year-old widow who has been told that she must find either work or a husband? She lives in a constituency where the official unemployment level is 22·6 per cent.

Mr. Scott: If the hon. Lady will provide me with the details of the case, I shall look into it, but I do not recognise the circumstances that she mentions.

Mr. Yeo: Does my hon. Friend agree that the strength of the Government's finances, as reported to the House in the Autumn Statement, underlines the enormous scope for increasing benefits to the very elderly and the worst-off pensioners? We on this side of the House look forward eagerly to the Minister's Department revealing its proposals in due course.

Mr. Scott: I am sure that the House will have read my right hon. Friend's article in yesterday's Sunday Express with great interest.

Mr. Robin Cook: Does the Minister agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that his Back Benchers need to be educated about social security? Why should it be necessary to educate them about social security if all they ever think about is more help for pensioners?

Mr. Scott: I am afraid that I cannot comment on these apocryphal remarks that are attributed to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. David Shaw: Will my hon. Friend confirm that there has been a substantial real terms increase in social security expenditure since 1979? Will he comment on whether that increase is giving full value for money, or whether it would be possible to target benefits better?

Mr. Scott: There has been a substantial increase in real terms under the Government—some 40 per cent.—and an extra £3·4 billion is going in as a result of the uprating announced quite recently. That is the result of the strength of our economy. We shall continue to try to ensure that the most help goes to those most in need.

Child Benefit

8. Mr. Haynes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy to publish a long-term strategy for child benefit.

Mr. Moore: I shall continue to review the rate of child benefit each year in accordance with the duty that I have under the existing legislation.

Mr. Haynes: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that I was born in poverty 62 years ago? Is he also aware that there is still poverty in this nation? The Secretary of State ought to be ashamed of himself for backing a Government who have frozen child benefit when children need that benefit. He is robbing babies. I have looked into the right hon. Gentleman's background. He was all right when he was a child. He can take that grin off his face. I want to know what he will do for the children of today and the future. He has cut child benefit by £130 million. It is time that he gave that money to the children.

Mr. Moore: I shall not go into details of personal background, but the hon. Gentleman might like to recheck the debates of 1975 and 1976. I shall not bore him again with details of the decisions made on this issue by Mrs. Castle and her colleagues, but I remind the hon. Gentleman that if anybody should be sitting uncomfortably in shame, it is the giggling Opposition Front Bench. They should recall that, for almost all the time that Labour was last in government, the value of the child tax allowance and the family allowance for families on average earnings was far below in real terms what it has been under this Government. [Interruption.] That is not very good information for the Opposition, but they have to hear it. Only once—during the months before the 1979 general election—did Labour increase child benefit to a level fit to be compared with what has been achieved by this Government.

Mr. Marlow: Will my right hon. Friend and the Government consider reintroducing that child tax allowance about which he was talking, thereby reducing taxation and public expenditure at a stroke? If not, why not?

Mr. Moore: My hon. Friend will be aware of what I said in my statement on the uprating about our manifesto commitment. We keep our manifesto commitments. My hon. Friend will also be aware of my duty under statute to consider the nature of child benefit and other aspects of the economy, such as increases in earnings and reductions in taxation, as have occurred this year. I did that this year and I shall try to do the same next year.

Mr. Nellist: If the Secretary of State were to undertake a long-term strategic study of child benefit, would he look at the effects over the long term of the freezing of other benefits such as the pensioners' Christmas bonus, which has been frozen since its inception——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must relate his question to child benefit.

Mr. Nellist: I have already done that. Is the Secretary of State aware that had the pensioners' Christmas bonus——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I called the hon. Gentleman because he has tabled question No. 25, which is on child benefit. I hope that he will stick to the subject of the question.

Mr. Nellist: Is the Secretary of State aware that had the pensioners' Christmas bonus been uprated by average earnings it should be more than £55 this Christmas?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must ask a question relating to that on the Order Paper.

Mr. Nellist: Are we to see——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have given the hon. Gentleman a good chance.

Mr. Nellist: Are we to see——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must sit down.

Mr. Nellist: You read it in Hansard and see whether it is in order.

Mr. Moore: I will never forget, and I am sure that the House will never forget, 1976 and 1975, when the issue not involved in the question was frozen for two years in a row.

Departmental Relocation

9. Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps he has taken to implement the recommendations in his Department's report that a significant number of headquarters staff be relocated out of London.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We accept in principle that there is a good case for relocating some of our headquarters work away from London. A team of officials are working on turning the principle into reality. We expect to have the team's report by the end of March 1989.

Mr. Cran: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his answer. I also congratulate him because his Department is in the forefront of relocating civil servants out of London and the south-east—a policy that is long overdue. Hard as I try, I cannot see Humberside mentioned in the document. Is he susceptible to representations to include it?

Mr. Lloyd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for both of his congratulations. I know that he has a long-standing interest in the subject and that he is an excellent advocate for Humberside. I can assure him that if he puts to us the merits of Humberside as a suitable location for our out-of-town headquarters we shall consider them very carefully indeed.

Mr. Worthington: In considering the relocation of staff, will the Minister take into account the great difficulty that my constituents suffer in that whenever they send correspondence about disability to Norcross, or write to Blackpool about the self-employed family credit scheme, that mail seems to fall into a black hole and never emerge again? Will the Minister consider substantially upgrading the staff and the resources in those areas so that the self-employed and the disabled can get a decent service?

Mr. Lloyd: That is not directly related to the question, but it is a very important matter. I do not accept the black hole analogy, but the service can be improved and is being improved by the operational strategy of introducing computerisation throughout the system so that at any particular office an individual will be able to get all the information he wants on any benefit that affects him.

Over-80s (Pension)

10. Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his current estimate of the number of people over 80 years who do not receive the full state retirement pension.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: About 66,000 people aged 80 and over do not receive full basic state pension—out of nearly 1·9 million in total. Those who do not receive full basic pension did not satisfy the contribution conditions.

Mr. Atkinson: Has my hon. Friend any estimates how much it would cost to provide those over-80s with a full basic pension? In view of their dwindling numbers, will he urge our right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to include that initiative in his forthcoming package of special help for poorer pensioners and to replace the 25p increase, which every 80-year-old must now regard as an insult on reaching that birthday?

Mr. Lloyd: I am afraid that I do not have the figure that my hon. Friend asked for, but, as he knows, those who do not receive the full pension and do not have sufficient income from other sources will have the difference more than made up through income support. We have no plans to discontinue the 25p age allowance, but I note my hon. Friend's enthusiasm for better targeting.

Mrs. Beckett: Does the Minister, whom I welcome to the Government Front Bench, recall reports to the effect that about 1 million pensioners who do not get a full state pension do not claim the income support to which they should be entitled? Does he not realise that that generation in particular is most reluctant to claim benefits which the Government persist in stigmatising as charity? If they are really making the oldest and poorest a priority, when will the Minister announce a massive take-up campaign for benefit along the same lines as the privatisation sales campaign?

Mr. Lloyd: The hon. Lady might be harking back in practice to the statements made by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about a pension for pensioners on low income who have not benefited from occupational pension schemes or SERPS. The hon. Lady's objective is one that we share.

Mr. Hanley: Does my hon. Friend agree that those over 80 are increasing in absolute terms and as a proportion of the total population? Will he have urgent discussions with his colleagues at the Department of the Environment so as to allow local authorities greater leeway over spending for that age group in areas with a particularly high proportion of such people?

Mr. Lloyd: I shall draw my hon. Friend's comments to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

"The Wilson Plot"

62. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Attorney-General if he plans to take any legal action regarding the book "The Wilson Plot", by Mr. D. Leigh.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Nicholas Lyell): I have no such plans at present.

Mr. Winnick: That is welcome. Is it not the case that much of the material in Mr. Leigh's book would be illegal if the Government's proposals to change the Official Secrets Act went ahead? Does the Solicitor-General not recognise that it is time the security services were subject to full parliamentary scrutiny, all the more so considering what Mr. Leigh has written about some of MI5's activities during the 1960s and 1970s?

The Solicitor-General: As the hon. Gentleman knows, those are matters for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. Aitken: Does my hon. and learned Friend realise that his answer about no activity concerning "The Wilson Plot" will disappoint milions of Big M's fans, because we need a sequel to "Carry on Spycatcher"? Surely my hon. and learned Friend recalls that at the end of that saga almost everyone was richer, the public were delighted and everyone was able to claim victory. Why should "The Wilson Plot" be denied that happy ending? Is M losing his touch? I think that we should be told?

The Solicitor-General: It is all very unfair.

Mr. Buchan: It must be especially disappointing for David Leigh. Has the hon. and learned Gentleman taken this decision because he has accepted the argument that the public interest must come first, or is it that he wishes to prevent the Government from making even bigger fools of themselves than they have in the past couple of years?

The Solicitor-General: There is no evidence in the book in question, as far as we have seen, of any breach of a duty of confidentiality, other than that of Mr. Wright.

Sunday Trading

63. Mr. Cran: To ask the Attorney-General what plans he has to publish the findings submitted to him by the Association of District Councils regarding the enforcement of Sunday trading laws; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General: I am placing in the Library a copy of the letter of 11 July 1988 from the Association of District Councils, which summarises the survey of enforcement undertaken by the association, together with the Attorney-General's letter requesting such information and his reply.

Mr. Cran: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that whether the public can shop on a Sunday depends less on the law than on geography? Does he agree that that is wholly unsatisfactory and that it is bringing the law into disrepute?

The Solicitor-General: Section 71 of the Shops Act 1950 places a clear duty of enforcement and the discretion as to whether to exercise that duty in a proper case upon each local authority. No local authority has the right to abrogate that duty as a matter of principle.

Mr. Skinner: I wonder whether the Director of Public Prosecutions and his Department have discussed what they intend to do with Lady Porter and her friends on Westminster council——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are on question 63.

Mr. Stanbrook: I welcome my hon. and learned Friend's answer about the duty of local authorities to prosecute. Will he deprecate the decision of those local authorities which say that, because of the referral of a certain case to the European Court, they do not intend to prosecute? Is it not undesirable that we have to wait upon a European institution before deciding to enforce our existing law?

The Solicitor-General: Referrals by the courts to the European Court by no means affect every case on Sunday trading, and local authorities should not, as a matter of course, regard them as any impediment to bringing prosecutions where they think it proper to do so.

Director of Public Prosecutions

64. Mr. Janner: To ask the Attorney-General when he last met the Director of Public Prosecutions; and what matters were discussed.

The Solicitor-General: On Thursday 10 November 1988. We discussed matters of departmental interest.

Mr. Janner: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman please consider using the Malicious Communications Act 1988 to prosecute the perpetrators of racist, anti-semitic and other evil publications sent through the post, such as Holocaust News? Will he also consider a filthy journal called "Choice", which is published by the Dowager Lady Birdwood? It reached my hon. Friend the Member for Easington (Mr. Cummings) today and has been sent to other hon. Members. Does he think that the Dowager Lady Birdwood, whose wealth, influence and position lie behind much of the Fascist and Nazi organisations in this country, should be prosecuted under that Act?

The Solicitor-General: If the hon. and learned Gentleman will let me have a copy of the document in question, I shall have it looked at.

Mr. Hind: Given the problems of overcrowding in prisons, when my hon. and learned Friend has discussions with the Director of Public Prosecutions, will he consider the possibility of overturning the case of Turner—which was decided by the Court of Appeal—to allow counsel to plea-bargain in the judge's room to establish, for the benefit of an accused person, what the judge thinks the sentence will be should the accused plead guilty? In this way, the process of law throughout Crown courts will be speeded up and the number of people held on remand will be reduced.

The Solicitor-General: I shall discuss the matter with my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor.

Prosecution Policy

65. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Attorney-General when he next intends to meet the Director of Public Prosecutions to discuss prosecution policy.

The Solicitor-General: I expect to meet the director in just under three weeks' time.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Did the Solicitor-General see the "Panorama" Wright interview, in which Wright said that he worked with one man during the period of the plot against the Wilson Government? Has he also noticed that, in his book, David Leigh indentifies that one man as Mr. Tony Brooks, who to this day lives in London and is a friend of an hon. Gentleman who was here a few minutes ago? Will that man be prosecuted? He lives in London and has been identified by Wright on television as working with him in illegal acts.

The Solicitor-General: I am interested in the information that the hon. Gentleman gives. I shall see that it is considered by the appropriate authorities.

Mr. Knapman: When my hon. and learned Friend next meets the Director of Public Prosecutions, will he consider operating a policy against Scottish Labour Members, who are rarely in the Chamber?

The Solicitor-General: As far as I know, that is not an offence.

Mr. Fraser: What other evidence has come to the Solicitor-General's attention that could corroborate the allegations made by Mr. Wright that have come to light since his book was published? Has there been much corroboration, and, if so, is it sufficient to re-open inquiries about whether criminal offences were committed?

The Solicitor-General: I cannot add to the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours).

National Security

67. Mr. Cryer: To ask the Attorney-General what is his policy towards the prosecution of former members of the security services for publication of confidential information.

The Solicitor-General: The policy is in accordance with the criteria set out in the code for Crown prosecutors.

Mr. Cryer: Does that mean that if former members of the secret police reveal that murder, conspiracy to sedition and other serious crimes have taken place attempts will be made by the Government to hush them up and sweep matters under the carpet, as they did with Peter Wright, or are they prepared to heap praise on members of the secret police who reveal that they have undertaken serious crimes —sometimes possibly without the knowledge of Ministers? Will he take action?

The Solicitor-General: I am not aware of any secret police. The answer to the other part of the question is no.

Mr. Lawrence: Is my hon. and learned Friend aware that the feeling of most people in this country is that those who betray the nation's secrets which are entrusted to them as part of their work, for money or notoriety, should be prosecuted, so as to end this sort of gross injustice?

The Solicitor-General: I well understand that and I am sympathetic to what my hon. and learned Friend has said. No one is above the law in this country, no matter what service he is in.

Mr. Bermingham: When he next meets the Director of Public Prosecutions to discuss the security services, will the hon. and learned Gentleman also take into account the considerable number of wire-tapping cases that are not being reported via the Home Secretary and which clearly show that the security services are exceeding their brief? Does the Solicitor-General intend that such cases will be revealed and prosecuted when necessary?

The Solicitor-General: I am not aware of those cases, but if the hon. Gentleman has evidence of them he should let the DPP know.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Japan

68. Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has discussed overseas aid co-operation with representatives of the Government of Japan; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Chris Patten): My Department is in frequent contact with representatives of the Government of Japan. I visited Tokyo in July and had wide-ranging discussions with the Japanese Government on overseas development issues.

Mr. Bennett: Is there any possibility of the Japanese Government giving financial assistance to British charities, such as the Save the Children Fund, which are working in developing countries?

Mr. Patten: That would be a sensible way in which the Japanese aid programme could develop in a number of countries. Our charities that work in long-term development are exceptionally professional, and I have suggested to the Japanese Government—this is a good idea of my hon. Friend's—that they might consider putting money through our non-governmental organisations, through a mechanism such as our joint funding scheme.

Mr. Skinner: Is not the truth that the Japanese are good at looking after themselves? Given their $80 billion trade surplus this year, is it any wonder that we read stories that they do not allow cosmetics into their country because they have different skins, or cannot allow skis to be imported because they have different snow, or have told Third world countries that they do not want their oranges because their stomachs are too small?

Mr. Patten: The hon. Gentleman's imaginative contribution to improving relations with Japan takes me well beyond my departmental brief. If he was trying to say that liberalising international trade is even more important than developing aid flows, I wholly agree with him.

Aid Distribution

69. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the United Kingdom's priorities for the geographical distribution of aid.

Mr. Chris Patten: In deciding how bilateral aid resources are allocated particular account is taken of need, how effectively our aid can be used, what other donors are doing and of the United Kingdom's historical links with many developing countries, particularly Commonwealth members.

Mr. Bruce: My hon. Friend will know that many of my constituents, especially in the Churches, are keen that we should give aid to Sudan because of the terrible problems there. What is happening about United Kingdom aid to Sudan, and what are we, as a country, doing to audit how well the money is spent when it gets to places such as Sudan and the rest of the world?

Mr. Patten: I know that a number of our Churches and other bodies are interested in our aid and development programme in Sudan. That is of particular concern to the diocese of Salisbury, which has its own contacts with Sudan. We shall be represented at the meeting next month with other donors to consider the World Bank's programme for rehabilitation after the floods. We, like other donors, will want to ensure that our money is well and effectively spent. It would, of course, be easier to promote the development of Sudan if a bloody civil conflict were not going on there.

Mr. Boateng: Has the Minister recognised the special needs of the Southern African Development Co-ordination Conference nations, and what steps are proposed to increase aid to those countries?

Mr. Patten: Recently we increased our commitment to the SADCC countries to £54 million. I shall be attending the SADCC meeting, God willing——

Mr. Tony Banks: What has the Prime Minister got to do with it?

Mr. Patten: —and hope to underline our commitment to SADCC and to the Limpopo line. I am delighted that the hon. Member for Newham North-West (Mr. Banks) has his priorities right.

Sir John Stanley: As many of the priority countries for British aid are those in sub-Saharan Africa, does my hon. Friend agree that it would be regrettable if the Government exercised only the option, under the Paris Club rescheduling, of making relatively modest reductions in interest rates on debts, rather than exercising the option of writing off some debt, as has been done by other countries? Would it not be regrettable if the excellent debt rescheduling initiative of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which was generous in concept, was less than generous in its implementation by the United Kingdom?

Mr. Patten: I sympathise with my right hon. Friend's argument. We have already written off about £1 billion worth of overseas aid loans and turned them into grants. The figure for sub-Saharan Africa is about £260 million. The Chancellor's initiative concentrated on three elements —longer rescheduling, cutting interest rates and writing off aid loans—and we have been occupied across the board.

Nicaragua

70. Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further information he has about the extent of the destruction in Nicaragua following Hurricane Joan; and if he will make a statement.

71. Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received from charities and other relevant bodies concerning the provision of aid to Nicaragua.

Mr. Chris Patten: As I informed the hon. Member for Glasgow, Provan (Mr. Wray) on 7 November, as a result of the hurricane 116 people were killed and 278 badly injured, 29,000 homes, 66 bridges, 24 roads and 300 schools were damaged or destroyed.

I have received a number of requests from British charities for financial help for the disaster relief operation in Nicaragua. The emergency assistance of £250,000 that I announced to the House on 24 October has been channelled through those organisations and the United Nations Disaster Relief Office. In addition, I have made available £135,000 for Costa Rica.

Including our contribution to European Community aid, our total assistance to those two countries stands at £481,000.

Miss Lestor: While thanking the hon. Gentleman for that reply, may I remind him that the destruction in Nicaragua of the coffee, cotton, banana and sugar cane crops, grazing land and animals, which he did not mention, has been colossal, and that more reports of damage are coming in? Whatever aid may have been made available, it is nothing like enough to help Nicaragua to get back on its feet. Will the Minister be flexible in response to specific demands? Will he give additional funds to projects that were previously joint funded by the Government, and that have been destroyed by the hurricane? I am thinking especially of the Rama Indians at Rama Keys—an OXFAM project co-funded by the Government which was completely wiped out. Will he also consider the provision of safe water in the Bluefields area?

Mr. Patten: We are certainly prepared to consider helping, through our joint funding scheme, non-governmental organisation projects that may have been damaged. If the charities apply to us in the usual way, we shall consider those suggestions as positively as possible.

Sir Russell Johnston: The Minister stressed the importance of taking into account need when giving aid. Leaving aside the hurricane, why is there such a difference between the aid given to Costa Rica, which was about £12·5 million in 1985, and that given to Nicaragua, which was £116,000? Should not the Government reappraise their approach to Nicaragua?

Mr. Patten: I do not think so. The main reasons for our aid programme to particular countries are developmental need, the poverty of the countries concerned and our historic connections. In Central America there are one or two other factors such as the presence in individual countries of regional institutions, but I should point out, as I think I have before, that the European Community provided about £6 million last year to long-term development in Nicaragua, and we provided over £1 million of that.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Will my right hon. Friend particularly concentrate assistance on the Bluefields area, which was not only the centre of damage resulting from the recent hurricane, but has had strong connections with this country for a long time? Will he also bear in mind that the damage that has been done to the Nicaraguan economy has a lot to do with the incompetent way that the Sandinista Government have run that country?

Mr. Patten: I take the point that politicians in some countries greatly favoured by Labour Members can do as much or more damage as natural calamities. I also take my hon. Friend's point about the importance of projects in Bluefields. I think he will know that we made a contribution to the Catholic bishop of Bluefields for emergency assistance.

Mr. Nellist: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: No. I will take points of order after the statement.

Mr. Nellist: It arises out of questions.

Mr. Speaker: Not now.

British Shipbuilders

3.30 pm

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Minister of Trade and Industry (Mr. Tony Newton): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement on progress in returning British Shipbuilders to the private sector, in accordance with the policy described to the House by my predecessor on 18 April and 21 July. I felt that the House would rightly wish to have such a report before the forthcoming parliamentary break. I should, however, make it clear at the outset that I am not yet in a position to resolve all the remaining uncertainties.

When my predecessor made his statement in April, British Shipbuilders owned shipyards at Govan, Sunderland, Appledore and Port Glasgow, together with the Clark Kincaid marine engine builders on the Clyde and a services subsidiary, Marine Design Consultants, at Sunderland and Dundee. Together these accounted for some 6,500 employees—less than 20 per cent. of total United Kingdom employment in shipbuilding, which is of the order of 35,000.

The Govan shipyard was successfully sold in August to the Norwegian group Kvaerner Industrier. It has made a major inward investment in Govan, which is now to be the centre of its advanced gas ship technology. Kvaerner has so far placed orders for two gas-carrying ships at Govan with the possibility of similar orders to follow. The future of the yard now seems assured. Negotiations for the sale of Clark Kincaid to a management buy-out team have gone well. They have been materially helped by Kvaerner's confirmation, at the time of my visit to it, in Oslo two weeks ago, that the engines for the first two gas-carrying ships to be built at Govan would be built at Clark Kincaid. I am glad to say that all commercial matters have now been agreed. I hope that the sale will be successfully completed by the end of the year.

Negotiations have also been proceeding for the sale of the Appledore yard to Langham Industries. Langham hopes to place significant work with the yard, with continuing Government support under the intervention fund. The House will be pleased to know that Langham Industries and British Shipbuilders are now close to agreement. Again, I hope that this sale will be completed by the end of the year.

In the case of the Ferguson yard at Port Glasgow, I can also report further progress. British Shipbuilders has today named a preferred bidder. This is Ailsa Perth Ltd., which previously bought the Ailsa yard at Troon. Detailed negotiations will now get under way, and I have, of course, asked British Shipbuilders chairman, John Lister, to ensure that every effort is made to bring them to an early and satisfactory conclusion. I can also tell the House that bids have been received by British Shipbuilders for Marine Design Consultants. These are currently being evaluated by British Shipbuilders and its financial advisers.

The yards and other facilities to which I have so far referred account for nearly two thirds of those employed by British Shipbuilders at the start of this process. The other major element of British Shipbuilders is North East Shipbuilders Ltd. at Sunderland. This consists of building yards on either side of the Wear, at Pallion and Southwick, together with Sunderland Forge Services and a fitting-out yard at North Sands.

As the House knows, British Shipbuilders asked for bids for NESL by 30 September. Four bids were received. At a late stage in their evaluation during October, one of the bidders sought to modify his offer. As I told the House on 26 October, I therefore thought it right to allow a further short period for all those who had submitted bids to modify them if they wished before a final assessment was made. Subsequently, we have also given time for further talks related to the possibility of a Cuban order for cargo ships, and to seek clarification of a tentative indication of a new overseas interest.

I will deal first with the original bids, as modified. I have to tell the House that, following consideration by British Shipbuilders and its financial advisers, the chairman has told me, and I have accepted, that none of them is acceptable.

None of those bids had the combination of shipbuilding experience and solid financial backing which, in the Government's view, would be required to sustain a viable operation in the extremely difficult conditions of the world shipbuilding market. Each also raises specific difficulties. One of them was in practice not a detailed bid, and depended on the granting of a licence for dumping waste at sea which itself would take some considerable time to resolve. Another offered continuing employment for less than a tenth of the work force. The other two, which would themselves have entailed major redundancies, required a degree of subsidy which would have been highly unlikely to be permitted under the sixth directive. One of the last two was in fact last week withdrawn.

I can, however, tell the House that during the past few days British Shipbuilders has received three clear expressions of interest in a possible purchase of facilities at Sunderland, including the overseas concern to which I referred earlier. In these circumstances, I have agreed with the chairman of British Shipbuilders that an opportunity should be allowed to consider proposals from these interests. This will also enable those making them, if they wish, to be fully informed of the outcome of the talks which have been taking place between the Cuban shipping company Mambisa and its financial advisers in London, whose representative is due to return to this country tonight.

We want to establish, by the end of this month, whether proposals can be developed which give a firm basis for negotiation. That would entail a clear statement of the work envisaged for the yard, evidence of the technical and financial capacity of the bidder, and the prospect of arrangements likely to be compatible with the European Community sixth directive concerning state support for shipbuilding.

These are not easy criteria to satisfy, as we have seen in assessing the earlier bids. No one should underestimate the difficulties. Nevertheless, I am convinced that it is right to make this last effort to find a viable way forward for NESL on the basis that I have described, and I believe that the House will share that view.

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): Is the Minister aware that there will be great relief at this further stay of execution for NESL, but that there will be an equally heartfelt hope that he recognises at last that merchant shipbuilding matters too much to Wearside and the British economy to be sacrificed on the altar of privatisation? Will he join me in paying tribute to the "Save our shipyard" campaign, the work force and the local community and its elected representatives who fought so hard to keep those yards open?

Will the Minister now say that his first priority is to secure the orders, especially the Cuban order, which will guarantee the future of these yards, and that this urgent and practical necessity will take priority over questions of ownership? In particular, will he guarantee that contracts will, if offered by the Cubans, be signed by North East Shipbuilders Ltd., irrespective of who is the owner for the time being?

Will the Minister concede that what matters to Sunderland and the British economy is to keep British merchant shipbuilding alive, and that the dogma of privatisation must now take second place? Will he recognise that we must now hope for more than the prolonging of a quite unnecessary agony of the Government's own creation and that he must now summon the courage to fight his corner with the EEC, to override his civil servants and to depart from the course mapped out by his predecessors and by the Secretary of State? Will the Minister now concentrate instead on building a viable future for shipbuilding on the Wear so that it can take advantage of the upturn in world demand for shipping and continue to make a vital contribution to our industrial future?

Mr. Newton: Far from the yards being sacrificed on the altar of privatisation, as the hon. Gentleman put it, the problem that we face is to rescue them from the disaster that nationalisation has been for them. It has led to British Shipbuilders costing the taxpayer overall about £2 billion since 1979, and on shipbuilding contracts alone it has lost £650 million, of which only £250 million has been within the permitted subsidy limits allowed by the agreed arrangements within the Community.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the possible Cuban order. No one should underestimate the difficulties of securing such an order against the intense competition that exists. However, in the circumstances that I described in my statement, in which further talks have been taking place in Cuba this week, I have felt it right to allow time for the outcome of those talks to be properly assessed. I cannot hold out hope, against the background of what I have already said about the losses made by British Shipbuilders, which include large losses made by North East Shipbuilders, of British Shipbuilders taking the contract, as the hon. Gentleman asked.

The hon. Gentleman also made remarks about my colleagues and my civil servants. In the past few weeks, I have given clear evidence to him and to the House that my purpose is to find a way of permitting the viable continuation of shipbuilding on Wearside, if that can be achieved. The hon. Gentleman should in turn recognise that the difficulties are great and that the optimism that has been expressed about an upturn in world shipbuilding orders, which I have read about, has to be judged against the fact that within the past few weeks the Association of West European Shipbuilders has drastically revised downwards its forecast of the upturn from annual orders of nearly 19 million compensated gross tonnes in the half decade from 1990 to 1995 to about 12·5 million compensated gross tonnes. What the hon. Gentleman has said needs to be judged against that.

Miss Emma Nicholson (Torridge and Devon, West): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the constructive way in which the work force at Appledore has tackled privatisation and of its genuine gratitude to my right hon. Friend and the chairman of British Shipbuilders for the time they took to listen to the work force's views?

Mr. Newton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for her comments and also for the constructive part that she has played in developing the arrangements. As I said in my statement, I am now hopeful that they will lead to a secure future for her constituents who work at Appledore, about whom she is rightly concerned.

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): Does the Minister accept that there will be great fear in Scotland about whether the Ferguson yard will continue to operate? Will the Minister give assurances that the unions at Ferguson will have an opportunity to make an input into deciding on the preferred buyers? Will he also confirm that Marine Design Consultants of Dundee has put in a bid, and that it has been accepted? Will the Minister ensure that its bid is given an equal opportunity, against the voiced intention of the present managing director, who has made it clear that if he is allowed to buy both yards it is likely that he will want to close one of them?

Mr. Newton: British Shipbuilders today named a preferred bidder for Ferguson. It will be up to the preferred bidder to decide whether to hold talks with the work force and I expect that a preferred bidder would want to do that. We should not want to place any obstacle in the way.

The hon. Gentleman asked me about Marine Design Consultants. I cannot add to what I said in my statement. Bids have been received and are being evaluated, and it would be wrong of me to comment further until I have received advice from British Shipbuilders. When I have, I shall take account of the hon. Gentleman's point.

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): Can my right hon. Friend comment on the disputed ferry contract? Does he realise that his decision to limit the period to the end of the month will be widely accepted, not only by the work force but by the industry generally, as it will clear up the uncertainty hanging over the yard?

Mr. Newton: I thank my hon. Friend for the latter part of his remarks. The collapse of the Danish ferry order has been one of the factors that have aggravated NESL's problems in recent weeks. Of the original 24 ferries ordered, 15 are being built and nine are not. Two of the ferries have been delivered, 10 have been completed and three are yet to be finished. Some will require further modification. Negotiations are taking place in the wake of the cancellation of the contract but they have not yet been completed.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): Having visited the north-east only two weeks ago, may I ask the Minister whether the implications of the EEC sixth directive and its effects on British Shipbuilders and Harland and Wolff were fully understood when the Government embarked upon the policy of privatisation?

Mr. Newton: I do not think that there has been any mystery in the industry about the general requirements and conditions of the sixth directive, under which intervention fund payments are made in appropriate circumstances. On Harland and Wolff, the right hon. Gentleman will know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland is continuing discussions about the possibility of a sale.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, if there is any question of the Cubans buying ships, British taxpayers' money will not be used as it was in the disastrous Polish shipbuilding order?

Mr. Newton: I can confirm that it is British taxpayers' money that meets any claims on the intervention fund, and, to that extent, taxpayers' involvement will continue. However, we have no intention of allowing the order to be taken in a form that would multiply still further the heavy losses of British Shipbuilders to which I referred in my statement.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): I welcome the fact that the Minister proposes to have another try at solving the problem. However, in view of the continued uncertainty at NESL, can the Minister say what he hopes will be the nature of his discussions and how he thinks they will overcome with the three new potential interests the problems that could not be overcome with the four previous ones?

Mr. Newton: I hope that what I have said and the tone of my statement suggest that I am anxious not to raise false hopes. As I said, the original bids were in no case acceptable; indeed, I judge that some of them were not terribly well put together. I hope that those who are now expressing an interest will have learnt some lessons from the previous experience, but I would not want to go beyond that.

Mr. Neville Trotter (Tynemouth): Does my right hon. Friend accept that there has been great concern in Sunderland since the disastrous collapse of the ferry order earlier in the year? Does he also accept that there will be great relief that he is obviously genuinely trying to find a solution to a serious problem and an acceptable bidder to provide a sustainable future for the yard? Does he agree, however, that world prices are the basis of the problem in the industry, that a rise in prices of about 30 per cent. is needed, and that international action will be necessary if that is to come about?

Mr. Newton: I thank my hon. Friend for the earlier part of his remarks. The existence of the intervention fund, operating under the sixth directive, is directed at the problem to which he has referred. We have made it clear that intervention fund support would continue to be available on the terms current at the time in the event of the successful sale of the Sunderland yard.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): Can the Minister assure the House that merchant shipbuilding orders that are wholly within the gift of the Government will be committed to British yards and not committed abroad? What does the future hold for the headquarters of British Shipbuilders at Benton house, in my constituency?

Mr. Newton: I am not entirely sure what the hon. Gentleman means by the first part of his question.

Against the background of good progress towards the successful sale of most of the main remaining ingredients of British Shipbuilders—and our hopes and efforts in connection with the sale of the remainder—it will be necessary in due course to arrange for an orderly rundown of the headquarters, although I cannot speculate about the timing of that.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Could my right hon. Friend tell the House what is the position vis-a-vis him and the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, both of whom presumably have intervention funds at their disposal? If the sum of money is the same, who decides whether it goes to Harland and Wolff in Northern Ireland or to the north-east?

Mr. Newton: Both my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and I operate within the same general framework of policy on shipbuilding. Intervention fund support is not set in terms of a finite amount but depends on any particular proposal fulfilling the conditions and is then up, in shorthand terms, to 28 per cent. of the cost of the ship as things stand at present.

Mr. Bob Clay (Sunderland, North): I am genuinely grateful for the stay of execution which the Minister has given us once again. I know that he has been genuinely trying to find a solution to the problem within the context of the Government policy that he has inherited.

If the Minister must persist in privatisation rather than follow the logical course of allowing British Shipbuilders to take the Cuban contract and another which might be available, does he accept that the best way to achieve a workable solution by the end of the month in the time that he has given would be to follow these steps: first to ensure that there is generous Export Credits Guarantee Department or other cover on the Cuban order or any other that is available; secondly, to take an extremely robust attitude towards the European Commission and its interpretation of the situation—Commissioners in Brussels should not be able to close British shipyards, with the Government then saying simply that it is the European Commission's fault, not theirs. Thirdly, it would help a great deal if the very narrow guidelines given to British Shipbuilders on the cost of closure were widened so that the real cost of closure, as outlined in recent reports, was taken into account.

Mr. Newton: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his generosity in the first part of his remarks. I shall try to respond in the same spirit to his more specific questions.

We would consider any proposal made to ECGD in the same way that we consider any other proposal for help. In other words, if the proposal falls within the general parameters of policy, it would qualify. I can undertake to adopt a robust attitude with regard to the European Community, but it must also be a realistic attitude bearing in mind that all the relevant Governments have a common interest in not having a subsidy war between their shipbuilding undertakings.

With regard to the basis on which bids are judged, necessarily British Shipbuilders must consider bids in the light of its commercial interests. The advice that I have been given—and the view I have taken—also tries to take account of wider considerations in the way in which I am sure the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay) would wish.

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Clark Kincaid order from Kvaerner for engines for the gas-carrying ships not only underlines Kvaerner's commitment to the Clyde, but should give the management buy-out at Clark Kincaid confidence for a successful future? Does he also agree that the announcement that Ailsa Perth is to be the preferred bidder for Fergusons should be welcomed because it will continue and maintain a long-standing and successful relationship between the two yards?

Mr. Newton: The answer to both parts of my hon. Friend's question is yes.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): Is the Minister aware of any study by his Department or any other Department to assess the social and human costs of closure and to match those against the cost of keeping the yards open and going for the Cuban order?

Mr. Newton: In trying to reach conclusions on those matters, we tried to take account of all the issues involved. However, some of the figures that I have seen—for example, those in the lengthy paper published by the "Save our shipyard" campaign—seem questionable and we would have to look at them very closely.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): If British Shipbuilders has cost the taxpayer £2,000 million since it was nationalised, does not that underline what a disaster nationalisation has been? Will my right hon. Friend ensure that the interests of the taxpayer are fully considered in any arrangements that he is about to make?

Mr. Newton: The basis of our policy is to provide a future for merchant shipbuilding that strikes a better balance between the interests of the taxpayer and other considerations. We have made great progress towards securing that with the successful sale of Govan and the progress on other fronts that I have announced. If we can carry further that progress with NESL, no one will be more delighted than me.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): What responsibility do the Government have or feel for continuing employment and capacity in the yards that have been privatised or are being privatised?

Mr. Newton: The Government's first priority has been to ensure that the yards, wherever possible, were placed in a position in which they could have a secure long-term future in shipbuilding. It is not possible for me to give absolute guarantees about the numbers employed, no more than it has been possible for BS to give such guarantees. During the time that BS has owned the yards there have been substantial reductions in employment in response to the inescapably difficult conditions in world shipbuilding.

Mr. James Cran (Beverley): As BS has had trading losses of £1 billion and has received £250 million in intervention fund support since 1979, does my right hon. Friend agree that that public money could have been far better spent in generating economic development within areas such as Sunderland and elsewhere?

Mr. Newton: I think that there will be many who will share my hon. Friend's view.

Ms. Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East): As the British merchant shipbuilding industry has lost more jobs over the past decade than the shipbuilding industry in any other EEC country, will the Minister agree that if Britain is to be a credible part of shipbuilding in Europe in future the NESL yards must stay open and the skills that are to be found within them used for the future?

Mr. Newton: I rather doubt whether the hon. Lady is entirely accurate in her opening statement, when she compared the position here with that in other countries in Europe. It is certain that all the shipbuilding centres in western Europe have experienced drastic and dramatic reductions in their shipbuilding work force in recent years. As I have said, that is an inescapable consequence of the difficult conditions in the world shipbuilding market.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): I appreciate the constraints that are placed upon my right hon. Friend by the sixth directive, but will he give an assurance to the workers in the north-east and on Clydeside that he will take urgent steps to ensure that other European countries, especially France, do not get round the directive because of the complications of their company structures? Despite the new-found enthusiasm of those who sit on the Opposition Front Bench and of the Scottish National party for the Community, can the Government give an assurance that there will be a fair deal for Scottish and English yards in Europe?

Mr. Newton: I can give my hon. Friend a clear guarantee that we shall remain supportive of efforts to ensure even-handed dealing throughout the Community with the shipbuilding industries of the member states, and thus a fair deal for British shipbuilders in that context. I think that everything that I have said this afternoon demonstrates our concern to do that.

Mr. Ted Garrett (Wallsend): Will the Minister accept that he is one of the few Ministers that I would consider having some interest in the principle of caring capitalism, which is the theme that is often adopted by the Conservative party? Will he accept also that those on the Tyne who have suffered grievous losses because of the decline in shipbuilding fully sympathise with those who are likely to lose their jobs in Sunderland? Will he stop harping on about the amount of money that is coming from the public purse? The amount of public money that will be used to keep shipbuilding jobs in Sunderland is peanuts when compared with the money that is spent on farming, for example. Will the right hon. Gentleman accept that it would be cheaper to keep the jobs of the men in Sunderland for a few more months, or even years, than pay them social security and unemployment benefit?

Mr. Newton: The point at issue was raised by one of my hon. Friends in a supplementary question a few moments ago. The question that everyone should ask is whether taxpayers' money on the scale that has been spent on British Shipbuilders since 1979 would not, with hindsight, have produced more secure jobs had it been applied in other ways.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): Is my right hon Friend aware that there are certain parallels between the position in which British Shipbuilders currently finds itself and the old British Leyland Motor Corporation—an unlamented state-owned organisation that owed billions of pounds? Privatisation, management buy-outs and partnerships with other businesses have turned subsidiaries such as Leyland Trucks into highly profitable operations. Privatisation of British Shipbuilders in the way that my right hon. Friend has described must be the way forward.

Mr. Newton: We believe that it is the appropriate way forward, and we are encouraged by the experience at Govan and the prospects there about which I have spoken. I hope that my hon. Friend is right in the wider optimism that he expresses.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): Leaving aside for the moment the ideology of privatisation, does not the Minister realise that experience has shown that privatisation is not a panacea for all evils and that selling off public enterprises to under-capitalised firms sows the seeds of its own disaster? Failure to give intervention fund support has also led to difficulties, such as in the case of Hall Russell shipbuilders in Aberdeen. Privatised two years ago, that company went into liquidation last Wednesday. Will the Minister give Hall Russell the support that it needs to complete its current order? Above all, will he make it clear to the people of Sunderland that privatisation is not the answer and that what is required is a commitment from the Government to keep jobs going —with less of the ideology, please?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman will know that the receiver is now at Hall Russell and he has expressed the hope that he will find a way of ensuring a continuing future for shipbuilding there and that the St. Helena ferry will be completed. I cannot say more at this stage.

The hon. Member is right when he says that there is no panacea, for such a thing does not exist either way. It is clear that nationalisation has not proved to be a panacea. It is my view, though not one with which the hon. Gentleman may agree, that the private sector ownership we have sought to bring about offers a better hope of a viable future for the yards.

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): The House is grateful to my right hon. Friend for literally bending over backwards to explore every option before making any decision about the future of the yards. Bearing in mind the catastrophic world situation, intense international competition and the limits of the sixth directive, can my right hon. Friend guarantee that support and an aid package will be available to the areas affected if, unfortunately and sadly, a yard has to close so that they may enjoy economic regeneration and hope for the future?

Mr. Newton: Yes, I can. Both my predecessor and I have made it clear that, in the event that we are forced to see the end of shipbuilding on the Wear, we would expect to announce measures for a remedial package for the development of a new industrial future for the town. There would be a good foundation on which to build, given what is already happening there, including the arrival of Nissan.

Ms. Hilary Armstrong (Durham, North-West): Does the right hon. Gentleman recognise that investment in other areas of the northern region when major industries have fallen, such as in my own constituency of Consett, has not led to a retention of the skill base? That will be a major problem if the shipbuilding industry in Sunderland is lost. Does the Minister further recognise that people in Sunderland fear that, because, along with people in the northern region, they have consistently voted against the Government—more so than in Scotland—closure will be an ideological decision? Will the Government make a decision that will do more for the future of industrial and skill development in the town?

Mr. Newton: I will say as calmly as I can that I reject absolutely the hon. Lady's suggestion that Government policy is dictated by the north-east's political complexion. That is an extremely unhappy suggestion.

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): Can my right hon. Friend explain why the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) concentrated his remarks on the one third of British Shipbuilders——

Mr. Speaker: It will not be in order because the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) must ask questions concerning matters for which the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has responsibility.

Mr. Shaw: Will my right hon. Friend note that this debate has concentrated on points concerning the one third of British Shipbuilders that it has been difficult to sell? Does he agree that there should be statements of support for and best wishes expressed to the employees of the two thirds of British Shipbuilders who will be assured of a good future in the private sector? Is that not what Lech Walesa would do—look for the good news for the future and not for the bad news of the past?

Mr. Newton: Certainly there has been a remarkable absence of any reference to the successes to which my statement referred. However, I have been long enough in politics to know that it is not unusual for attention to be concentrated on the less satisfactory parts of an announcement of that kind.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): To what degree has the attempt at privatisation produced uncertainty and therefore lost orders? Why does the Minister attack the concept of supporting shipbuilders in this country when other countries adopt such a policy—generating jobs not only in shipbuilding but also in steel making and in engineering in other parts of the country? Why is the Minister so rabidly opposed to providing support when this year, as in past years, the EC will spend more than £20 billion on farming? We should surely be prepared to support British manufacturing industry and our nation's assets and skills.

Mr. Newton: I do not accept that the policy we have adopted and are pursuing has had any deleterious effect on orders. The prospect that there will be more viable shipbuilding firms in this country is more likely to assist in obtaining orders than the reverse. On the hon. Gentleman's second point, we are not declining to give help. We are offering assistance within the terms agreed within the European Community, which is the sensible procedure.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on what has been achieved, and it is a tribute to his personal stickability that we have got this far. Does he agree that the concept of a nationalised British Shipbuilders in 1975 owed more to Socialist dogma than to practical common sense, and that that policy and party political involvement caused more problems than it solved?

Mr. Newton: Certainly no serious observer could suggest that nationalisation has answered these yards' problems. I repeat that returning the yards to the private sector, with which we have already made good progress, will secure a much better future than they otherwise would have had.

Mr. Ian Bruce (Dorset, South): Does my right hon. Friend agree that denationalisation of the yards is by far the best way of securing their future? It is essential for many reasons, not least for those of strategic defence, that there should be a shipbuilding industry in this country. What is my right hon. Friend's Department doing about confronting other nations which are unfairly trading in shipbuilding by giving excessive subsidies? What can we look forward to by way of the Government protecting a private shipbuilding industry from unfair competition?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend's latter questions return us to the sixth directive and to the Community's general collective aim of ensuring a reasonable basis on which European shipbuilding can continue. We shall continue to play our part in that.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is this not the same Government who allocate £13 a week out of the taxpayers in every family in Britain to the Common Market to provide subsidies? Is it not the same Government who handed over £400 million to British Aerospace before it was privatised—another fat subsidy? Is this not the same Government who handed over £4·5 billion when they transferred Rover? Is this not the same Government who gave a licence to Barlow Clowes, but who cannot give a licence to——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member is himself a chairman and must know that he should stick to the question and not go wide of it.

Mr. Skinner: My question is about subsidies—this place is subsidised as well. The Government will be symbolised by the picture of the Prime Minister in Gdansk, trying to save a shipyard there and shutting shipyards in the north-east. The Government are prepared to hand out subsidies to their friends but are not prepared to look after working people.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member must not debate the matter.

Mr. Newton: It is the same Government who, like successive Governments, have carried through a policy of privatisation, covering about 40 per cent. of what was the nationalised sector, which is widely copied throughout the world and has produced a massive expansion in share ownership.

The following Member made the Affirmation required by law:

James Sillars Esq., for Glasgow, Govan.

Means-Tested Benefits

4.12 pm

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): I beg to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a matter that is specific and important and requires urgent consideration, namely, "new evidence relating to the Government's intentions for means-tested benefits."

The matter is specific because of the unanimity yesterday in the journalistic record of the Chancellor's briefing last Friday, the independent corroboration of that record in —[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. An application is being made to me, but I cannot hear because of the shouting from the Government Benches.

Mr. Brown: The matter is specific because, as a result of the unanimity in the journalists' record of the Chancellor's briefing last Friday and the independent corroboration of that record in a second Treasury briefing last Saturday, the Chancellor now has a clear duty to answer the specific and precise questions that have been put to him about his real intentions for the future of the welfare state and to explain in particular his assertion that only "a tiny minority" of pensioners have "difficulty in making ends meet";

his statement that there is "clearly a case for restructuring child benefit"; and his view that for millions of pensioners targeting, and therefore means testing, is

"the way that the Government are likely to go".

He has a clear duty to explain why, if his sole aim was to provide more cash for poorer pensioners, he accepted that this would require the education of his Back Benchers and why he suggested that journalists should examine a list of unpledged benefits, benefits that the Government clearly considered themselves free to means-test.

The matter is specific also because, since last Monday's failure to provide detailed answers and last Tuesday's appearance of a transcript, the Chancellor has refused to give full answers to detailed questions. He has run away from facing a debate in the House and has declined to answer the point-by-point rebuttals of his own statement that came from journalists in yesterday's press.

The matter is important because, by his refusal to answer, by his inability to provide a tape or a transcript of his statement or give a satisfactory explanation for the absence of that tape and by his refusal to allow voice enhancement techniques to be applied to that tape, the Chancellor has done nothing to allay the fears of mothers, families and especially pensioners that the Government's real objective is to move from a regime of universal benefits to a regime of universal means testing, so jeopardising for millions of pensioners security in ill-health and dignity in old age.

The matter requires urgent consideration not only because this is the last full day of the parliamentary Session, not only because the journalists have unanimously rejected the Chancellor's explanations as a travesty of the truth, but because of the highly suspicious range of denials, delays and prevarications which we have heard over seven days which simply seek to protect the Chancellor from the proper scrutiny of the House and the general public.

The issue is not the reliability of a Treasury tape recorder; it is the trust that millions of people have put in the welfare state and around which they have organised their lifetime finances—a trust which the Chancellor seems intent on betraying. What this country requires is not a partisan defence outside this place of the Chancellor's general record. What the House requires are straight answers to straight questions.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"new evidence relating to the Government's intentions for means-tested benefits."

I have listened with care to the hon. Member. As he knows, my sole duty in considering an application under Standing Order No. 20 is to decide whether it should be given priority over the business set down for this evening or tomorrow. I regret that I cannot find that the matter that he has raised meets the criteria laid down under Standing Orders. I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

Ulster Hospital, Belfast

4.16 pm

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): I beg to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the closing of 29·5 per cent. of all acute beds in the Ulster hospital, Dundonald, Belfast, which includes a third of the total number of plastic surgery beds and a half of the gynaecological beds."

Coming on top of the closing of many hospitals in Northern Ireland and of many beds in the Royal Victoria hospital and the Musgrave Park hospital, and coming on top of the row about the unfair grading of nurses, the announcement which was made at the weekend has been a body blow to the people of Northern Ireland.

Plastic surgery is an important part of hospitalisation in Northern Ireland because of terrorist activity and the need for the victims of terrorist activity to have that facility available. One third of the total number of plastic surgery beds are to be closed. Surely the Government should preserve, and not guillotine, this type of service.

The matter is urgent because there is no other forum in Northern Ireland where we can democratically discuss this matter, because the boards in Northern Ireland responsible for the administration of hospitals are nominated boards, with the Ministers' placemen the majority on them. I press you, Sir, to give the House an opportunity to discuss this matter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the closing of 29·5 per cent. of the acute beds in the Ulster hospital, Belfast, which includes a third of the plastic surgery beds and 50 per cent. of the gynaecological beds in the entire hospital."

I have listened to the hon. Member with great care, but I regret that I must give him the same answer that I gave the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). I cannot see that the hon. Member's application meets the criteria of Standing Order No. 20, and therefore cannot submit his application to the House.

Points of Order

4.19 pm

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will remember that in question No. 8 my hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) asked the Secretary of State for Social Security to publish a long term strategy for child benefit. As Hansard will show tomorrow morning, in a supplementary question I began with the following words: "If the Secretary of State were to undertake a long-term strategic study of child benefit, would he look at the effects over the long term of the freezing of other benefits, such as the pensioners' Christmas bonus which has been frozen since its inception?" Is it not in order to compare two benefits, exactly in the same way as you allowed the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King), during questions on the statement, to compare British Leyland's state subsidy and to make allegations about British Steel's state subsidy, particularly since £5 billion has been lost since 1979 by not uprating the pensioners' Christmas bonus? As Nye Bevan would have said, "Why look in the crystal ball when you can read the book?"

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. Gentleman studies Hansard carefully tomorrow morning I think he will see that on no fewer than two occasions I tried to get him back to the question of child benefit. Although Ministers do not link questions with others that appear further down the Order Paper, I always try to do so. If the hon. Gentleman looks carefully at the Order Paper, he will see that his question No. 25 relates to child benefit allowance. He asks the Secretary of State for Social Security

"what would be the value, in 1988 prices, of the child benefit allowance, had it since its inception been increased annually by the equivalent of the rise in the value of: (a) the retail price index, and (b) average earnings."

That would have been a very good question to ask.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), in his application under Standing Order No. 20, referred to the fact that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is reported to have said that his Back Benchers need to be educated. It is clear from the reports that have been published since then that my right hon. Friend said no such thing and that in fact he was answering a question from a journalist who had made that statement. Is it not——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have already said that I cannot allow an application under Standing Order No. 20 on the subject. What journalists say is not a matter for me.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. On question No. 5, the Secretary of State for Social Security said in answer to a question from me that the elderly are a burden to others. That was very hurtful and dehumanising. I ask that in future——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We cannot have a re-run of Question Time.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Are you able to guide the House about Standing Order No. 20 applications in general? I ask you to reflect on a particular matter. Most Standing Order No. 20 applications relate to the actions of Ministers when exercising their ministerial responsibilities. However, when there is a Standing Order No. 20 application that relates to action that has already been taken by a Minister the probability of that action being raised in debate at a future date is quite distinct from a request that the Minister should take action in the future. Could you reflect on the fact that the longer the period from the time when the Minister took that action to the time when a debate may take place on a future occasion may affect the efficacy of the debate and the ability of the House to deal with a matter that is retrospective rather than prospective?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman knows that the criteria for Standing Order No. 20 applications are that the matter must be urgent, specific and important. Standing Order No. 20 applications must be raised at the first opportunity and notice must be given to me, whenever possible, before 12 o'clock. I have to make difficult decisions as to whether those applications meet the criteria. I did not find that to be so in today's cases.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I believe that you accept that one of the Opposition's duties is to scrutinise the activities of Ministers. The Session is coming to an end. We on this side of the House believe that much has to be done to explain the discrepancy between what the journalists wrote yesterday and what the Chancellor said——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is trying to perpetuate the Standing Order No. 20 application that was made by his hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown).

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, arising from question No. 7. A factual question was asked about when Ministers first knew of the Chancellor's briefing. We have to accept that what journalists say is not a matter for you, but it is a matter for you when the House finds difficulty in establishing factually what happened. In the politest way, I asked whether it was on the Friday, Saturday or Sunday that Department of Social Security Ministers——

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is no good raising that matter with me as a point of order, because I could not possibly know the answer to it.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I put it to you as the defender of Parliament's rights that this is an issue of great importance to the House of Commons. The Chancellor has not come clean. It is your duty to defend our rights. If he——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady will know that I take that as a prime charge. I do defend the rights of the House of Commons. There was a private notice question last week on this very matter, which I granted.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You said earlier that matters have to be raised as soon as possible after they have occurred. I see your point, as does the House. Do you accept that during Question Time, at which both of us were present, there was an altercation between members of the Opposition Front Bench and Treasury Ministers on whether Department of Social Security Ministers knew about the Chancellor's intervention? You will have noticed that various Ministers refused to answer that question; they blocked it successfully and did not answer. This is the first available opportunity that any Opposition Member has had to make a Standing Order No. 20 application. It was only at that point that a question about the matter had been asked in the House, notwithstanding what——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is very helpful, as I would expect him to be because of his position in the House, but he must know that whoever occupies this Chair must have regard to all sorts of considerations, in particular the criteria laid down in the Standing Order. I cannot be held responsible for what Ministers say at the Dispatch Box. That is not a matter for me.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Do you not agree that on some occasions when you rule that a Standing Order No. 20 application is not a matter of urgent debate it may become so later? For example, the Chancellor's meeting with the press could become the subject of further debate while Parliament stands prorogued. If that happened but Parliament had been unable to debate what the Chancellor said, would it not mean that far from Parliament being the forum of the nation the press would become that forum? If the press were to continue to debate this matter during Prorogation, would you be prepared to review the case for an urgent debate?

Mr. Speaker: I take every case on its merits. What the hon. Gentleman is saying is at the moment hypothetical.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether you, as Chairman of the House of Commons Commission, will look during Prorogation into the matter of a private body that runs a magazine which purports to represent the views of the House of Commons. It has carried the portcullis for a period without official authority. When the League Against Cruel Sports produced a portfolio, I recall that it was rapidly told to drop the portcullis.

This private magazine is not accountable to the House. We cannot ask questions about how much profit is being made. We cannot ask whether its pages are being abused by being opened to the Tory leader of Bradford council to justify his swingeing cuts. These are important matters. If the magazine were accountable to the House, a judgment could be made about it, but it is being run by an all-party clique of hon. Members. They can do what they want. They are not accountable. The magazine should not be described as having connections with the House. It is a private magazine with a small circulation, but it uses the imprimatur of the House of Commons. There should be some element of accountability, but it is noticeably absent. I hope that you, Mr. Speaker, will look into the matter during Prorogation.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This matter has been raised before. I think that it was discussed by the House of Commons (Services) Committee. If the hon. Gentleman wants to make further points, his right course is to draw them to the attention of the Services Committee.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is it a different point of order?

Mr. Dalyell: Yes. Mr. Speaker Hylton-Foster, who was my first Speaker, used from time to time to appeal to the good will of the Leader of the House in difficult situations such as we have with the Chancellor. Can we reinstate the concept of the good will of the Leader of the House? He might vouchsafe some kind of statement on this matter which obviously concerns serious hon. Members on both sides of the House.

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the House is here. I know that he is a man of good will. I am sure that he will have heard what has been said.

Orders of the Day

Road Traffic (Consequential Provisions) Bill [Lords]

Considered in Committee

[MR. HAROLD WALKER in the Chair]

Clauses 1 to 7 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 8

SHORT TITLE, COMMENCEMENT AND EXTENT

4.30 pm

The Solicitor-General (Sir Nicholas Lyell): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 2, line 38, leave out 'three' and insert 'six'.

The amendments that stand in my name were shown in draft to the Chairman of the Joint Committee on Consolidation, &c., Bills, who said that they were, in his opinion, proper to be moved as part of the consolidation effected by the Bills.

Amendment No. 1 relates to the provision for the commencement of the Bill three months after Royal Assent. Representations from the Justices Clerks Society suggested that that would not give magistrates courts sufficient time to adjust to the change, so the amendment extends the period to six months.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 8, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule 1

REPEALS AND REVOCATIONS

The Solicitor-General: I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 7, leave out lines 24 to 28.

The Chairman: With this it will be convenient to consider Government amendment No. 3.

The Solicitor-General: The references in the Bill to the Criminal Justice Act 1988 are to the text of the Bill for that Act as amended by Standing Committee in the Commons. There were changes in clause and schedule numbers before the Criminal Justice Act received Royal Assent, and the amendments bring the references in the Bill up to date.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 3, in page 7, line 31, at end insert—

"1988 c. 33.	Criminal Justice Act 1988.			Section 37(2) Section 63. Section 68. In Schedule 15, paragraphs 92 to 94.'

—[The Solicitor-General.]

Schedule 1, as amended, agreed to.

Schedule 2 agreed to.

Schedule 3

CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS

Amendments made: No. 4, in page 27, line 36, leave out paragraph 38.

No. 5, in page 27, line 44, at end insert—

'The Criminal Justice Act 1988 (c. 33)

39. In section 40 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988, in subsection 3(c) for "section 99(b) of the Road Traffic Act 1972" there is substituted "section 103(1)(b) of the Road Traffic Act 1988".'.—[The Solicitor-General.]

TRANSITORY MODIFICATIONS

The Solicitor-General: I beg to move amendment No. 6, in page 30, line 21, leave out paragraph 1.

The Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 7.

The Solicitor-General: Paragraph 1 of schedule 5 contains transitory modifications of the Road Traffic Bill and the Road Traffic Offenders Bill pending the coming into force of various sections of the Criminal Justice Act 1988. These provisions are now all in force, or will be in force before this consolidation can come into force, so the transitory modifications are no longer necessary.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 7, in page 31, line 9, leave out paragraph 3.—[The Solicitor-General.]

Schedule 5, as amended, agreed to.

Bill reported, with amendments; considered, read the Third time, and passed, with amendments.

Road Traffic Bill [Lords]

Considered in Committee.

[MR. HAROLD WALKER in the Chair.]

Clauses 1 to 107 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 108

INTERPRETATION

The Solicitor-General (Sir Nicholas Lyell): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 74, leave out lines 6 to 8.

Part III of the Bill derives from part III of the Road Traffic Act 1972. Part III of the Bill does not deal with disqualification and endorsement of licences on conviction, unlike part III of the 1972 Act. The provisions about disqualification and endorsement are now to be found in part II of the Road Traffic Offenders Bill. Accordingly, part III of the Road Traffic Bill does not require definitions of, "offence involving obligatory disqualification" and "offence involving discretionary disqualification" and the amendment omits those definitions.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 108, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 109 to 144 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 145

REQUIREMENTS IN RESPECT OF POLICIES OF INSURANCE

The Solicitor-General: I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 99, line 1, leave out subsection (7).

Paragraph 3 of schedule 5 to the Road Traffic (Consequential Provisions) Bill contains transitory modifications. These and other amendments and modifications remove transitory modifications which are no longer necessary.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 145, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 146 to 150 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 151

Clause 151, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 152 to 160 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 161, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 162 to 196 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 197

SHORT TITLE, COMMENCEMENT AND EXTENT

The Solicitor-General: I beg to move amendment No. 5, in page 131, line 4, leave out 'three' and insert 'six'.

This clause provides for the commencement of the Bill three months after Royal Assent. Again, representations from the Justices Clerks Society suggest that that would not give sufficient time for magistrates courts to adjust to the change. The amendment extends the period to six months.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 197, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 1 to 8 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 9

MODE OF TRIAL

The Solicitor-General (Sir Nicholas Lyell): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 5, line 15, leave out subsection (2).

Paragraph 1 of schedule 5 to the Road Traffic (Consequential Provisions) Bill contained transitory modifications of the consolidation pending the coming into force of certain provisions of the Criminal Justice Act 1988. These provisions are now all in force, and the Committee has approved an amendment to omit paragraph 1 of schedule 5. Subsection (2) warns the reader of the existence of the modification, and is no longer necessary.

There is the same explanation for amendments Nos. 8, 9 and 11 in relation to clauses 54, 89 and schedule 1, respectively.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 9, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 10 to 18 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 19

EVIDENCE OF DISQUALIFICATION IN SCOTLAND

Amendment made: No. 2 in page 11, line 5, after 'proceedings', insert 'in Scotland'.—[The Solicitor-General.]

Clause 19, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 20 to 53 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 54

NOTICES ON-THE-SPOT OR AT A POLICE STATION

The Solicitor-General: I beg to move amendment No. 3, in page 27, line 39, leave out 'an' and insert 'a constable or'.

Subsections (4) and (5) derive from section 28(1) and (2) of the Transport Act 1982, which provides for a person who has committed a fixed penalty offence to produce his licence to a constable at a police station in order to obtain a fixed penalty notice. The Criminal Justice Act 1988 extended this provision so that the licence might be produced to an authorised person, that is, a person authorised by the chief officer of police. In the clause the references to a constable have not been reproduced, and amendments 3 to 7 rectify that omission.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 4, in page 28, line 2, leave out 'an' and insert 'a constable or'.

No. 5, in line 6, after first 'the', insert 'constable or'.

No. 6, in line 9, after 'the', insert 'constable or'.

No. 7, in line 11, after 'the', insert 'constable or'.

No. 8, leave out lines 25 and 26.—[The Solicitor-General.]

Clauses 55 to 88 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

The Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 13 and 14.

The Solicitor-General: The amendments give effect to the Penalty Points (Alteration) Order 1988, which was made under section 19(8) of the Transport Act 1981 on 2 November 1988, and is to come into force on 1 March 1989.

Health and Safety

4.45 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I wish to raise a matter arising from a document produced by the European Commission entitled, "Developing an active company approach to the European Market—Europe in 1992." I have already raised this matter with Mr. Speaker through the Clerk of the House.

The Government and the whole House are familiar with the whole question of 1992, and are generally supportive. However, a very important question of order arises in relation to this particular document published by the European Commission. The document contains advice which suggests that no regard is being taken of the role of this Parliament in the making, scrutinising and passing of legislation affecting people in this country. Fifty thousand copies of that document have been distributed by the European Commission. It appears from page 23 of the document that the United Kingdom Parliament has no role in the passage of such legislation——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The hon. Gentleman said that he has drawn the matter to the attention of the Clerk and of Mr. Speaker. I understand his point and I am well aware of his concern, but this is not a matter for the Chair. The only advice that I can offer the hon. Gentleman is that he should seek the services and offices of his own Member of the European Parliament.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Everyone knows that the Common Market does not oblige the Council of Ministers to pay the slightest attention to the House of Commons. Anyone who voted for the treaty of Rome and for the Single European Act knows that. Surely they also accept that the European Parliament can express views which can be completely ignored by the Council of Ministers. I hope that before we start a long debate on important vital constitutional issues, we will not be misled by the view that the House of Commons influences the Council of Ministers or that the views of the so-called European Parliament have any effect whatsoever. Surely we should be clear about the constitutional points before we go one step further.

Mr. Cash: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My point is less in regard to the European Parliament, for which many of us have a great deal of respect. "Erskine May", chapter 34, clearly states that many aspects of draft Community legislation require implementation in this House. It is wholly inappropriate for the European Commission to publish a document on this scale, filtering through the whole of the United Kingdom, from which it appears that there is no role for the United Kingdom Parliament in the passage of this legislation. Therefore, I wish to register a protest on behalf of my constituents, and the electorate as a whole, at the way in which this document has been promulgated.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I hope that you will make things clear. On Thursday night we had a perfect example of the point that I am making. For an hour and a half we debated an order on origin marking. It was a long debate but it was made clear by Ministers that it would make no difference whether we voted for or against the order as there had not been a prosecution for two years because of a decision by the EEC. Surely we accept——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is making the point that I made earlier. These are not matters for the Chair. That is the position.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not wish to detain the House, but, although tiny, this is an important point. I hope that before hon. Members begin a long debate they will appreciate that, once an EEC decision has been made, it is effectively the law of the land, whether Parliament approves or not. There are ample test cases to prove that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those are matters for debate, not for the Chair.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Surely the document, "Europe in 1992", brings the House into contempt when the Commission, which has not been elected, makes it clear that the House has no role in controlling affairs at the heart of our way of life. Surely it is a matter that the Chair has to take into consideration. I am a Member of the European Parliament and I know that Members of that Parliament are helpless in matters such as this. We need the help of the House and of you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in a matter of such gravity.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hope that hon. Members will not seek to draw the Chair into matters of political controversy. These are matters that the House has debated and, doubtless, will debate again in the future. The points that have been raised are appropriate matters for debate, rather than for a ruling from the Chair.

The Minister of State, Department of Employment (Mr. John Cope): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 5211/88 on the safety and health of workers at the workplace and 5762/88 and the Supplementary Explanatory Memorandum submitted by the Department of Trade and Industry on 7th July 1988 on personal protective equipment; supports the proposals in principle as steps towards the establishment of comparable high standards of health and safety throughout the Community and the removal of technical barriers to trade; and endorses the Government's endeavours to secure modifications in negotiations.

The Government believe that the House has a role to play because it influences the stand taken by the Government and Ministers in the Council of Ministers. That is the purpose of the debate. In fact, it has a greater role than that, which I shall seek to show.

The European Commission proposals are part of the move towards completing the single European market by 1992—a move to which the United Kingdom and the rest of the European Community are committed. The steadily increasing European Community activity in health and safety at work reflects the impetus that moves towards economic integration have given to a whole range of other European developments. Those moves have been given clearer direction and purpose since 1985 when the European Community decided to undertake a full programme of activity to complete the single market. Part of that programme stems from a recognition that it is important that competition is not distorted by differences in basic health and safety standards with which employers in member states are required to comply.

There are differences in standards and of approach between member states, and no doubt there are lessons that we can learn from each other. As regards fatal accidents, only the Netherlands has a better record than the United Kingdom. Rates among leading competitors are significantly worse. We must not be complacent and the figures tell only part of the story. However, they show that the United Kingdom already has fairly high standards. That must not put us at a disadvantage to our competitors; the objective must be to bring them up to our standards, not the other way round.

The proposed directives are based on provisions in the Single European Act which, as the House will be aware, introduced a number of reforms to the treaty of Rome. The Act was intended to improve the workings of the Community, to extend its scope in areas such as this and to speed up progress towards agreed objectives. For example, the Act enables the Council of Ministers to take decisions on many issues by a system of qualified majority voting. The removal of the effective power of veto is aimed at speeding up the European law-making process on matters such as health and safety at work and product standards. It makes it more important than ever for the United Kingdom to win the support of other member states through reason and argument and also for us to be sufficiently flexible to accept reasonable compromise when necessary.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Is the Minister saying that if we want to retain the absolute provisions of section 14 of the Factories Act 1961 regarding dangerous machinery, but, for example, Spain proposes that standards should be lowered, we will not be able to protect those provisions?

Mr. Cope: I cannot recall the precise provisions of that section, but the European proposals are for minimum standards. We are free to have higher standards if we wish.

The workplace proposals introduced earlier this year —they are covered by the first of the explanatory memoranda referred to in document 5211/88—consist of a framework directive specifying measures to encourage improvements in the safety and health of workers and five subsidiary, or daughter, directives. Those subsidiary directives set the minimum—I stress "minimum"— requirements for workplaces on the use of machines, personal protective equipment, visual display units and the handling of heavy loads which are likely to cause back injury.

The new treaty provisions on which the proposals are founded—article 118A—for the first time, provide for Community measures on health and safety at work. That reflects a growing belief in the Community that a truly common market needs to ensure comparable high health and safety standards for all its workers. The Government support the aim of ensuring that decent comparable standards of health and safety apply throughout the European Community.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): Will the directive apply to the construction industry?

Mr. Cope: Yes.

Therefore, we accept the main thrust of the proposals. However, there are problems with the proposals as they stand, and the United Kingdom is playing a full part in the negotiations in Brussels in order to improve them. Many of the changes that we want to see are by way of clarification and the removal of excessive detail.

We are conscious of the importance of not imposing unnecessary burdens on industry and of the fact that new requirements can sometimes bear particularly hard on smaller businesses. The United Kingdom was instrumental in securing the inclusion of a requirement in article 118A that health and safety directives should not constrain the creation and development of small and medium-sized companies. We will do our utmost to ensure that that requirement is fully respected. We do not seek special exemptions for the employees of smaller businesses, but we are looking for provisions that are flexible and sensible enough to be applied to all workplaces.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: What is the Government's attitude to the proposal that tight new rules for lighting, heating, ventilation, stairways, and so on, should apply to new buildings but not immediately to old buildings? Will that not discriminate against countries with lots of new factories rather than countries with old ones? If it were approved in that form, would the Government apply it in United Kingdom law and exempt old buildings from those tight rules?

Mr. Cope: I shall respond to my hon. Friend's detailed point at the end of the debate, if he will permit me.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): The Minister has always been good about writing detailed letters, and I thank him for his courtesy in Committee and on the Floor of the House. There is, however, a special problem in some areas. I am thinking particularly of what has happened at the Golden Wonder factory at Broxburn in relation to asbestos and new discoveries regarding its dangers. Will the Minister and the Department be raising this problem in the European Community? I do not ask for an answer off the top of his head, but it is an important matter.

Mr. Cope: I shall make some comments about that as soon as I usefully can.

It is important that the same provisions apply to all workplaces, even small ones. Flexibility is not reducing standards but avoiding a legal straitjacket that removes useful options and obscures real objectives. The Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 and our approach to the proposing and passing of regulations under it embody that flexible approach. Where possible, regulations are expressed as objectives to be met, leaving employers to decide on the precise means of achieving them. On occasion, requirements need to be precisely drawn, but, where possible, there should be sufficient flexibility to allow different solutions to problems. Our national legislation offers some useful ideas for solving problems with the Commission's proposals.

Mr. Cryer: If the Commission's recommendations and directives are for lower standards than in United Kingdom legislation, would an employer who is challenged to maintain United Kingdom standards and who says, "I prefer the EC recommended levels because I support a flexible approach" have a right to challenge the application of different United Kingdom standards in the European Court?

Mr. Cope: No, not in the way that the hon. Gentleman suggests. The flexible approach is embodied in regulations proposed to and accepted by the House under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act. In relying on the flexibility of such regulations, an employer would be complying with United Kingdom legislation, which would be satisfactory. If it was held that United Kingdom regulations were lower than the minimum suggested in a directive, the employer might be able to argue in the European Court that standards in the United Kingdom were not high enough. That is the opposite of what the hon. Gentleman was suggesting.

There are six proposals before us, but only the framework directive is at an advanced stage of negotiation. It has been discussed a number of times in the Council of Ministers and the social questions working group. It sets out the employer's basic responsibilities to assess risks and introduce the necessary measures. Much of the directive is consistent with requirements in the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act and the subsidiary legislation.

We are still working hard on one important problem. We need to ensure that the directive encompasses the concept of "so far as is reasonably practical." This concept runs all the way through the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act, the subsidiary legislation and the guidance under the Act. The problem with these documents is essentially legal, stemming from the absence in United Kingdom law of the continental concept of proportionality. Our courts must apply the law exactly as it is enacted by Parliament. Continental courts apply the law only as far as it is proportionate to the circumstances. Proportionality therefore allows continental member states to couch their health and safety laws in absolute terms. They enforce them to a standard equivalent to "so far as is reasonably practicable", but it is crucial that we find an acceptable way for the United Kingdom to implement the directive using "so far as is reasonably practicable," where appropriate, and in line with our tradition of enforcing the letter of the law. We shall continue to try to persuade the Commission and other member states of the importance of this issue and gain their co-operation in reaching a solution.

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend agree that there are serious problems because some member states do not have the administrative machinery for the enforcement of provisions in many of these directives? Therefore, the consequence could and probably will be that, although we are engaged on an entirely constructive and helpful harmonisation programme, the fact that some member states may not want or be prepared to enforce the legislation will produce inequities and reduce the level of the playing field that we all want. As this is of particular importance to small and medium-sized businesses, we must ensure that other member states honour their obligations. What can the Minister do about it?

Mr. Cope: We are conscious of the enforcement problem, as is the Commission and the Council of Ministers. The problem has already been raised and I have no doubt that it will be again. The enforcement machinery differs considerably between member states. Much work is being done to ensure that we are all aware of other countries' enforcement procedures. Indeed, there has been much exchange between our factoray inspectorte and its equivalent in other countries. Much thought is being given to methods of evening out the procedures. The Commission is concerned about the central role that it must play.

The five subsidiary directives referred to in the motion are at a much earlier stage of negotiation. Four have been discussed to some extent in the Council machinery, but much negotiation lies ahead. The fifth directive, on visual display units, has not been discussed. We believe that VDU work is sufficiently and appropriately covered by the general health and safety legislation and the framework directive. We do not believe that a specific directive on VDUs is appropriate.

The other two proposals on the use of machines and personal protective equipment are complementary to proposals for trading directives under article 100A of the treaty, which is central to the removal of technical barriers to trade in the Community. Directives under article 100A embody a new approach to the harmonisation of product standards and are limited to setting broadly drawn essential safety requirements. If those requirements are met, products will be free to be traded throughout the Community. Technical standards are left to the Eurpoean standards bodies to define, and if a product complies with the appropriate standards it is presumed to comply with the directive.

As European standards take time to prepare, most of the directives lay down a procedure whereby suitable national standards can be used during the interim. British Standards Institution standards will apply in the United Kingdom. Each directive will specify the means of proving conformity with its requirements. This may involve some form of independent third-party assessment of varying degrees of rigour. Generally speaking, the greater the safety implications, the more stringent the procedures are likely to be, as one would expect.

The proposed trading directive on personal protective equipment follows this pattern. The Government welcome the aim of ensuring Community-wide high standards in this important area. In the negotiations we intend to ensure that present safety levels enjoyed in the United Kingdom are not reduced, while minimising additional burdens on manufacturers.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Employers throughout the country are anxious to know the Government's view and the likely outcome of the statements on obligations in respect of worker representatives. The Minister will be aware that article 10 clearly states that workers' representatives will be entitled to time off without loss of pay to fulfil their obligations under this directive. On page 5 of the letter from Brussels dated 17 March, we find that they should be protected against dismissal or any other adverse treatment related to their activities as worker representatives. That is a fundamental change in the British law governing trade union worker representatives and their entitlements.

What is the Government's view of this, and what is likely to happen? What is a worker's representative in a non-unionised factory?

Mr. Cope: The directive should not undermine the employer's primary responsibility. The employer must be responsible primarily for health and safety on his premises and in the working environment. We have the support of other member states on this.

As regards the articles to which my hon. Friend referred, which relates to employers consulting their employees, we are optimistic that the final text will be broadly in line with the Safety Representatives and Safety Committees Regulations 1977, which already apply in this country. I appreciate that the regulations differ when applied to unionised and non-unionised workplaces, but we still believe that the 1977 regulations will cover the matter.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): What precisely is the basis for my hon. Friend's optimism that the final text will reflect the line of thought he has just outlined? The draft of the European statutes and the texts of some of Monsieur Delors' most recent speeches and pronouncements make it clear that the direction in which the Commission wishes to lead Europe is one of massive worker participation—worker membership of boards and elected committees. The whole thrust of European legislation is to give workers far more say and rights than they have under the legislation that my hon. Friend optimistically believes will be included in the final text.

Mr. Cope: My hon. Friend knows some of the Government's views about these matters. They do not arise in the context of these proposals, however. The reason for my optimism is the way in which the discussions have gone so far in the Council of Ministers and the working groups. Allied to that is the way in which the United Kingdom arguments have been received so far in the Community.

Mr. Cash: I do not want to press too many points on the Minister at this stage as there will be opportunities for speeches. However, article 7 of the directive states:

"The employer is required to involve the workers".

The problem is that that imposes a strict obligation to involve workers and/or their representatives in drawing up a list of things with which I shall not weary the Minister at this stage. They are clearly set out in article 7.

There is a problem with the wording——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Briefly.

Mr. Cash: As for the standards to which my hon. Friend referred, the explanatory memorandum signed by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Department of Trade and Industry, which was issued recently, says this about financial implications:

"The financial effects for business are unclear at present as it is not known what attestation procedures will be required for each item of protective equipment."

In a nutshell, the problem is whether these attestation procedures will have financial implications that cannot be costed at present.

Mr. Cope: On the second point, we are pressing for greater detail about the financial effects. That is one of the matters that we have raised in the negotiations.

The proposed trading directive on personal protective equipment follows the pattern that I was outlining. The Government welcome the aim of ensuring Community-wide standards in this important area. We want to increase the safety levels that are enjoyed here. Of course, the proposal in some respects requires more comprehensive safeguards than current United Kingdom legislation provides and, if it is adopted in its present form, new regulations may be required. I hasten to add, especially for the benefit of the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer), that such new regulations will come to this House for decision. We shall also consult interested bodies in the usual way on any legislative changes that appear to be necessary.

Mr. Cryer: Presumably the regulations will be made under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974, which is the empowering primary legislation. Will the Minister confirm that that Act requires all regulations made under it at least to maintain and improve the standards of existing health and safety at work legislation? Is it true that it would be impossible for the Minister to lower standards under United Kingdom legislation if the Government maintain this way of producing statutory instruments?

Mr. Cope: Yes, it would be impossible under the Act for us to lower standards because of section 2(1), which I think has that effect. Any new regulations would most likely be introduced under that section, although we are speaking hypothetically now.

Rev. Ian Paisley: The Minister said that if there was a change it would come before the House. Will that be done by means of an Order in Council, negative or positive orders, or what? The document states that most of the necessary changes could be effected by regulations under the enabling powers. The Minister knows full well that Ministers could use enabling powers that would not come before the House.

Mr. Cope: We are discussing hypothetical changes in regulations. I cannot lay down absolutely the precise terms in which they would come forward. The most likely form, as I told the hon. Member for Bradford, South, would be under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974.

Mr. Heffer: I understand that this is a consultative document about which we are being asked for our views. It then returns to the Commission, which may or may not change the proposals in it. Ministers will discuss them and then decide. How will they return to the House? Will we have the right to talk about them or to vote on them? Will we simply be instructed about the outcome. People in this country want to know what our role in this legislation is, and we have a right to be told the position clearly.

Mr. Cope: I shall try to spell it out as clearly as possible, but I believe that it is well understood that the regulations and all the directives provide minimum standards. After this debate and discussion of the points made in it, discussion will continue in the Council of Ministers and in the expert committees. Expert opinion is sought on many of these detailed matters. A parallel discussion will continue in the European Parliament. Ultimately, the documents will come before the Council of Ministers for decision. In most cases, the decision will be made under article 118A, which means qualified voting.

If the Council of Ministers reaches a unanimous decision, the document will become a directive. If it does not, the European Parliament will play a larger role in producing amendments. Under the procedures of the Community, the document in its final form will become Community law. That would lay down minimum standards. It is then for each member Government to determine whether their legislation complies with the minimum standards—for example, whether the requirements include the wearing of a hard hat on a construction site or in a heavy workshop. We believe that most of our standards are higher than those applied elsewhere, but, if we reached the conclusion that our standards were not above the minimum laid down, we should have to return to the House, almost certainly under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act, to propose a different regulation for decision by the House.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Am I right in believing that if the Danes and the Italians were to support us in voting against a regulation, that would not be a qualified majority?

Mr. Cope: I do not recall the figures on the qualified majority, but I shall answer my hon. Friend later when I have had an opportunity to do the arithmetic.

Because of the procedure that I described to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer), it is too early to say precisely which form the directives will take. None will be adopted unless it is acceptable to a majority of member states. But the high standards set by our legislation or established in practice will stand us in good stead in the negotiations, as well as in the future when minimum standards are adopted. The instruments can only improve health and safety in the United Kingdom.

There is no easy sliding scale of bad, medium and good by which one can measure a company's health and safety standards. There are often valid alternative approaches to individual problems, and an entire regime is even more difficult to grade. In any case, this is not a static scene. Everyone is learning all the time, new hazards arise and new ways of dealing with old hazards arise all the time. The countries of Europe learn from each other. But health and safety standards in the United Kingdom are better than those in most of our European partner countries.

Nothing in the European documents could lower our standards. They propose only minimum standards, and we are free to continue the higher standards in our domestic legislation if we wish. If we believe that to be right, we shall do so. We are also free to introduce higher standards in the future.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): I apologise for missing the first part of the Minister's statement. Does he agree that, although it is not mandatory to adopt the minimum standards, once the single market is in place the Government may receive representations from employers' organisations and others saying that our higher standards discriminate against them unfairly because they involve extra costs? Is that not a probability?

Mr. Cope: It is a possibility, but our standards are accepted by employers. In any case, we do not wish to lower our standards and certainly could not do so by regulation under section 2(1) of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act. Of course, we could introduce primary legislation, but that would require full discussion in the House. In all cases, the regulations that apply here are and will continue to be those which are laid down by Parliament. All that the documents do is to lay down the minimum standards that we and our partners must maintain.

Our standards will not slip, but, as the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) said, employers could perceive problems at the other end of the scale. If the requirements are too bureaucratic or restrictive, they will weaken the competitiveness not just of Britain but of the entire Community. Everyone involved in health and safety measures knows that if they are overdone they can bring everything to a standstill and work can become impossible. Over-elaborate precautions are difficult to enforce or to maintain in the work force.

Europe must remain competitive. The idea of the European Community is not just to trade with each other —equal health and safety regulations across the Community would facilitate that—but to have a home market of 320 million people with which to trade with the rest of the world. It is no good erecting even hurdles across Europe if we cannot compete elsewhere. The health and safety regime must not be obstructive, but it must be effective. As every employer would recognise if he reflected on it, accidents are usually more expensive than safety precautions, and big accidents are very expensive for employers, in terms not only of money but of human suffering, anxiety and misery. No business can afford accidents.

All health and safety regimes must be a balance of those considerations. The European documents mentioned in the motion provide such a balance. We welcome the principles behind the proposals. I shall do my best to respond to questions asked by hon. Members during the debate. In the meantime, I commend the motion to the House.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): It is difficult to exaggerate the importance of health and safety at work. One need only read the statistics on accidents and deaths to recognise the importance of the regulations and other provisions. Last year there were more than 700 deaths and 20,000 major accidents at work, and as many as 20,000 people died from occupational diseases. There can be no dispute about the significance of this legislation and the importance of ensuring that all practical measures are taken to reduce risks to workers.

Responsibility for enforcing pretty well all the regulations that will arise from these directives will rest with the Health and Safety Executive. The Opposition have been critical of the Government's failure to provide adequate resources to the Health and Safety Executive to allow it to carry out its important work. It was as a result of pressure from the Labour party, and during a debate initiated by the Opposition last December, that the Secretary of State announced that the money available to the executive would be increased by £6·7 million in the current year. He specifically undertook to ensure that there would be 40 more factory and agricultural inspectors, in place by the end of this financial year, in April. I draw his attention to the fact that, according to the latest figures that I received from the Government, at the end of last month there were 776·5 inspectors in place on 1 October.

I trust that the Government will reach their target of 40 more inspectors this year, because that is a modest target. It will still mean that the number of inspectors is very much lower than it was when the Government came to office in 1979. These inspectors have to enforce so many more additional regulations and have so many additional responsibilities that this increase, welcome as it is, falls a long way short of what is needed. I hope that, if not in this debate, then shortly, the Government will take the opportunity to make it clear that they intend substantially to increase the resources for, and the number of staff working in, the Health and Safety Executive. In 1979 there were 912 agricultural and general factory inspectors compared to the 776·5 that I mentioned earlier.

I was grateful to receive from the Department of Employment, on 27 October, some answers in response to written questions about what responsibilities the Health and Safety Executive had lost and gained since 1979. The losses were listed as the industrial air pollution inspectorate, which was transferred to the Department of the Environment, and the "inspection and enforcement responsibility" in zoos, which was transferred to local authorities. I was, however, given a long list of the responsibilities that the executive had acquired since 1979. These were:

"(i) carriage by road, classification, packaging and labelling of dangerous substances;
(ii) notification of new and existing substances before they are placed on the market;
(iii) action under the European directive on the control of industrial major accident hazards;
(iv) mains gas safety;
(v) asbestos licensing;
(iv) the enforcement of part 3 of the Food and Environmental Protection Act and its related Control of Pesticides regulations."—[Official Report, 27 October 1988; Vol 139. c. 380.]

We must tell the Government, forcefully and firmly, that we believe that they have failed to provide the Health and Safety Executive with the resources that it needs to have the chance effectively to enforce these important regulations.

Naturally, attention has focused on health and safety and accidents generally, particularly in the past couple of years, in the light of the major tragedies of the Herald of Free Enterprise, the King's Cross fire and the Piper Alpha disaster. The Government have to rethink their aproach to these matters. Lives have been lost as a consequence of failure to provide adequate resources to enforce health and safety in various installations and at work generally.

Mr. Cryer: Will my hon. Friend accept that as well as these startling, dramatic and tragic accidents, there has been a continuing erosion of standards, of which the Government are unaware because they no longer collect statistics of those who are off work for three or more days through injury? As a result, if there is a spate of industrial accidents resulting in back injuries, or of hands being chopped off by an imported machine, the Government are no longer aware of that, so they are not able to take remedial action. It is lamentable that the Government are denying information to the Health and Safety Executive, to the trade unions, to workers and to the employers, who may be just as concerned to take remedial action.

Mr. Strang: My hon. Friend is right. That change in the method of recording these accidents was a retrograde step. It is not just that the newer statistics that we are getting as a result of the new procedures are not comparable, but that less information about accidents is available.

We rightly focus a great deal of attention on major accidents and hope that the Government will respond fully to the King's Cross inquiry and report. However, if someone is killed in an accident involving 100 people, it is no more serious than if a person is killed in an accident involving a couple of people. Therefore, we have to recognise that just as important as the incidents that hit the headlines are all the other accidents which occur throughout the year and which we must do everything that we can to reduce.

The Minister said that Britain's safety standards are usually among the highest in Europe. However, he must accept that they are not necessarily the highest, and that Scandinavia, although it is not in the European Community, sometimes has higher standards than ours, as do the Germans. The fundamental question over the next couple of years is whether, in pursuit of universal standards, Britain equalises down or up.

I can give an example of where standards are higher in West Germany than they are here—an example quoted in an article in The Observer yesterday. The report is headed:

"Death probe into DIY best-seller" and says:

"Deaths and illness among workers producing Britain's best-selling do-it-yourself timber treatment are being investigated by . . . the Health and Safety Executive."

It lists the chemicals as lindane, tributyltin oxide and pentachlorophenol, or PCP. As the Minister may know, I have been in correspondence with the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Lee), the Under-Secretary of State for Employment, about PCP, because of the concern about the use of this chemical. I have also been in correspondence with the German embassy, because this chemical is banned in West Germany. I mention that as an example of German standards being higher than ours. I trust that the Minister, particularly in the light of the report in The Observer, will be able to show the House that the Department is moving quickly in these matters, and will assure us that if it is necessary to ban that chemical, or all three chemicals, the Government will do so and will see that the regulations are effectively carried out. The chemical of particular concern is that which is still in use, PCP.

The directives have arisen as a result of article 118A of the Single European Act. This requires minimum harmonised standards on health and safety to be introduced throughout the European Community by qualified majority voting. Because the directives rely on the majority vote, and not the previous consensus, no individual Government will be able to drag their heels. The effect of article 118A will, nevertheless, be varied. The article is qualified by a section that will allow any Government to avoid stringent impositions. This states, quite simply:

"such directives shall avoid imposing administrative, financial and legal constraints in a way which would hold back the creation and development of small and medium sized undertakings."

It is not clear what is understood by "medium sized", but with moves in the 1980s towards smaller companies, it is feasible that a large number of employers could be exempted from the article's provisions.

As I understood it, the Minister of State said that the directives were intended to be sufficiently flexible and would, in practice, apply to all undertakings, regardless of their size. It would be helpful if he would confirm that, as a substantial number of workplaces might not be covered by the directives and regulations that follow from them. I should be grateful if the Minister would explain what he means by the phrase "medium size" in that context.

Even more important, a harmonised standard might be agreed below the British level which, in many cases, would be unfair. The Government will be afforded the opportunity of reducing British standards, while simultaneously claiming that they are complying with European regulations. Again, there has been some discussion about that and some helpful interventions were made in the Minister's speech. As I understand it, the Government intend standards to be harmonised upwards.

Two issues are involved here. First, there is the question of what the directive will say. We would welcome it if the Government would clarify their intention. Following these directives, a great deal of discussion will take place in a range of specialised committees. The Government must make it clear that they will argue for harmonisation upwards and for the highest and most stringent standards. The highest standards will often, but not always, be found in Britain.

Mr. Heffer: The memorandum states that in most European countries concerned the legislation does not apply to the self-employed. Self employment is growing considerably in the construction industry and is leading to death and injury on a scale that we have not known before. Will my hon. Friend obtain an assurance from the Government that the directive will apply to the self-employed in the construction industry? If it does not, the position will become even more dangerous.

Mr. Strang: My hon. Friend brings me to my second point. We hope that, in general directives, the Government will aim to achieve harmonisation upwards. However, in the case of a directive that would enable lower standards to prevail throughout Britain, we must ensure that the Government maintain the higher standards that the Minister has confirmed this afternoon. To their credit, many of the regulations apply just as much to the self-employed as they do to other employees in, for example, the construction industry. In agriculture, the pesticide regulations, enforced as a consequence of the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985, apply as much to self-employed farmers as they do to farm workers. The agriculture inspector is, rightly, just as concerned about the farmer as he is about the farm worker.

I hope that the Community will include the self-employed in the measure. However, regardless of what it decides, I hope that the Minister will make it clear that, if any directive provides health and safety standards only in respect of employees, there will be no question of the Government eliminating or loosening any regulations that apply to the self-employed in this country.

We should not distinguish between a self-employed person and an employee in respect of health and safety. We might distinguish between a large workplace, a medium-size workplace and a small workplace, but we should not be more concerned about an employee than about a self-employed person. However, we must recognise that, without regulations, some employers would be under commercial pressure to submit their workers to health and safety conditions which they would not accept themselves, in an attempt to maximise their profits. The regulations are designed to reduce that problem.

As the Minister has confirmed, the measure makes specific provision for a member state to maintain higher standards than those agreed. Britain would often be in that position. However, the parts of the Single European Act and the treaty of Rome covering the elimination of import-export restrictions will force Britain to import equipment and goods which conform to European safety standards, but fall well below our standards. The Health and Safety Commission can do nothing in the face of that loss of sovereignty. My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) mentioned that in his intervention. There is all the more reason for achieving harmonisation upwards, because we do not want equipment to be manufactured to a high standard for use in workplaces and, at the same time, more equipment and machinery to be imported into the country which does not conform to our safety regulations.

Even when the Government have increased the factory inspectorate staff to a more acceptable level, we must recognise that the responsibility for implementing the regulations lies with the management, often with the support and encouragement of trade unions and their health and safety representatives. I hope that the Government will reverse their approach to the provision of greater resources in respect of health and safety at work and, as a result of the parent directive, rethink their approach to the crucial role that trade union representatives can play in the workplace in maintaining and improving health and safety standards.

As the Minister said, the framework directive is accompanied by five daughter directives. The framework directive places general health and safety responsibilities on the employer, who would be required "—to evaluate health and safety risks and introduce preventive measures . . . to designate competent personnel or to use outside agencies or individuals; to make arrangements for first-aid, fire precautions, and emergency procedures; to maintain certain records and to draw up reports on accidents and diseases; to provide information to workers; to consult workers or their representatives on health and safety measures; to provide health and safety training for workers, to allow workers' representatives with specific responsibilities for health and safety time off with pay to carry out their responsibilities and to allow them to receive appropriate training."

I do not think that any Opposition Members would fault those objectives, and I should like to think that the House would be unanimous in its support of them. That is why we welcome the general framework directives.

The five daughter directives relate to workplaces, work equipment, personal protective equipment, work with VDUs and the handling of heavy loads. The Minister of State referred specifically to the daughter directive relating to VDUs. One might say that the reason why we shall not need to change our legislation to conform with the directive on VDUs is that Britain does not have regulations and legislation that govern their use. I was interested to hear the Minister imply that he doubted whether there was a case for such a directive. I hope that he will make some attempt to justify that.

There have been many reports that workers' health can be damaged by the use of VDUs. The directive refers to the need for workers to be given eye tests, and, of course, such eye tests must be carried out regularly to monitor any adverse affects. Another question about VDUs is the low-level radiation that they generate. There is a need to ensure that people do not work in close proximity to

[Mr. Strang]

VDUs, particularly to the rear of them. The Government should think again if they are arguing against the principle of a directive to govern VDUs.

Mr. Cope: I apologise for perhaps not having made it clear enough that we believe that VDUs should be governed by general regulations, by the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 and other legislation. We are arguing about whether specific regulations are needed to cover VDUs.

Three separate research projects on VDUs are being carried out, which have been commissioned by the Health and Safety Executive, and we shall, of course, study them carefully. At present, medical and scientific evidence suggests strongly that the use of VDUs is not a high-risk activity and that it can be covered by general health and safety at work regulations and by the equivalent European regulations.

Mr. Strang: I understand that position, but I think that we shall return to the subject in the years ahead. I must tell the Minister that I doubt whether his view will be sustained for many more years. The Minister referred to research that is being conducted, and we shall be interested to learn the results. A dialogue will no doubt ensue. I realise that we do not introduce regulations for the sake of it, but do so on the basis of hard evidence and the evidence on VDUs will need to be examined. There is no doubt that many employees and trade unions are worried about the effects of VDUs, and I doubt whether they are convinced that there is no need for directives and regulations such as those that apply to other equipment and machinery.

The hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) referred to the possibility that different standards might apply to new workplaces and existing workplaces. That question arises when one considers the daughter directive, and it is an important one. If a distinction is to be made between new and existing workplaces, that can be justified only if the new workplaces are subject to higher standards. I presume that we shall seek to make major improvements in standards and to impose more stringent conditions for new workplaces, so it will not be practical to expect all existing workplaces to change to new machinery or practices overnight. Provided that new workplaces have to meet higher standards, we shall be prepared to consider differing standards between new and existing workplaces.

My next point is equally valid. If it is believed to be necessary to make a distinction between the standards that apply to new and existing workplaces, the period during which that applies should be finite. I should take a considerable amount of persuading that the period should ever be more than five years. Existing workplaces should have five years in which to modify or replace equipment, alter buildings or make other changes to achieve the standards that will be enforced in new workplaces. As we are trying to achieve higher standards, the different standards should operate in parallel for a limited time. That approach would be acceptable. Of course, an ideal approach, when practical, would be to ensure that standards are universal.

I should like to reiterate a point that I believe to be important. I hope that the Minister will be forthright and give the House an undertaking that the Government are not prepared to accept any erosion in the standard of our regulations on health and safety at work as a result of harmonisation or European Community directives. In some limited instances, that may mean that our employers will have to meet standards that are significantly more stringent—even with the new directives—than those in certain European countries and that they may have higher costs.

We must take a clear stand on these matters, and I hope that the Government will make it clear that there will never come a time when, as a result of the directive and subsequent discussions, they will come to the House and argue that, on the grounds of competition, there must be a reduction in our standards. I hope that the Minister will give a clear undertaking on that and that the Government will insist on maintaining—or improving—standards year by year. That is the only way in which we can reduce the large number of deaths from occupational diseases. We do not know, for example, how many people who die from cancer have contracted it as a result of conditions at work. As industry becomes more complex and new substances are used, the minimum assurance that the Minister must give—if we are to improve standards—is that no European Community directive will lead to the British Government reducing standards through our domestic regulations.

5.57 pm

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): What happened before the debate started has proved that we are discussing a substantial topic tonight—the complete review of our health and safety legislation. The most disturbing constitutional aspect of that is that, to the best of my knowledge, although we are discussing fundamental changes in health and safety legislation, I doubt whether commerce and industry have the slightest idea of what we are doing. I doubt whether the trade unions have the slightest idea and I question whether any hon. Member has received representations from, for example, the Confederation of British Industry or the Trades Union Congress about the proposals, many of which are fundamentally important to them.

We are engaged in a discussion in a new kind of democracy in which, sadly, the views of the House of Commons are largely irrelevant, apart from having a minor advisory role. The views of the European Parliament are certainly irrelevant, apart from its having a minor advisory role. Laws are being made for Britain on the structure of the Council of Ministers, with advice from the Commission. This is only the beginning. I hope that industry, commerce and the people of this country are aware of what is happening.

Mr. Cope: I want to reassure my hon. Friend immediately that, to my certain knowledge, the TUC and the CBI are fully aware of the proposals. Only a few days ago, at its request, I went to a meeting of the CBI's safety committee. The CBI showed a deep knowledge of these proposals and I believe that the same deep knowledge exists in the TUC.

Mr. Taylor: I am sure that the CBI and the TUC have been in touch with the Minister, but that underlines my point. I am sure that neither body has the slightest idea of what we—the British Parliament—are doing tonight. Hon. Members are well aware that, when Parliament is to debate legislation over which we have some control, we receive representations from organisations such as the CBI and the TUC, as well as from individual trade unions and employers' associations. We are now working on a different basis—in a new kind of democracy in which the Houses of Parliament are largely irrelevant and have only a minor advisory role. The fact that the CBI and the TUC have been in touch with the Minister proves that the real decisions are made by the Council of Ministers and the Commission in its advisory capacity.

Perhaps even more worrying is the fact that the Government's view will not necessarily prevail. Whether the Government want it or not, expensive and costly legislation may be imposed on British employers, manufacturers and trade unions. Unfortunately, the process is just beginning. Only last Thursday we debated a provision abolishing a major Act of Parliament against the wishes of the United Kingdom Government and against the wishes, I am sure, of the average United Kingdom consumer. The sooner the people of Britian are aware that we are embarking on a new form of democracy so that they can take it into account, the better served they will be.

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend agree that we are debating the directives because the Select Committee on European Legislation recommended them for debate? I am sure that he would not wish to give the impression that that Committee—or indeed others who, like him, are vigilant in these matters—does not try to ensure that the British Parliament is fully involved.

Mr. Taylor: I should certainly like it if the British Parliament was involved in redrafting the safety legislation. I would in no way wish to discredit the Select Committee, which does an excellent job in recommending matters for debate. However, my hon. Friend, who makes an attempt to study the documents in detail, is fully aware that our views are largely irrelevant. I am sure that hon. Members who care about democracy——

Rev. Ian Paisley rose——

Mr. Taylor: Just such an hon. Member wishes to intervene.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Is it not a fact that under the present arrangements it is impossible for the House to debate legislation in full, to make amendments or to have a real say in any changes?

Mr. Taylor: The hon. Member is absolutely right. Tonight we are to debate the equivalent of four major Bills, each of which would normally have not only a Second Reading but a detailed Committee stage, during which hon. Members could try to make changes. Only a handful of hon. Members are here for the debate because they are aware not only that our decisions on the documents are irrelevant but that we could not in any case make any changes. We should be kidding ourselves if we suggested that our views were in any way relevant. That was the point that I sought to make. The hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) probably has a larger mail bag than most hon. Members and he will know that it is normal to receive recommendations, letters and requests for meetings. I suggest that no one outside the House has the slightest idea of what is going on tonight and that, even if he did, it would make very little difference.

We are not discussing a small matter. We are discussing major changes in legislation that could have a substantial effect—possibly frightening, possibly improving—on the organisation of industry and commerce. We know that the Council of Ministers rather than the Government will decide what happens. Nevertheless, it would help if we could have a broad outline of the view that the Government will take when they go to the Council of Ministers.

I am concerned about the VDU directive, which would add substantially to industry's costs. According to the Minister,

"There are . . . doubts about the usefulness of the proposal" and I wonder whether the Government could give us some idea of the extent to which such a provision would add to costs and whether their view has any support among other member states. That is a most important point.

Secondly, I am concerned about what appears to be a new principle—the principle of different standards being applied to existing firms' old factories and new factories. That would inevitably result in an increase in rentals and an increase in the cost of old factories compared with new factories. We are about to embark on legislation that would permit firms operating in any Community country to apply different safety standards to old and to new buildings.

Probably more important than any other question is whether the Government would be willing to ask about policing. We know that they cannot promise us anything when it comes to the Common Market. They perpetually come forward with great ideas. They repeatedly say that they have pledges on the control of Common Market expenditure. That is just a joke. The EEC merely uses an accountancy device and changes the year from 12 to 10 months. We know what happens then. We have continually heard statements about the reform of the common agricultural policy. If we believe them, we are just kidding ourselves. Nothing happens. Expenditure continues to increase and, although we are promised reductions, they never happen.

I am reminded of the time when as the director of a business I went to Dublin to meet some bankers, who gave us a presentation on the prospects for the Republic of Ireland. A series of wonderful graphs on the wall showed a sharp decline followed by a sharp increase. That gave us the impression that things were improving in the Republic. However, we later discovered that all the upturns related to what they thought would happen in the future. We constantly find that happening with the EEC.

I appreciate that the Government have very limited powers. On the other hand, it would make a huge difference if we could know about policing. Will the new laws that we draw up be applied? Earlier today we heard a splendid statement from the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster about shipbuilding. We know that it is a joke, because, although the Government will obey the sixth directive in the amount that they give to industry, those involved know that if they are turned down in Britain, they can always get a better deal in France and in two other countries in the Community.

The poor old Chancellor of the Exchequer is in a real mess. He is having to change his policies because our trade has gone haywire. We all know that a former positive trade balance with the EEC has become a horrendous deficit, not because of inefficient British managers or lazy British workers but because things happen in other EEC countries that do not happen here. The main problem is with the Federal Republic of Germany and the inner German trade agreement. We all know that goods flow into East Germany and West Germany because of the inner German trade agreement. When they come here they are meant to have 20 per cent. added value but that does not happen because the policing is the responsibility of the Government of the Federal Republic.

[Mr. Taylor]

I am worried that, whereas we shall apply the proposals, other countries will not. It is not good enough for the Government to say, "We shall do our best and write to the Commission." If the Minister has any doubts, he should ask the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport what happened to the Southend bus. The regulations were clear. There was an application for a bus service going to Frankfurt but, despite the fact that the law was clear and precise, we had four years of discussion involving the Foreign Secretary and the Under-Secretary, who took infraction proceedings at Brussels. It worries me sick that no matter how hard we try to apply the rules they will simply not be applied elsewhere.

How could we police the proposals? We are transferring responsibility for making at least 80 per cent. of our laws from the House to the EEC. M. Delors was quite right, although I deplore the fact that law-making powers are being switched from the House to the Council of Ministers. If that is to happen, we must ensure that laws are properly applied in different parts of the Community. That means having a mobile and effective police force. It means that there must be someone with authority who can tell a member state on behalf of the Commission that it is breaking the rules, and that action has to be taken. That form of Euro-constitutional policing may be regarded as having frightening implications by some but it would not be nearly as frightening as what is happening at present. We apply 99 per cent. of the rules—although perhaps not all in agriculture—but we know that that is not happening in other countries.

The Minister will have to go along with a proposal that will have the effect of rewriting our health and safety rules. We know that he will not win if he takes issue with it. We know that he will have to tell the House, "We must apply legislation that we do not want. It will damage our industry by adding to its costs." That is not my hon. Friend's fault. He is the most charming and kindly member of the Government, but he cannot overturn the treaty of Rome. He may well have to return to the House and say, "I am sorry, but we must apply these foolish, nasty and irrelevant rules because we lost in the Council of Ministers." I feel sorry for my hon. Friend. He is a kindly and agreeable Minister and entitled to our sympathy.

Before my hon. Friend agrees to the proposal, I ask him to try hard to secure effective policing. It is not good enough to say that the Government will appeal to the Commission or take the matter to the European Court, because my hon. Friend will be aware from the papers that have been placed in the Library that, effectively, the court does not have jurisdiction. The issue rests with individual member states. As I have said, something more will have to be done.

Will the Minister return to tell us that our health and safety rules will have to be changed and that we shall have to have new divisions between old factories and new factories? Will he have to tell us that regulations on the use of VDUs will have to be introduced? There are one or two Labour Members who still do not like the Common Market, but they will be cheering like mad once they learn what is in the documents. They provide that employees' representatives are entitled to time away from work, without reductions in pay, to consider their responsibilities under the directive. An employer will not be able to sack or get rid of an employee, or suspend him, if he is involved in work which comes within the terms of the directive. That is basically rewriting the Government's employment legislation. There are some people, including perhaps Mr. Arthur Scargill, who will cheer like mad when they become aware of the nature of some of the proposals.

The Minister may have to tell us, "I am sorry, but we must apply this legislation." I appreciate, of course, that in these circumstances the House is pretty irrelevant. It will certainly be irrelevant when about 80 per cent. of our legislation stems from Brussels. It remains vital, however, that we secure proper policing if we take the step—it would have horrified Oliver Cromwell, and probably Charles I as well—of transferring our sovereignty and the responsibility for the making of laws to another legislative body. We must ensure that there is proper policing and implementation in Brussels, which has always been the position here.

Mr. Dalyell: I understand that the hon. Gentleman does not have the necessary resources to make exact calculations, but he has obviously thought about these matters. What would be the general costs of the policing that he advocates?

Mr. Taylor: The costs would be minimal in comparison with the costs of having unequal laws applied. I shall give the hon. Gentleman an example. The House will remember the Southend bus episode and the claim by the Frankfurt länder that there was no suitable place to park a bus. It is necessary to have someone who is in a position to say, "If 800,000 vehicles can be parked in Frankfurt, room can be found for one more bus." There must be someone with authority to say to a member Government, to a länder or a local authority that what it was doing was contrary to the provisions of the treaty and counter to the regulations. A small implementing force would have real effect. There is no point in transferring sovereignty unless we have proper policing.

The Government have no right to determine whether these proposals are enacted. We shall have to try to persuade Denmark, Italy, Greece or Portugal to add their weight to our submissions. The Government cannot say what the law will be because they have no control over what will become law. We cannot say what the law will be because we are in the same position as the Government. Whatever law is applied by the Council of Ministers, it would be nice if it were properly policed and fairly applied.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): The hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) painted an improbable picture of Arthur Scargill and Oliver Cromwell facing each other on opposite Benches. If that were to be the position, I would not like to predict who would come out on top.

The Minister has shown concern about the dilution of the sovereign rights of the House vis-a-vis the European Community and the European Parliament. Concern has been expressed about British employers having to face stricter regulations and health and safety standards than employers in competitor countries. Concern has been expressed also that harmonisation might lead to an increase in the rights of workers to participate in the management of their companies. We heard no concern expressed about the establishment of acceptable minimum standards of health and safety at work across the European Community and in Britain especially. That is a sad reflection on the priorities of Conservative Members. As my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) said, last year there were 700 deaths as a result of major accidents at work. There have been tens of thousands of deaths as a result of occupational diseases as well as tens of thousands of major accidents.

When the Minister opened the debate, he said that the documents reflect the move towards the single European market in 1992 and increased European activity in improving health and safety at work. It seems that the Minister does not consider that Britain will lag behind other EEC countries. He believes that we shall have to face the task of raising the standards of other European countries so that they match our already high standards. The motion asks the House to support the proposals in principle as a step towards the establishment of comparable high standards of health and safety throughout the Community. The Government are telling us, in effect, that Britain should take the lead in imposing health and safety standards across the EEC. Those are fine words, and it is good to hear the Government profess that they are concerned about the standards of health and safety that apply to workers throughout Europe.

The Government's protestations are hardly convincing. We must consider their record since they took office in 1979. The Minister has said that British standards will not be diluted, but some Conservative Members have said that the key is the administrative machinery in any individual member country and not standards of health and safety that are set out in legislation. There must be effective machinery to enable individual member countries to enforce the standards that are laid down in law to meet the health and safety standards for workplaces. Our administrative machinery leaves much to be desired, and I hope that the Minister will respond to that comment when he replies.

Since 1979-80 the Government have relentlessly pursued expenditure cuts. That has led, directly or indirectly, to a freeze on recruitment to the Health and Safety Executive and a reduction in the strength of the factory inspectorate from 764 in 1979 to fewer than 550 today. There are only 49 factory inspectors for the whole of Scotland. No Government can be proud of such a record. It is all very well for the Minister to profess concern about standards and to talk about raising European standards to the already high British standards, but actions must speak louder than words. The actions of the Government have shown that they lack any commitment to the enforcing of health and safety standards in Britain. They should direct their efforts to enforcement here before they start preaching to other European countries.

Symptomatic of the Government's lack of action in encouraging the enforcement of health and safety standards is the closure of the Health and Safety Executive's office in Dundee in April. It was closed despite the presentation to the House of a petition bearing 4,000 signatures. I presented the petition, which was organised by one of my constituents, Margaret Malcolm. It united almost all public opinion in the city in support of retaining the office. The petition was ignored by the Minister and the Government generally. The office was closed despite the fact that in the week preceding closure a blitz by out-of-town inspectors on the construction industry in Dundee led to more than 250 prohibition notices. That highlights the fact that much is left to be desired in terms of health and safety standards in workplaces.

To give some idea of the significance of the issuing of 250 prohibition orders in Dundee, we can compare that with a similar blitz in London which even I, as a representative of Dundee, would admit is a bigger city than mine. In London 350 prohibition notices were issued, yet 250 were issued in Dundee. The Government's answer was to close the Health and Safety Executive office in Dundee and to tell the people there that they will be covered by the offices in Aberdeen and Edinburgh. Because of understaffing, those offices are already overstretched and they will be even further stretched by the closure of the Dundee office.

All that is a far cry from the all-party agreement in 1974 about target staffing of 4,000, including more than 1,050 factory inspectors, for the Health and Safety Executive. Those targets have not been achieved by the Government. The Government have fallen far short of the figures, and there has been a reduction in staff from 764 to fewer than 550 since 1979.

The Minister also boasted that the British figures for fatal accidents were among the best in Europe. What about the figures for major accidents? They have risen 30 per cent. since 1980, during which time staffing levels of the factory inspectorate have fallen by 28 per cent. If the Minister cannot see a connection between those two facts, he is the only one who cannot.

We live in times when the demands on the factory inspectorate and the Health and Safety Executive are increasing. More workers than ever before are covered by the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974. For example, the Health Service has lost Crown immunity against prosecution. That means that there are many more workplaces for factory inspectors and other inspectors to cover. New European directives require inspectors to accommodate more detailed and complex standards and to investigate more workplaces more closely.

We live in times when the workplace is becoming ever more dangerous—and the King's Cross and Piper Alpha disasters testify to that. In Dundee last Friday more than 200 16 and 17-year-olds ran out of entitlement to bridging allowance and were forcibly conscripted into training places under the youth training scheme. No one knows what standards of health and safety will apply to those training places because the Government have abolished the area manpower boards which used to have local authority and trade union input to monitor and defend standards for YTS places. Those boards have been swept aside and 16 and 17-year-old youngsters are being forced into jobs in which no one can guarantee that the health and safety standards will be acceptable. It is strange for the Government to boast about their record on health and safety in the light of that.

The Government's commitment to health and safety is entirely a paper one. They do not really mean it. Far from telling us that we should support the directives in principle —which I hope all my colleagues will do tonight—they should tell us what they are going to do to enforce the principles and standards of health and safety which will reach the statute book.

[Mr. John McAllion]

When the Minister replies I hope that he will tell us what the Government intend to do about proper funding and staffing for the Health and Safety Executive and for the factory inspectorate. I hope that he will also tell us whether it will ever be in the Government's remit to reopen the office in Dundee, which the people in Dundee demand should be reopened in the light of increasing dangers to youngsters and many other workers in the city as a result of the lack of application of health and safety standards which the Government should be defending.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Like the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion), we are all in favour of good health and safety at work legislation. It is one of those "motherhood and apple pie" political issues which no elected Member of Parliament can possibly oppose. The vast generalities of principle that we have heard enunciated tonight are in many cases so broad and vague that naturally we are all in favour of them. However, when we get down to the small print in the directives, a new and rather more disturbing picture emerges.

I begin with a strong word of protest which is general to our proceedings this afternoon and specific to this motion. My protest is that it is a physical and parliamentary impossibility for the House to scrutinise EEC directives and documents on the basis requested by the Government today. We are being asked to scrutinise more than 450 pages of highly technical draft legislation, which may have very profound effects and which are of considerable legal complexity, all in the course of half a day's business. That asks us to take part in a charade, a sham and a fraud on our constituents. The health and safety directives will affect every employer, employee, worker and workplace in this country, and they run to more than 175 pages. That is equivalent to three or four major Bills by British domestic legislation standards.

I heartily endorse the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) that, if we were dealing with the directives as British domestic legislation, Committees of this House would examine them for weeks and the Chamber would debate them for days to get the legislation right. However, we are now going to devote no more than an hour or two of debate to 175 highly technical pages and then throw them to the mercy of the Brussels wolves for majority voting. They will never return to this House in a form in which we can influence or change them. The children's fairy story of the emperor who had no clothes has been replaced by the parliamentary story of the House of Commons that has no time and no power.

Even if we do not have legislative power, at least some of us have the will power to warn the House and the country that some of the EEC directives contain unacceptable material of a kind which is in danger of making 1992 a 1066 for Britain and British industry. In saying that, I am doing no more than voicing the great concern expressed by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in Bruges on 20 September when she voiced some anxieties about what Mr. Jacques Delors calls the social dimension of the EEC's legislative programme. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said:

> "We certainly do not need new regulations which raise the cost of employment and make Europe's labour market less flexible and less competitive with overseas suppliers."

Later in her speech in Bruges she said:

> "Our aim should not be more and more detailed regulation from the centre."

I am surprised to see the directives and the motion appearing in the name of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, who said one thing in Bruges while her colleagues appear to break her Bruges commandments with the introduction of the directives.

The general principles of the draft directives may be found in the explanatory memorandum on page 2 of the 175-page bundle under discussion. Paragraph 2 states:

> "The main aims of the proposal are:
> to improve the safety and health at the workplace"— and we all agree with that—

> "to provide a 'social element' to complement the economic objectives of completion of the internal market."

Paragraph 4.1.2.1. of the financial record sheet, headed

> "Characteristics of the proposed Directive", states that the proposal

> "may be adapted and supplemented . . . to add a 'social element' to the directives of the 'technical harmonisation—internal market' type which relate to the safety and health of workers . . . without having to draw up a complete new directive on social aspects in each case."

That reads suspiciously like a complete political blank cheque to add new paragraphs and principles to the draft directives in order to encompass social dimension objectives. I worry not about the health and safety elements of the proposals, but about the social market and social engineering dimension.

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend agree that the proposal before the House significantly pre-dates the Bruges speech? My hon. Friend is correct in saying that the recitals refer to a social element introduced under the directive. Only the other day, during Prime Minister's Question Time, my right hon. Friend stressed the importance of scrutiny. We are engaged in doing precisely that. Obviously we need to get further back in the decision-making process, so that we may deal with such matters at an earlier stage.

Mr. Aitken: My hon. Friend puts his finger on a profound and important point. Of course we should be getting further back in the decision-making process. This is just an empty ritual, in which our words will not be heeded or have any influence. Even the Prime Minister's Bruges speech is not being heeded. It is all very well for my hon. Friend to say, rightly, that that speech post-dated the directives, but I should like to see a thundering good row at the Rhodes summit.

Mr. Cash: We will probably get one.

Mr. Aitken: I think that that is a good bet. At least we are giving more power to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, if that is necessary—which I doubt.

The directive's social engineering content will in the 1990s do for small workplaces and factories what the Fire Precautions Act 1971 did for small seaside landladies and keepers of boarding houses—drive a good many of them out of business in the name of highly theoretical preventive safety standards. If we ever reach the stage where a statue of Mr. Delors is erected in every town where the regulations destroy a business, he will become one of the most famous anti-heroes since Guy Fawkes.

I ask right hon. and hon. Members to consider for a moment the mass of social engineering detail contained in the proposals, which will undoubtedly push up the costs incurred by small factories. I think of the struggling small factory units in my own constituency and what they will have to cope with if the directives are enforced, and I worry profoundly about them. I read, in the 175-page bundle, nuggets such as that to be found in paragraph 2.7.1:

"The floors of workplaces shall be level, with no unevenness."

In paragraph 2.7.3:

"All-glass partitions . . . shall be made of safety material."

Paragraph 2.9.4:

"Sliding doors shall be fitted with a mechanism to secure them from being lifted off their mountings and falling out."

Paragraph 2.14.3:

"Appropriate measures for the protection of non-smokers shall be taken in staff rest rooms."

That is a good health and safety at work directive—or what I shall call an example of social engineering. Paragraph 2.16.1:

"A first-aid room shall be provided", not just a first-aid box, in factories over a certain size. Paragraph 2.5.3:

"Climate control installations shall not blow or radiate on to work stations."

Paragraph 2.18.1 states that outdoor workers shall be "protected against inclement weather conditions." I can imagine shepherds in the Scottish highlands or North sea trawler deckhands calling in the Euro inspector and saying, "Paragraph 2.18.1 says that we should be protected against inclement weather conditions."

Apart from those Utopian ideals, there are pages and pages more of detailed technicalities and regulations covering machines and protective equipment. There are 56 pages of proposals—for example, that personal protective equipment shall take account of ergonomic requirements and of workers' health. It will be a barrack-room lawyer's charter—a lawyer's gravy train. Claims by employees against their employers will surge.

I ask the same basic question that was asked by the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer): will any of the proposed EC legislation raise standards over and above those that already prevail, thanks to our basic legislation, such as the admirable Health and Safety at Work etc Act 1974?

Will harmonisation and standardisation of the EEC type mean anything more than higher costs and fewer jobs for British factories? I doubt it. I believe that we are going down a dangerous slippery slope of agreeing willy-nilly to any European proposal. The principles may sound good, but when one does one's homework and studies the documentation—and it took me 11 hours to study the 450 pages of bumf that accompanies these regulations to discover a few salient points—the more one comes to the conclusion that such half-baked, ill-thought-out Euro legislation, when compared to the much sounder legislation on our own statute book, is leading us, in a most un-British way, to adopting legislation that will do our country no good whatsoever and perhaps a great deal of harm.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): I do not share the views somewhat scathingly expressed by the hon. Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken). However, it is an important subject. Each year we lose more working days from industrial injury than from strike action.—usually two or three times more, if one excludes exceptional years such as 1979.

Where I differ from the hon. Member for Thanet, South is in my belief that workers should be provided with level floors. If they are carrying heavy loads, or are manoeuvring delicate items, it is important that floors are level and that workers can move about unimpeded. There should be no difference between us in that regard. Not all workshops have the same thickness of carpeting that we have in the House, or the kind of flooring that is scrupulously maintained. We should try to apply the fairly lush standards to which we are accustomed and bear in mind workers' difficulties.

Where I take issue with the massive documents is that they are a recipe for lowering the standards that we already have from United Kingdom legislation. Those in the Labour party and in the trade union movement who are looking to the Common Market as a way of getting around the British Government in attempting to improve standards are looking for moonshine. Our experience is that the Common Market has never provided any improvements in workers' standards. It has devised several high-sounding phrases, and one may consider, for example, the Vredeling directive, which claimed that workers should have rights to information.

What has happened to that proposal? It has been under review for five years, and will continue being under review because it represents a radical change in existing practice. I support any improvement in workers' rights, as I supported the recommendations of the Bullock committee, but that task is one for the Labour and trade union movement to tackle in the United Kingdom, rather than attempt to do so by a back door method that may or may not work. Our experience is that such attempts do not work.

I share the views that have been expressed about the unsatisfactory nature of this debate. To be required to scrutinise this number of documents and pages in this way is less than satisfactory. It really is outrageous. The point has been made that it is the equivalent of a major item of legislation, such as the Housing Bill, where there would normally be 200 or 300 Lords amendments and hundreds in Committee upstairs. We would usually spend 100 or 150 hours in Committee before the Government subjected the measure to their usual guillotine. Instead, we are here dealing with highly technical and complicated matters in the course of three or four hours in one evening. That is less than satisfactory.

It may be argued that we can scrutinise these matters as a member of the EEC Assembly. Incidentally, I understand that it is now called a Parliament, but I never give it that grandiose and mistaken description. In case right hon. and hon. Members do not know, so-called debate in the Assembly is in reality a stitch-up by party leaders, whereby time is allocated down to the last minute, and a major contribution may last only three or four minutes if the speaker is lucky. No real debate takes place.

[Mr. Bob Cryer]

Provisions can be altered only by amendments which are tabled and voted on. Most of the Assembly's time is devoted to voting.

The Assembly might vote on these proposals without debate or with hardly a comment. Voting on the electronic machines, which keep breaking down, might take three, four or five hours. It is an illusion that there will be a little democracy in Strasbourg this week when these documents are debated. Hon. Members do not always know that that happens. If they are like me, it is not until they witness this anachronistic charade in the Common Market that they realise it.

Mr. Cash: Did the hon. Gentleman see an article this weekend in The Economist, entitled "Silly Parliament", which illustrates his point? The article referred to a motion which apparently was based on rumours and nothing else, but was passed by a significant majority.

Mr. Cryer: That happens frequently. I do not want to seem like a 19th century constitutionalist. Although there are many points on which one can criticise this place—I am willing to air them—because the system has developed over the years, there are a large number of loopholes allowing Back Benchers like me to raise issues and put forward views. Unsatisfactory though this debate is, compared with the European Assembly we shall have two or three hours of an exchange of views. Because my views do not often accord with the tenets of the Socialist group, the opportunities for the "dissident voice" to be heard in the EEC Assembly are limited. I hate to sound as though I am a 19th century proponent of Parliament, but it is a richness of this place that the dissident voice can be raised frequently.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: If the hon. Gentleman were able to make the excellent speeches in the European Assembly that he can make here, would he at least agree with the basic point that, irrespective of what the European Assembly or the House says, the Council of Ministers can do whatever it likes and ignore the views of the Assembly and the House?

Mr. Cryer: That is true. Commissioner Marin, who is responsible for the production of some of these documents, told the Assembly last month that he was prepared to disagree with its views. He bluntly said that the conciliation machinery of the Single European Act must be invoked and that he did not accept what had been done, so even the Commission appointees, who, as we know, are subject to patronage, can turn round and tell the Assembly where to go, and they frequently do so.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Is it not a fact that, when matters concerning Ministers of the Council are discussed, sometimes their Bench is empty and the Parliament is talking to itself?

Mr. Cryer: There are frequent complaints about that.

Because it is difficult in a short speech to encompass the complexity of these proposals, I shall pick out page 15 in annex I in the pile of documents which starts with a translation of a letter from Mr. Marin and is numbered SOC 43. It is difficult to pick out the relevant quotation. On the minimum requirements referred to in article 4, paragraph 1, in annex 1 on "The definition of 'machinery' in the Directive concerning the design, manufacture and placing in the market of machinery", the document says:

"The moving parts of a machine shall be protected, if the work allows, by a guard to prevent contact with the workers."

Section 14 of the Factories Act 1961 is much more comprehensive. It states:

"Every dangerous part of any machinery, other than prime movers and transmission machinery, shall be securely fenced unless it is in such a position or such construction as to be as safe to every person employed or working on the premises as it would be if securely fenced."

The Act imposes an absolute obligation, which compares with the rubbery, qualified statement in the document:

"The moving parts of a machine shall be protected, if the work allows, by a guard to prevent contact with the workers."

How does that affect the workers? Because section 14 of the Factories Act 1961 provides an absolute standard, it is much easier for an injured worker to demonstrate to a court—the Act provides for a criminal penalty, but real compensation for a serious injury is obtained through the civil courts—that there has been a breach of the Act. The worker can say, "The employer was negligent and, therefore, my claim will be successful." That is important for a person who will not work again because he has injured his back, lost the use of a limb, or whatever. Many thousands of serious accidents occur every year. The 1961 Act is an important guide to provide some compensation for people who are not likely to work again in their former job or who are likely to have only a light job. I raised that matter during the Minister's speech, but he was not able to give me a clear assurance that the Factories Act 1961 would be retained and given priority over the Common Market proposals.

Any regulations to implement these directives will presumably—the Minister agreed—be introduced under the provisions of the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974. Section 1(2)——

Mr. Cope: I think that I inadvertently referred to section 2(1). The correct provision to which I intended to refer was section 1(2).

Mr. Cryer: I am grateful to the Minister for confirming that I am correct. Section 1(2) states that regulations must be "designed to maintain or improve the standards of health, safety and welfare".

That is a clear statutory obligation on the Minister. No directive to be implemented through regulations could lower standards. The Minister must therefore give a clear assurance to the House that he will not introduce regulations that will breach section 1(2) of the 1974 Act.

It would be useful to be given an assurance that there will be no attempt to repeal the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974. People may say, "It is a well-established Act. We all agree on it." We were all agreed on the Trade Descriptions Act 1972, yet last week an order was passed repealing that legislation because the Commission was challenging it in the European Court.

The Minister may argue that the treaty of Rome provides that member states shall have the right to allow an improved standard if they wish. These directives are being considered under article 118A of the treaty of Rome. The treaty provides an opportunity for both the proponents and the opponents of the directives to go to the European Court. The treaty is not a safeguard. Article 118A says:

"Such directives shall avoid imposing administrative, financial and legal constraints in a way which would hold back the creation and development of small and medium-sized undertakings."

An employer could go to the European Court and say that his business was being inhibited by the regulations under the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 and that he challenged them. Our legislation is, by and large, tried, trusted and well-respected, but it could be open to challenge.

Paragraph 3 of article 118A says:

"The provisions adopted pursuant to this Article shall not prevent any Member State from maintaining or introducing more stringent measures for the protection of working conditions compatible with this Treaty."

That provides the Minister with a safeguard, but it is, as is usual with the Common Market, a highly qualified safeguard.

It is unsatisfactory that further legislation should be enacted by means of statutory instruments. Under the affirmative or the negative procedure it is either all or nowt. We cannot amend statutory instruments, although they can be as complicated and comprehensive as primary legislation. It is most unsatisfactory that great chunks of legislation that are being spewed out by the EEC bureaucrats should be debated here so briefly. They will come before the House later in the form of regulations that will be either adopted in their entirety or rejected. The Whips will get to work. They will talk to Conservative Members and get virtually anything that they want through the House, because only a few of them realise how serious it is to erode the powers of the House.

We cannot even enforce uniform standards in this country. I have in my hand a report from the West Yorkshire low pay unit, dated Wednesday 27 April 1988. It points out that accidents in West Yorkshire are increasing. On page 2 the report says:

"In the year 1986-87, the rate of local authority inspections per 100 premises covered was Bradford: 49"—

I imagine that under Bradford's new Tory control that number will plummet—

"Calderdale: 38; Kirklees: 68; Leeds: 9; and Wakefield: 53."

It does not depend on whether the Conservatives or Labour are in control. Inspections vary, per 100 premises, from nine on the low side to 68 on the high side. How can we except uniformity of inspection in the Common Market by the application of measures that are designed to implement the Single European Act, which is expected to create a single European market in 1992?

There is no inspection of small firms in some EEC states. In other EEC states there is no definition of small firms. Small firms in this country are defined, following the Bolton committee recommendations, as employing up to 200 people, but in other EEC member states small firms are commonly defined as employing fewer than 500 employees. There is a yawning gap. I hope that the Government will fill that yawning gap, or chasm, by creating uniform standards. It is virtually impossible, however, for 12 member states to create uniform standards. In Spain there are virtually no inspections. We can ensure that action is taken in this country, but how can we ensure that action will be taken in Spain, Holland or Belgium? We cannot require their inspectors to prosecute those who flagrantly breach the safety regulations.

United Kingdom inspectors are not too keen on prosecuting offenders. The record of the mines and quarries inspectorate is lamentable. Two workers died because of a fault on a Scotch derrick crane in a Cornish quarry owned by Amey Roadstone. The inspectorate did not intend to prosecute. It was only after I had asked a number of questions in the House that it eventually decided to prosecute. I was able to bring about that prosecution by exerting pressure in this place, but we do not have a cat in hell's chance of exerting similar pressure in the legislatures of other member states. Inspection and subsequent prosecution where breaches of the regulations have been proved will, to say the least, be patchy.

The Minister has not said what will happen if an employer argues that he is being undercut by, say, Belgian employers because their standard of scrutiny is not so rigorous as ours. How can we prevent an employer from going to the European Court and claiming that the competition is unfair and that under the section of the treaty of Rome that I have quoted United Kingdom standards should be lowered, not raised? The Minister may recall that, in a Committee upstairs that considers merit, regulations are being prepared that will lay down general minimum standards, many of which will be implemented by codes of practice instead of by primary legislation. I suggest to him that the draft regulations ought to be put before the House, not for debate, but so that the House could be consulted about them.

It is a matter of criticism that consultation documents are sent to all sorts of bodies but they are never placed in the Vote Office so that Members can consult them. I refer, not to White Papers or Green Papers, but to routine consultation documents, often of a technical nature, that should be provided for Members of Parliament, but they are not even placed in the House of Commons Library.

Are these regulations in draft form, known as the COSHH—Control of Substances Hazardous to Health —regulations, to supplant primary legislation? Will they depend more on codes of practice and less on primary legislation? Will they be provided to Members of Parliament for their consideration?

The removal of frontiers means that there will be no scrutiny of the importation of dangerous machinery. Under the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 importers of dangerous machinery are obliged to provide a guarantee that their machines are safe for use by workers, but in practice that does not happen. Dangerous machinery is imported, unbeknown to anybody, and is put into use. Somebody is injured, there is then a hue and cry and the machinery is withdrawn, or guards are put on it or repairs are made. Polish light bulbs were not tested, and they exploded in people's homes. Dressings were imported from India, but they were found to be infected with tetanus, so they were not very useful as first-aid dressings.

That will happen again and again if there is no scrutiny of such imports. If we continue in this lacklustre, haphazard fashion and do not employ a single health and safety at work inspector at any of our ports, imported machinery is likely to be dangerous and to injure people. The French and the Germans will carry on their inspections, not at frontiers, but at exhibitions. They inspect installations as well. We should scrutinise machinery before it is installed.

These regulations, letters and minutes are unsatisfactory and I have strong reservations about them, although not for the reasons that Conservative Members have given. I believe that they will lead to a lowering of safety standards. Defending our people in factories, offices, shops and railway premises is vital, and to do that we must improve our standards by maintaining our legislation and ensuring that we have enough inspectors to enforce it.

7.2 pm

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): It is appropriate that an hon. Member from Northern Ireland should take part in this debate because we have experienced what is now happening to the House.

Our legislation is done by Order in Council. We get a very limited time for debate—it is sometimes one and a half hours. Although I am able to table and move amendments to legislation that affects Scotland, England and Wales, I cannot table or move amendments to legislation that affects the area that I represent. The House passes detailed legislation affecting Northern Ireland but Northern Ireland Members are unable to amend it.

In the European context, the House will experience the same difficulty. As today, matters will come before the House but hon. Members will be unable to amend proposals or discuss them thoroughly. Out attention has been drawn to an important document, copies of which have been issued to many thousands of workers and managers in the United Kingdom. It is worthy of study by every hon. Member. The Minister made it clear that whatever was decided about the regulations would be decided by majority vote. The document, issued by the European Commission, says the very opposite. It says:

"items relating to taxation, the free movement of persons and the rights and interests of employees are excluded and will therefore still require unanimity under the Treaty."

Who is right? Is the Minister right when he says that a decision will be made by majority vote, or is the document sent out by the Commission of the European Communities, which has the authority of Delors himself, correct?

The document makes tremendous claims about what will happen in Britain when that wonderful date of 1992 is reached. We are told that we shall have economic gains of £140 billion or more and that millions of new jobs will be created. I remember the pro-Marketeers busily telling us that joining the Common Market would be a panacea for all our ills. We were told that a vast number of jobs would be created and that the challenge would be for people to step in and claim them. We are all deeply concerned about unemployment in our constituencies, so such promises, which are easily made and heralded in glossy documents, deserve our close attention.

How decisions are made is significant. There are three places where they are made. The European Commission is the initiator and the executive. The Council of Ministers is the decision maker. The European Parliament has a consultative supervisory role. It debates proposed European legislation and produces amendments. I have served with the European Assembly for almost two Sessions now, but one has only to go there to see how these issues are debated and settled.

The hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) also attends the European Assembly. He spoke about the electric machines that are used for voting there. Most of the voting, however, is done simply by the raising of hands for the simple reason that the President tells us that there is not enough time to use the machines. It is quicker to vote by the raising of hands. People raise their hands for hours on end.

Mr. Cash: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the document raises serious constitutional issues? This is not some vague constitutional theology but a practical issue. Some 50,000 of these documents have been distributed at every level. Every trade association and every company has received one. That process totally—and apparently deliberately—ignores the existence of the United Kingdom Parliament. Ministers are responsible for carrying out Community legislation which is imposed on us as a result of the European Communities Act 1972.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I agree, but the House took the decision to join the Common Market. We agreed the Single European Act. We shall continue to go down this road. As the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) has said, we have been left with a policing role. It is beyond us now to change what is happening. The House can talk and talk and even vote, but its votes will have no effect because the Council of Ministers will make the decisions. Its decisions will be the law irrespective of whether we like it.

I have a large agricultural sector in my constituency, and we have a processing factory. I was invited, as a Member of the European Assembly, to look around the factory. I spent a day there, and noticed that there were two, three and sometimes four men in each room. I asked who they were and was told that they were EEC inspectors. I was told how many there were. I asked how many I would find if I went that day to a similar factory in France. They said, "You would be fortunate if you saw one." How can any factory compete on those terms? That factory has to pay those inspectors and to police the situation. In those circumstances, it will be impossible for us to compete in the glorious, unlimited market in which millions and billions of pounds can be made.

I agree with the hon. Member for Southend, East that it is a matter of policing and that the House must say to the Common Market, "If these are your rules, they should be the same rules for Spain, Italy, Portugal, France, the Benelux countries and Denmark, and you must keep them." But that is not happening. The same thing happened with fishing when the fisheries Minister of the Republic of Ireland turned a blind eye to the quotas for herring and could not see any ships flying his flag taking herrings above the quota that had been arranged. I went to see the Secretary of State who at the time was a former member of the Royal Navy. I asked him to turn a blind eye, as Nelson did, and do the same for us. He said, "No. If anybody breaks the law, my men will seize their nets and they will pay the price." That is exactly what happened.

We keep the police and EEC rules so well that we are putting our people at a disadvantage. The Common Market goes on breaking its own regulations. In a previous debate today we heard about the directive on shipbuilding. One wonders why they can compete so well, with all the hidden subsidies that they receive.

I am also concerned about the way in which the regulations will be made. I believe that there should be the best possible health and safety for workers and that we should have the highest possible standard. A great deal of good work has been done in the past by workers and by management to bring that about and there is a good heritage in the workplaces of the United Kingdom which should not in any way be surrendered. It worries me that the memorandum states:

"Most of the necessary changes could be effected by Regulations made under the enabling powers of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974".

I should like to ask the Minister—I asked him this before but he did not have time to dwell on the matter—in what way the regulations will be brought before the House. If, for instance, the regulations were rejected by the House, would not the sovereign power of the EEC supersede even the House and would not the laws be brought to bear upon the whole Community? We need some explanation from the Minister on that. He spoke about cases in which powers under the European Communities Act 1972 could be used. Is he proposing an Order in Council system? Will they be affirmative resolutions? Can they be prayed against? What method will be used if any changes are made? It is important that the British people should know what is happening.

I am glad that the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) has put the document to the Clerk and to the Speaker. I consider that the document challenges the authority of the House. It says that the United Kingdom Parliament has no say in regard to laws. It is not even mentioned that the European Commission, the Council of Ministers and the European Parliament are supreme and that through those channels alone shall the laws of this country be made and applied. That is a most serious constitutional point. The House needs to take cognisance of it and it should be pressed home at every opportunity to the Government, to the Speaker and to the House.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): We have had a very interesting argument and some strange alliances have been formed between the two sides of the House on some of the issues of concern. However, the arguments about the loss of sovereignty and involvement of the House are somewhat academic now that we are part of the Common Market. I campaigned against joining the Common Market. Nevertheless, now that we are part of it, we have to accept its rules. The speeches by the Prime Minister, such as the one at Bruges, are empty rhetoric and meaningless in terms of how the procedures will operate, as are her speeches against the common agricultural policy because Britain is only part of the European process. However, it is not all negative and there are advantages in the directives because they apply to all countries.

An argument that has been put to me, and echoed tonight, is that small companies do not object to health and safety legislation so long as that legislation applies fairly across the board and they know that they are not being put at a disadvantage in this country when other countries may be ignoring that legislation. That is relevant to the enforcement of legislation in this country and abroad.

It is likely that the European Parliament will try to impose minimum standards and allow individual countries to decide whether to have higher standards. That is why it is important that the legislation should be seen not as imposing the existing standards for health and safety but the minimum standards.

The Minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I am concerned that the directives do not apply to temporary or mobile work sites. Therefore, they will not apply to building sites. I believe that one of the major weaknesses of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act is its lack of enforcement in places such as building sites and mobile firms such as contractors.

Accidents on building sites have more than doubled in recent years. Only in the past few weeks one of my constituents who was working on a building site in the south of England was tragically killed. I cannot say much about that because there will be an inquest. In another case in my constituency contractors working for the British Oxygen Company were concerned when one of the workers contracted legionnaire's disease. I understand that even though they were concerned about that issue, and even though the Health and Safety Executive was called in—I am not criticising the company which went through all the proper channels for dealing with the case—the workers were ordered to go back to work or face the sack. It concerns me that people should be put in that invidious position before they had been reassured that the risks to their health and safety had been cleared and that the correct procedures had been followed to their satisfaction.

With only just over 500 health and safety inspectors in Britain, how can we be sure that we can enforce the legislation in this country, let alone in Europe? I suspect that when the directives go to other European Paliaments, people there will say, "Look at the United Kingdom. Have we any confidence that it can enforce the regulations?".

The same arguments that we have heard tonight about unfair competition and other countries not applying the letter of the law as closely as we do will be applied against us. We should put our own house in order. Unless we have the correct enforcement procedures and the correct number of inspectors, and unless we keep an eye on building sites, construction sites and contractors' firms, which by their very nature are difficult to watch, the directives and our present laws will simply be a paper tiger with no teeth. They will not be able to protect the work force, which is what they are intended to do. That is the key issue to which we should attend. If we adopt these draft directives, they should be seen to work not only in Europe but in Britain.

Mr. James Cran (Beverley): I cannot pretend that all the arguments have not been rehearsed ad nauseam—and quite rightly. I associate myself with the remarks made on both sides of the Chamber on the importance of the issues before us. I also add my voice to the condemnation of the fact that we have no time to deal with these major changes.

I am somewhat mollified by what my right hon. Friend the Minister said. I hope that he will forgive me when I say that I shall look carefully at Hansard tomorrow. I think that he will agree with me that the representative bodies are worried by the draft directives. They feel that if they are allowed to go through unamended, the competitiveness of individual companies may be adversely affected. I know that that point has been made to my right hon. Friend and that the industrial sector in Britain hopes that the draft directives will be heavily amended.

I agree with those who have said that the ball is in the Government's court. As a Member of Parliament, I shall be able to say a great deal about the directives, but I shall have no influence on the matter.

[Mr. James Cran]

The approach and concept of the draft directives are defective. We have talked about high standards and, in the United Kingdom, high standards are not a problem. I think that it is accepted on both sides of the House that standards in the United Kingdom are very high. The problem—and I am grateful that my right hon. Friend the Minister dealt with it—is that these are very detailed directives and they are a departure from what we have been used to in the United Kingdom in terms of health and safety legislation. I say to my right hon. Friend the Minister, in as polite but strong terms as I can, that the directives will not help employers in any way. Those involved know from experience that the more detailed the health and safety legislation, the lower the standard at which companies tend to implement it.

I agree heartily with the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer), who is not now in the Chamber. I thought that I might feel uncomfortable agreeing with him but I do not, because he was correct. There is a danger that, if the directives go through unamended, there will be a drop in standards in the United Kingdom, and I would be against that. As has been said, that will apply particularly to small and medium-sized enterprises. Is that not ironic when one looks at paragraph 4 of article 118A of the Single European Act, which says that the directives should impose as few constraints as possible on small and medium-sized businesses? The draft directives will do the opposite. That is said not only by me but by the representatives of British firms and companies.

I have looked at many regulations affecting industry over the years, and I can say that these draft directives bear all the hallmarks of excessive haste in drafting. I have found no one who deals with issues such as this who disagrees with that proposition. There has been inadequate consultation by the European Commission, but not by the Government. The Government have been trying to rectify the inadequate consultation. It is regrettable that the little representation sought by the EEC has been largely ignored. Ultimately we will have a terrible muddle, the resolution of which will involve the Council of Ministers in endless, protracted discussions.

Absolute safety at work is impossible. Anyone who has anything to do with safety at work is aware of that. However, that does not mean that we are not unified in wanting to attain the highest standards possible. The draft directives try to achieve perfection, but the Confederation of British Industry, in this regard, said:

"Requirements in the directives for absolute safety have the potential to force employers to lay off their employees and bring industry to a halt. No employee would ever be allowed to climb a ladder again."

I would be the first to admit that that is a strong statement and may be something of an exaggeration. However, it gives the House the flavour of what the industrial community feels about the draft directives—that in their present form they are unacceptable. I suggest to my right hon. Friend the Minister, as has the industrial community, that the EEC Commission could do no better than to look at what we have achieved under successive Governments of both political persuasions. In Britain we have sought to provide protection

"so far as is reasonably practicable."

That is not what is being enshrined in the draft directives.

We must remember that employers in the United Kingdom cannot get away with blatant breaches, because they are subject to scrutiny by the Health and Safety Commission and the courts. On those principles we have achieved some of the highest standards of health and safety in Europe.

A great deal rests on the Government in the negotiations and parleying that has to be done. I have every confidence in my right hon. Friend the Minister because I know what he has achieved in other areas. However, what he has to achieve here is critical. If the draft directives go through unamended, we will have lower standards of health and safety in Britain than any of us want.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): We have to say, "I told you so." Many hon. Members who have spoken today said that joining the EEC was the wrong move and that people would rue the day that that decision was made. It is obvious that we were misled by the Minister today about what is in the documents on health and safety at work.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) is not in his place. He made a typical bosses' contribution. I do not want to make a typical trade union contribution. Safety is the responsibility of management, workers and trade unions, and I stand four square on that. That was my experience throughout many years in the mining industry.

I like some of the suggestions made in the documents, but the Commission has gone over the top. Hon. Members mentioned the Prime Minister's speech in Bruges, and I recalled what we were saying when the application to join the EEC was being made. I did not hear the Prime Minister saying that we should not join; the Government made us join and we must accept it. I hate to think what will happen in 1992. I honestly lose sleep over it because I can visualise many of the rights that we have had for hundreds of years being thrown away. We will be controlled from the other side of the channel; we will lose our sovereignty. I remember the contributions made by the former right hon. Member for South Down, and what he said has come true.

The Minister talked about costs, but what about industry? The prominent industry in my constituency is coal mining. It is a heavy, dangerous industry and it has experienced problems with safety. The management and men work together. Management inspections are made underground and on the surface and workmen's pit inspectors make inspections on the surface and underground, but there is another body that has overall responsibility—Her Majesty's mines and quarries inspectorate, which was set up under the mines and quarries legislation. I do not know how often I have had to ask the Minister when we will have the appropriate number of inspectors. We have nowhere near enough mine inspectors.

Alf Robens was chairman of the National Coal Board. He cut back on this, that and the other, as the Government are doing. He also cut back on spare parts and safety. I worked in the pits, so I knew exactly what was going on. The result was that the number of accidents and fatalities rocketed. If the Minister looks at the figures for fatalities and accidents for that period he will see that I am right. The system worked all right, but not enough was done to prevent accidents.

Lifting is mentioned in the documents. That is an important part of working in mining or heavy industry. People should be taught how to lift because there is a proper way to do it. My hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Buckley) has experience of the mining industry and knows exactly what I am talking about. There is a way of lifting heavy materials, but there was not enough time to teach miners how to do it. The men would have had to learn in their own time. They were not told that they should have their body in a certain position when lifting heavy things. Back problems were one of the main causes of people being off work.

Compensation has been mentioned. A complete change has taken place in the mining industry. It is no longer the National Coal Board but British Coal, and we have a different kind of management. The amount of compensation won in the courts every year because of negligence by management rockets. The industry has not the right set-up for the prevention of accidents. Somebody does something about a problem only after the horse has bolted.

During the Robens period there were not enough spare parts. There might be a heavy fall on a coal face, but if there were not materials to shore it up the men had to work beneath it. Management was adamant that the machines and supports, which cost millions of pounds, should pay for themselves. I am afraid that with the Government's privatisation policy for the industry we will go back to the bad old days that I worked in many years ago. Nationalisation improved the coal industry; safety was the top priority. Before nationalisation, profit was the top priority, men's earnings were second and safety was third. Safety was almost ignored.

It would seem that we will not have any opportunity to veto these directives. The Minister has not convinced me about the documents; I have been convinced by what his hon. Friend and my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) said. I well remember some of the remarks that were made when my hon. Friend and I served on the Committee dealing with the Employment Act 1988. It came out loud and clear what was happening to health and safety throughout Britain. We are not what we should be and I do not think that we will be what we should be under these directives. I think that the Commission has gone over the top, but it is correct in some of the suggestions that it has made. Europe will tell us what we should do.

In the mining industry—I am sorry to harp on about it, but I have a lot of experience of it—we have what we call workmen's pit inspections and the trade union pays for them. If the directives are passed, who will pay for those underground inspections? The trade unions have to pay for inspections done on behalf of the work force. Such inspections are part of the process of making pits safe for people to work in. Having worked under private ownership in years gone by, I fear what may happen if the Government bring in the sort of legislation they have promised. I am afraid we shall return to the pitfalls of those times.

If European legislation on safety for the workers will do any good, I welcome it with open arms; if not, I do not want to know about it. Some of the proposals are good, but I, like every other citizen in the country, want to retain the right for us to make our own decisions. I do not want to give Europe the right to tell us what to do.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Unlike some of my hon. Friends, I am by no means pessimistic about our being able to continue to exercise the necessary influence over legislation emanating from the Community, given good will and determination. I have written a number of articles in The Times over the past year or two on this subject, and I can fairly say that I am by no means anti-European: I am very pro-European. However, I am also in favour of the reality, as compared with what some might call the theology, of democracy. I believe in the importance of this place and its scrutiny processes, as does the Prime Minister, who made that clear in an answer at Question Time recently.

Matters of this sort cannot be shoved under the carpet. We cannot allow legislation that is vital to our constituents to wash over us as if nothing has happened. We must not suppose that the great democratic institution in which we sit has no relevance for, or influence on, such legislation.

My right hon. Friend the Minister, for whom I have the greatest possible respect, gave us to understand that these matters are still under review, and my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran), with his great experience of the Confederation of British Industry, made it clear that they require review. The problem is that if the die has already been cast, how can we ensure that the influence of Ministers of the Crown who want change will be felt in the Council of Ministers? The directives with which we are dealing tonight are subject to majority voting under articles 118A and 100A of the Single European Act.

Many members of other national Parliaments in Europe may adopt a view that is similar to ours. I derive some confidence from that, but these matters will require a great deal of intensive consideration by the working groups and the United Kingdom permanent representatives, who must help Ministers to sort out the matter before the Council decision is ultimately adopted. I exhort them to do that.

These proposals are the kind of practical measures to which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister referred at Bruges. The preamble to the directive refers to the introduction of a social element. I am by no means against many of the proposals in these directives. It is easy for people who want to stifle comment to suppose that we who raise problems that go to the heart of democracy do so because we do not want health and safety at work for workers. I do. Furthermore, I believe in the European Community. It has much to offer, but I will not be an uncritical lap dog of machinery which, as I have tried to point out in my recent articles, is by all accounts becoming increasingly autocratic. I have no intention of ceasing to refer to these important issues.

Turning to matters of detail, my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) rightly said that the six directives amount to what could be regarded as a series of Government Bills on which we could be detained for a long time. I have no intention of going through the directives in detail, but I shall deal with one or two points in them which were brought to my attention by the Engineering Employers Federation, which represents 5,000 member companies in this country. I have no interest to declare in connection with the federation, except to say that I welcome its interest, which partly arose because its members noticed one of my articles and said that they, too, were concerned.

[Mr. William Cash]

Document COM 88/76 Final, relating to personal protective equipment, states:

"Article 118A of the Treaty provides that the Council shall adopt, by means of Directives, minimum requirements for encouraging improvements".

The idea is to encourage, not to oblige. I shall not dwell on the legal niceties of that, but the point needs consideration.

Standards are directly connected with liability and negligence in law. Have the views of insurance companies on these matters been ascertained? When standards are not complied with, and when liability, negligence or failure to perform a function in a reasonable way arises, the bottom line is that someone will have to foot the bill when things go wrong. In the case of Piper Alpha, a massive six-month legal case is already starting to investigate the very health and safety matters that might arise under a directive of this sort.

Have the added costs that might be incurred by small and medium-sized businesses been assessed, and what will the impact of all this be on insurance costs? Have the companies been contacted? Lloyd's and all our other great insurance companies will be directly affected by these proposals. Insurance companies provide a service for which people pay, but the real question is how these provisions will affect people. Where is the level playing field, as I asked in an earlier intervention? If there is no effective system of enforcement in other countries and they do not have to comply with these directives, there will be a strange inversion in the so-called harmonisation process. To be sure, the object of that process is to create a bigger market of 320 million people, all of whom will benefit from the advantages of mutual and free trade in one way or another. But reciprocity is tied up in all this, and if insurance, added costs and enforceability have not been considered sufficiently, I hope that the Minister will do so before the Council decision is adopted.

On item 20 of the explanatory memorandum, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State said:

"The proposal raises no direct public expenditure implications for the Government. The financial effects for business are unclear at present as it is not known what attestation procedures will be required for each item of ppe"— that is personal protective equipment. I have great respect for my hon. Friend and I am sure that he included that provision to put us on notice that the House should consider this important matter. If the attestation procedures—the standards procedures—have not been calculated, and the financial effects on business remain unclear, we shall have to get that right before the matter is decided in the Council of Ministers.

I would have wished to mention other matters, but time is short and other hon. Members wish to speak in subsequent debates. I shall write to my right hon. Friend setting out the remarks that have been made to me by the Engineering Employers Federation, which represents a huge number of employers and has considered the matter carefully. I hope that he will give those matters his careful attention and that answers to those questions will be reflected in the final decision of the Council of Ministers.

Mr. Cope: This has been a useful debate, and I and my officials will reflect on what has been said. I reassure the House that my immediate response and reflections are not the end of the process. The points that have been made will influence the Government's stance in the continuing negotiations. I shall respond to as many of them as possible from the notes that I made during the debate.

I have not seen the document relating to 1992 which my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) produced and on which the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) commented, but I assure them that I shall study it carefully.

The hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) asked about the COSHH regulations. They have been laid before the House and will come before us in the normal way. The proposed regulations apply to building sites, as do our present regulations.

Several hon. Members asked me whether other bodies have been consulted. The Health and Safety Commission, which is a tripartite body, has consulted widely. That has been confirmed by hon. Members—not least by my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford—who have quoted representations that were made to them.

Sometimes it is difficult to assess the cost-effectiveness of regulations simply because it is difficult, if not impossible, to assess the cost of accidents that have been avoided. If the adoption of a safety measure avoids an accident, one does not know whether the accident would have happened and it is difficult to assess the cost on that side of the equation. It is much easier to assess the cost to employers of putting regulations into effect, and nothing that I have said has belied the fact that cost assessments must be as good as we can make them.

The main point that has emerged today is hon. Members' anxiety that the regulations represent the equivalent of a major Bill or several Bills. Many of the directives are already covered by United Kingdom law, and in many cases our law goes further than the provisions in the directives. The minimum standards provided for in the directives are exceeded in many cases by British law, and there will be no need to legislate to bring the vast majority of the directives into British law; they already exist.

I reassure hon. Members that, if any of the directives give rise to proposed changes in United Kingdom law, that law will have to be changed in Parliament. Many of those changes will be made under section 1(2) of the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act, which provides for improvements to be introduced by resolution.

Mr. Cash: If legislation is introduced into Parliament following the adoption of the decision, the fact that the decision has been taken, irrespective of whether it overlaps with United Kingdom legislation and the 1974 Act, is determinable by the European Court of Justice. Does my right hon. Friend agree that it does not matter, at any rate in theory, whether we pass subsequent legislation? If it were inconsistent with Community legislation, it would automatically be voidable by the Court of Justice. To that extent, what he said was true, but we must be sure that we get the legislation right as it goes through so that it suits the requirements of our electorate, rather than rely on the fact that it will be interpreted by the Court of Justice.

Mr. Cope: We must be careful to ensure that the legislation suits us. I hesitate to cross legal swords with my hon. Friend, but, as I understand it, the Court of Justice would come into it only if someone believed that our law did not comply with the minimum standards laid down. We shall do our best to avoid that.

The hon. Member for Antrim, North mentioned unanimity. Article 100A provides for qualified majority voting on measures to establish the internal market. The rights and interests of workers are excluded from qualified majority voting

"save where otherwise provided in this Treaty."

Article 118A is one of those "otherwise" provisions as regards the health and safety of workers, and that is why it requires qualified majority voting. I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) that the United Kingdom, the Italians and the Danes together form a blocking minority.

Interestingly, it appears from the debate that my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) is keen on uniform standards throughout the Community. I share his desire. That is the purpose behind the regulations.

He seemed at one stage—I may have misunderstood him—to want more inspectors from the European Commission, but it is better for national inspectorates to enforce the regulations. Both we and the European Community need to do our best to ensure that national enforcement is sound throughout the Community.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: What on earth can my right hon. Friend do if the law is ignored in, say, Germany? Can he give us a straight example?

Mr. Cope: Yes. We can take that country to the European Court.

I realise that some of those who have spoken this afternoon, although by no means all, dislike the European Community, or at least British membership of it. As one of those who sometimes has to sit in the Council of Ministers for hours on end, with headphones on, I fleetingly share that sentiment as the hours go by and we discuss matters of this detail in our various languages. However, yesterday, standing by our village war memorial reinforced my belief that it is right for the European nations to work together not only from the economic point of view but from a much deeper point of view.

We have an interest, as many hon. Members have said, in fair competition and equality of health and safety standards throughout Europe, and we would have that interest whether we were in or out of the Community. I believe that these proposals will improve health and safety in Europe. There is much discussion still to go and the documents still need amending, and that is why I commend the motion to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 5211/88 on the safety and health of workers at the workplace and 5762/88 and the Supplementary Explanatory Memorandum submitted by the Department of Trade and Industry on 7th July 1988 on personal protective equipment; supports the proposals in principle as steps towards the establishment of comparable high standards of health and safety throughout the Community and the removal of technical barriers to trade; and endorses the Government's endeavours to secure modifications in negotiations.

Biotechnology

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Before we begin the debate on the next motion, on biotechnology, I point out that the Chair was particularly relaxed in allowing a very wide debate on the last motion. I am sure that hon. Members will not take advantage of that good will and will not repeat arguments that have already been made.

8.4 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Employment (Mr. John Cope): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 5836/88 on exposure to biological agents at work, 6397/88 on control of genetically modified organisms and 10399/86 on regulation of biotechnology; supports the proposals in principle as steps towards harmonising safe working practices and improving environmental safety in the field of biotechnology; and endorses the Government's endeavours to secure modifications in negotiations.

I am very much a layman in this matter, and in case there may be others like me, I shall start by setting out in the simplest terms what we are talking about. Biotechnology is the relatively new term that is used for something with ancient origins—the deliberate use by man, for his own purposes, of biological systems and processes. For many centuries, man has used microbes to produce beer, wine, bread, cheese and many other products. We have, in one sense, manipulated genes—for example, in the selective breeding of farm animals, racehorses, or, for that matter, roses. We have, for two centuries, practised vaccination, which is the controlled use of disease-causing microbes to provide immunity against disease.

In the 20th century, the development of biotechnology has proceeded at an ever-increasing pace, to the great benefit of mankind. In medicine, penicillin and other antibiotics have become commonplace; insulin is now produced by genetic manipulation. Improved strains of crops, healthier animals, more effective washing powders, as well as better techniques for dealing with wastes, all owe their progress to biotechnology. There can be no doubt that biotechnology will continue to be responsible, on an ever-increasing scale, for major new advances, which will be the foundation of whole new industries. Many of the most important advances in biotechnology started here in Britain and we should be among the world's leading users industrially and commercially, and we are. However, to maintain this lead, we need, among other things, a sound safety regime, and that is what we have under the Health and Safety Commission and Executive.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): What does the "control of genetically modified organisms"

mean to the layman?

Mr. Cope: I shall explain that in a moment.

We have much to gain from biotechnology, but we need to make sure that it proceeds safely. It has proved very safe so far, but explosive growth in the subject can be expected over the next few years and the safety regime must be robust enough to permit that without increasing the risks.

The safety regime must also be international. The OECD has been active in this sector, as has the European Community. We are today considering three documents from the Commission—10399/86, which is a "white paper" on a Community framework; 5836/88, which is a directive on protection of workers in this sector; and 6397/88, which comprises two related directives on the contained use and the deliberate release of genetically modified micro-organisms. All these directives are now the subject of negotiation in Brussels. They have all been prepared with the help of groups of expert officials of member states over a period of 12 months or so, and in these discussions United Kingdom representatives have played their full part.

After the presentation of the directives to the Council of Ministers this summer, the explanatory memoranda were submitted to Parliament—those listed in the motion—and the Health and Safety Executive followed these up by an invitation to the public to comment on any aspect of the proposals. Many have taken advantage of that invitation.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): As my right hon. Friend may be aware, I am a member of the Select Committee on European Legislation, and this directive has cropped up on a number of occasions. One of the factors that prompted me to press hard for this matter to be referred to debate I shall explain later, but I have a specific question about the committee of experts to which my right hon. Friend has referred. Could he give us—if not now, later—some idea of the membership of that committee and the extent to which it is left to the self-regulatory mechanism, which ensures that, effectively, the only people who are in a position to comment on the efficacy of these important matters are directly involved by virtue of their professional experience?

Mr. Cope: These are extremely complex matters, and those people who are expert in such matters tend, therefore, to have studied the subject carefully for many years and are working in the area. Laymen, whether politicians or officials, must rely to a considerable extent on those experts. In that sense, it is no different from the law. Those of us who are not lawyers occasionally have to seek guidance from lawyers about the law.

I wish to say a little about each of the proposed directives, although there are close links between them. The main purpose of the directives is to control the use of micro-organisms. The directive covered by explanatory memorandum 5836, on the protection of workers from risks related to exposure to biological agents at work, is general in character and introduces for the first time specific provisions designed to lead to the adoption of minimum requirements for the health and safety of workers concerned.

I want to stress the wide scope of the proposals. They seek to cover research and diagnostic laboratories and other places where there is a deliberate intention to work with micro-organisms. They also include, although admittedly in less depth, places where contact with micro-organisms might be incidental to other work—for example, in the health services, or, perhaps less obviously, in agriculture.

All that mirrors two strands of thought that are generally accepted in this country. We believe that the general principles of occupational hygiene, which apply, for example, to work with chemicals, should also apply to work with micro-organisms. That disposes us to accept the articles dealing with incidental exposure. We have also developed a system of close inspection and control of the areas of specific work with micro-organisms. The Health and Safety Commission and the Department of Health have developed that system of guidance and inspection within a framework provided by the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 and other relevant legislation.

I can assure the House that that general acceptance of the proposals does not mean that we are willing to accept every word of the document without negotiation. Some of the proposals are not particularly clear and others seen to be overdetailed, but, as ever, we are concerned that they should be cost-effective. As negotiations proceed in Brussels, we shall seek improvements. The discussions on this document are still at an early stage.

The two other sets of proposals are comprised in one Council document relating to genetically modified organisms. They are both covered by Council document 6397 and, as they are both closely linked, they are being negotiated in the environment working group, but the areas covered by the two directives are distinct. The first part of the document deals with the contained use of genetically modified organisms. In answer to the question by the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley), genetic engineering or manipulation—they appear to mean the same thing so far as I can see—means the manipulation of the hereditary molecule of cells, usually by adding extra DNA, the chemical involved, to give the cell special properties. It therefore means modifying the genes of an organism.

Sir Hal Miller (Bromsgrove): Although this matter comes under the guise of health and safety at work, will my right hon. Friend assure us that the organisms to which he refers as being genetically modified are not human organisms and that as a result of the regulations we shall not legally countenance such modification of human organisms?

Mr. Cope: I can assure my hon. Friend that nothing in the document does anything of the sort.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): I do not think that that is an accurate answer. There might not be anything in the document to that effect, but genetically engineered micro-organisms can be used to cure animal diseases, plant diseases, blight and human diseases. They are now used in vaccinations. DNA from human beings is used. That is the present legal position. There is nothing frightening about it. It is not a case of experimenting with embryos.

Mr. Cope: I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) was concerned about experiments with human embryos, but the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) is right when he says that many of the applications of genetically manipulated or engineered molecules are for pharmaceutical purposes.

The purpose of the first part of this document is to build on the Community's recommendations, relating to registration of such work, which were made in 1982. Laboratory work with genetically modified or manipulated organisms has become well established in this country and elsewhere. I can assure hon. Members that this experimental work is subject to notification to the Health and Safety Commission under the Health and Safety (Genetic Manipulation) Regulations 1978, which comply with the later recommendations of 1982.

The ultimate reason for all this work is to produce something useful to mankind, hence the use of genetically-manipulated organisms on a larger scale in industry. That large-scale work may encompass the use of genetically-manipulated organisms or other processes outside the definitions that we have used. So far, they have been used chiefly in the production of pharmaceuticals. The main requirements which would be imposed by the contained use proposal are broadly in line with the thinking of the Health and Safety Commission. It has already consulted publicly on its intention to revise the 1978 regulations involving compulsory notification of the use of genetically-manipulated organisms.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): My right hon. Friend has been most helpful. Does he agree that document 865/73 covers human growth hormones which can be used in the pharmaceutical industry to promote human growth as well as plant growth?

Mr. Cope: Certainly, those hormones can be used. One of the conditions treated by products created in that way is dwarfism. Such products are used in the pharmaceutical industry for treating many conditions.

Contained work in this country has always been subject to close control and we do not believe that we have any difficulty in accepting the basic principles in this Community document. The most important principles are safe operation, prior safety assessment and notification of work to national competent authorities which will be responsible for control measures. The directive relating to contained use has made by far the quickest progress so far in negotiations. The explanatory memorandum, which went to the Select Committee in June, explained that to some extent.

Present negotiating concerns centre mainly on definitions of the activities to be covered, distinctions between large and small-scale work, the period of advance notification, commercial confidentiality and some still unresolved points of detail.

The second part of the document is concerned with an even newer activity—releasing genetically modified organisms into the general environment. Experience here is so far limited, but there are many exciting technical possibilities, notably improvements in crop characteristics including disease and pest resistance, extended growing seasons and improved bacteria to control pollution. The document relates to deliberate or planned release. Releases have environmental implications, as well as implications for human health and safety, and the Department of the Environment has a stake in the outcome, as has my Department.

The level of reassurance on safety that the public needs before the release of novel organisms into the environment is obviously greater than that required for securely contained applications. There is, therefore, a system of notification in this country which is based on the Health and Safety Commission's advisory committee on genetic manipulation. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has recently established the interim advisory committee on introduction, which is an independent scientific committee, to provide additional advice on the ecological aspects of such proposals. Overall, the Government welcome the intention to establish a Community-wide control regime for these matters.

However, the proposals raised some points of doubt and difficulty. For pre-commercial releases for the purpose of research and development, the notification would be to national authorities. That is in line with the Health and Safety Commission's regulatory proposals, to which I have already referred. For releases of commercial products, national notifications would be circulated to other member states, and the Commission would have the ultimate responsibility for resolving objections. The proposed procedures are rather cumbersome and we need to be convinced that member states are not the best judges of the effects of releases in their own countries.

In recommending the motion to the House, I hope that I have made it clear that we believe that in principle it is right that the same high standards should be attained and maintained throughout the Community. On the other hand, it is necessary to ensure that the directives are justified on scientific, technical and medical grounds. It is also necessary to ensure adequate protection in the most cost-effective and least bureaucratic way, if it is to achieve its purpose in the real world. I invite the House to comment on the proposals. I shall do my best to respond to any points raised either later in the debate or afterwards, if that is more appropriate.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): The Opposition broadly support the proposals. The Minister has rightly reminded us of the strength of the British biotechnology industry. He was right to do so, because genetic manipulation has come from work that was done in the 1950s by Dr. James Watson and Francis Crick, who discovered the structure of deoxyribonucleic acid—DNA. Throughout the 1960s, a great deal of work was done in Britain and elsewhere which showed that DNA is the basic genetic material of organisms and that the code that determines how animals, including ourselves, develop is contained in DNA, which is transmitted from parents to offspring.

The Minister said that scientists have been genetically manipulating organisms for a long time. I was surprised that the Minister seemed to classify ordinary breeding as genetic manipulation. I have never heard that interpretation before. There is a quantum leap from selective breeding to improve the strain which has been carried out for centuries to improve crops and livestock, and from the active breeding of micro-organisms, such as bacteria, to the ability artificially to insert additional genetic material to alter the genetic complement of organisms so that they will develop differently.

There is confusion about the position with regard to humans. To my knowledge, there is no recorded instance of the genetic manipulation of human DNA. Of course, use has been made of bacteria that have been genetically manipulated for human purposes, but enormous ethical issues would be raised if there were to be genetic manipulation of human beings—although some genetic diseases could be corrected in that way.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang), who is well informed on these matters, has no doubt read the book written by a Fellow of New college, Oxford entitled "What sort of people should there be?" It is by no means science fiction and it is generally conceded to be true by those in Edinburgh, not far from the hon. Gentleman's constituency, who are engaged in serious research along those lines. The notion that he has given that the modification of human genetic characteristics is not on the immediate horizon is wide of the mark.

Mr. Strang: I shall qualify what I said. Enormous ethical considerations would be raised by genetic manipulation of human material that aimed to create desirable characteristics in humans as a means of selective breeding. That is different from using genetic manipulation to prevent certain genetically transmitted diseases from developing in human beings.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Gentleman cannot draw a distinction merely on the basis of considering something to be beneficial which is regarded as potentially dangerous by experts, including those who advise the Minister. The principle is whether the modification of genetic characteristics is capable of being brought into effect now or in the immediate future. The answer is yes, as the hon. Gentleman knows.

Mr. Strang: I have not said anything to contradict that.

The point that I tried to make was that the role of genetic manipulation that we are discussing tonight relates to its use in biotechnology and industry. Perhaps there is a role for genetic manipulation in the future in the prevention of certain diseases that are genetically transmitted in human beings and that will involve the manipulation of human genetic material. However, I was referring to a development beyond that, which we should think of as science fiction, which is using genetic manipulation to carry out selective breeding as Hitler and the Third Reich thought of it—the selective breeding of humans to develop a super race. No one has suggested seriously that we would apply genetic manipulation to human beings with that objective, as we do in relation to micro-organisms and to improve livestock.

Mr. Cope: I have agreed with much of what the hon. Gentleman has said. However, I must make it clear that the parts of the directives that deal with laboratories cover work with micro-organisms only and not work with human embryos. That work is not covered by the directives.

Mr. Strang: I take the Minister's point. I am sure that we agree that we are not suggesting that it is ethical or proper to use genetic manipulation to breed super humans.

Some hon. Members may recall that, about a year ago, a front page story in one of the popular Sunday newspapers claimed that human immune deficiency virus had its origin in genetic manipulation. I do not believe that that is true, but it could have been true. That is an extreme and alarming example of what could happen. When one genetically manipulates bacteria and viruses, one cannot be certain what one will produce. That is why it is vital that we should have safeguards, and seek to apply the highest safety standards, particularly in laboratories where people work with genetically manipulated organisms.

It goes without saying that by and large we support the work. Thousands of millions of pounds have been invested in biotechnology industries and only recently have the benefits of that investment come on stream. As the Minister said, biotechnology can lead to the development of new and better drugs. In a whole range of industries micro-organisms rather than chemical processes are used and the application in agriculture is also substantial and widespread. Clearly, we can derive enormous benefits from the genetic manipulation of micro-organisms.

Equally, it is crucial that we should recognise the risks involved and implement the highest safety standards. We should take all the precautions needed to protect not only the workers directly involved, but the wider community from the potential escape of a dangerous organism.

The "policy implications" paragraph of the explanatory memorandum, which deals with the directive on the contained use of genetically modified organisms, says:

"the UK will be seeking some important modifications in the detail of the containment and risk assessment requirements which, as they stand, cannot easily be applied to all contained applications".

The Minister touched on that, but it would help if he could explain the sentence at greater length.

The other directive deals with the release of genetically manipulated organisms into the environment. The application to certain crops immediately comes to mind, but there could also be a role for the process in, for example, the control of pollution. It may be possible genetically to manipulate organisms to make them more effective at carrying out certain functions that are to the benefit of mankind.

We would all agree that it is a major step to release genetically manipulated organisms into the environment. In the overwhelming majority of cases, the organisms will not be substantially different from their natural counterparts. We have to allow for the fact that there are exceptions and we have to guard against the possibility that the properties of a genetically manipulated organism may prove more radically different than was originally envisaged, and may have a deleterious effect. There are ways of seeking to get round that. For example, we could require that any organisms released into the environment must be such that they could not survive in a different habitat. If an organism was to be released into a particular crop, for example, we could ensure that its specifics were such that it could not survive in another.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): How would we know that?

Mr. Strang: One can breed organisms to ensure that they have certain qualities before one releases them. The hon. Lady underlines the important factor, on which we all agree, which is that we must be very careful. The process must be strictly controlled.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Following from the hon. Gentleman's argument, does he agree that the notification should be to the national Government rather than outside their territory?

Mr. Strang: I think that there is a case for both. Clearly we want a national authority to authorise such activities. However, the Minister seemed to have no sympathy with the view that the Commission should have some right of approval in relation to the release of organisms. It is perhaps easier for us, in the British Isles, to argue that than it would be for those in some other countries. Suppose that we are talking about the release of an organism in close proximity to the boundaries of two EEC member states. Either the member states which border the country should have a say in the matter or the European Commission at least should have some say. If genetically manipulated micro-organisms were to be released in West Germany for some agricultural purpose it would be perfectly reasonable to require that the authorisation of that release on a commercial scale should not be the prerogative of the national Government alone because the implications could go wider than West Germany. I recognise that in the first instance and in relation to pre-commercial and post-commercial use the authority should be a national Government.

This is an ongoing process. It is not as though regulations are being introduced for the first time. We have had regulations in place in Britain for a considerable time. The dialogue with the scientists will continue. There is no dispute between the Opposition and the Government about the benefits that can accrue from biotechnology and there should be no dispute about the need in principle for the highest safeguards.

We should welcome the fact that such matters are being discussed in the European Community because it is in our interests. We are concerned about the health and safety of our population, and in some instances developments in other countries—for example, in nuclear power—can affect the health of our population. Surely we are also concerned to improve the health and safety of workers in other countries. If we can contribute to a reduction in accidents in Spain and Italy, we should seek to do so. We do not need to adopt an entirely parochial view of health and safety. The important thing is that we have responsibility for our regulations. We should in no way be prepared to reduce our standards in deference to developments in the EC. However, we should contribute to improving health and safety in the Community and ensure that this is not just a national effort but an attempt to improve standards throughout Europe.

8.40 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Some months ago I was in the United States, where I had the opportunity to speak to a scientist who represented 6,000 other scientists who, in one way or another, were under his surveillance, monitoring and control. He told me that genetic engineering was worrying him more than anything else, with all the responsibilities that he had. The dangers that are set out in the explanatory memorandum and in other papers were of concern to him. I have in mind wheat strain and other matters. We are aware of the great dangers of the release of micro-organisms. A recent incident in Argentina gave rise to the severe danger of the obliteration of sectors of crops.

The scientist whom I met in the United States was concerned also about the defence implications of biotechnology. He explained that the scientific development of genetic engineering was so sophisticated, difficult and dangerous that he felt that it should be subject to the most rigorous conditions and control. I am no expert, but I am told that it is possible to have a genetically engineered organism that is as yet untriggered. That is what I have been told by someone who is pre-eminent in this discipline. The trigger, rather like a time bomb, is released into the atmosphere, and no one would know that that had happened unless and until the complementary mechanism was attached to it. Apparently the defence implications are extremely serious.

I do not know whether the directive provides the opportunity for the sort of genetic engineering that I have described. I do know, however, that the book "What sort of people should there be?", written by a fellow at New college, Oxford, was abundantly clear on the dangers of genetic engineering in the human context. About two years ago I tabled an early-day motion on the issue. I should make it clear that I have no preconceived view and that I believe that there could be some advantages to be gained from some of the experiments. I tabled the motion because I wanted a Select Committee to examine the efficacy of the experimentation. Over 150 Members from all parties signed the motion because they, too, wanted the issue to be examined. But such was not to be the case. I understand that the then Opposition spokesman on these matters was not disposed to co-operate with the setting up of such a Select Committee. As a result, we were not able to examine the facts that underlie a vital issue.

Mr. Cope: I assure my hon. Friend that the directive does not give permission for any work of any sort to be carried out in Britain that is not covered by existing legislation. The directive can have the effect only of increasing our controls of this sort of work. Whatever my hon. Friend's concerns may be, they do not arise from the directive.

Mr. Cash: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that intervention. I have read the definitions in the Genetic Manipulation Regulations 1978, in respect of which the Health and Safety Executive contacted me about a year ago. I had extensive discussions and correspondence with the executive. As one who has great respect for my right hon. Friend, I must say to him that, although I accept what he said and appreciate that he is passing on information that he has received, this is not a matter that can be left to a short debate of this sort. I hope that the issues that I have raised can be properly examined at greater leisure.

Documents that can be obtained in the Vote Office explain in great depth the ramifications of biotechnology. There is potential for the dangers that I have described to arise. Further, we are in a multi-billion dollar business. Already genetic engineering has been patented. Animal patents have been taken out, but only after the United States Congress, after intensive discussions, thought that it was right to do so. There are many who still think that it was not right to take that course. The same issues arise with the human application of genetic engineering, which I understand has received a degree of authorisation in the United States. It is subject to patent laws. Conferred upon those who are licensed to conduct the research, therefore, is a huge volume of research activity with the potential for the making of multi-billion dollar profits.

It would be right for us to retain as much control as we could. We have a direct Chernobyl-type interest in the deliberate release of organisms—such a release could take place abroad—that could have a direct impact upon the United Kingdom. I do not fear what might come from abroad, but it would be prudent to have the dangers in mind. I see the need for a degree of integrated and co-ordinated activity. I am concerned that self-regulation should not be left to the experts. It is vital that national Parliaments, in the form of the Select Committee to which I have referred, should be able to ask the relevant questions before it is too late. There is a need for continuing national control, and I am deeply concerned about the treaty base that is under consideration. I understand that it is thought that the procedure could come under article 100A, which invokes majority voting.

If we are conceding the need to work the matter through on a mutual and reciprocal basis, but not accepting that it is vital that we retain a degree of control nationally, what is the point of allowing the issue to be decided by majority voting without a full and extensive inquiry into the treaty base? There are serious doubts, and this is a vital matter. The Select Committee on European Legislation, of which I am a member, has recently taken evidence from the Treasury Solicitor on the scope and use of article 100A. There are important matters about which we must be careful. If the treaty base is misused, we shall find that biotechnological questions can be decided on a majority vote.

As is shown by the useful documents that have been presented to us, there are already several member states which do not have any regulations to deal with these matters. There are no specific regulations in Greece, Spain or Portugal. Yet those member states—and perhaps others for all I know—will vote in respect of article 100A if that is the adopted treaty base. What on earth would we be doing if we allowed a matter of this kind to be passed if the blocking minority acted against us while we were trying to make sense of the regulations? In some respects we would be in the hands of other member states which not only may not want regulations, but apparently do not have enough information to form judgments about the matter.

My right hon. Friend must take note of the fact that the Select Committee on European Legislation insisted that there should be a debate on this matter before adoption because the issue is extremely important for the future of this country. Therefore, we should ensure that the matter does not go through without very serious and careful consideration.

8.50 pm

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): This is a very important debate. I do not want to delay the House for long, especially as I shall deal with the next debate as the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman.

I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), because I agreed with 99·9 per cent. of his comments. I hope that the media and others will wake up soon to the significance of the debate taking place generally throughout Europe and elsewhere on genetically engineered micro-organisms. If this debate was about nuclear power, the Press Gallery—to which we cannot refer—would be full. However, biotechnology has the same significance as nuclear power, and in many ways will have the same public perception, debate and argument.

We must consider urgently the release of genetically engineered micro-organisms into the environment. My advice on the psychological perception of environmental risks in this country continues to be that ordinary people are becoming overloaded with the pace of technological change, and opposition to nuclear power has been associated with that. That pace of change leads to genuine concern among the public and a desire for public regulation and democratic accountability of such things as genetically engineered micro-organisms.

There are many exciting opportunities for improved protection of human health from the process of engineering micro-organisms. For example, I would support strongly the replacement of chemical pesticides by target-specific biological agents which do not harm innocuous life forms. That is a much more acceptable environmental alternative than the blanket use of pesticides, which are doing so much harm to our environment. We should also favour the cautious development of live vaccines for cholera and dysentery which cause so many infant deaths each year in developing countries.

However, we should also be concerned to ensure that commercial pressures and the absence of international regulation do not conspire to eliminate public accountability over new technologies such as genetic engineering. The public have an absolute and fundamental right to understand and participate in decisions that affect their environment. We must try to explain the benefits and risks of the release of genetically engineered micro-organisms into the environment. By stimulating rational public discussion and promising adequate regulatory machinery to control the technology, we will demonstrate that we are responsible and concerned as a Parliament, but not anti-science. The motions go a little way towards assisting that.

It appears that in conferences in the past—a conference was held six or seven months ago on this subject in Cardiff—a number of the ethical issues were completely avoided. It seems that it is easier to discuss the scientific implications than the ethical implications of these engineered micro-organisms.

As the hon. Member for Stafford said, the potential for military or mischievous use of the technology must be considered. For that reason, I propose that we consider the following suggestions. We must call on the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development to agree strict international guidelines for the development and release of genetically engineered micro-organisms into the environment. The British Government must take steps to ensure that new techniques of genetic manipulation are not used for military or mischievous purposes.

We need a specific international convention to outlaw military applications of the new technology. It would be easy for an enemy country to release genetically engineered micro-organisms into another country to destroy crops, because organisms designed to kill the pest that kills the crop can be released very effectively among crops. That is very useful. However, it is also possible to release a genetically engineered micro-organism to kill the pest's natural enemy. That would allow crops to be devastated. The Americans could choose to do that in Nicaragua, although I am not suggesting for one minute that they might. Similarly, if the Russians chose to do it in Pakistan, they might, although I am not suggesting that either. We should have an international agreement on that great danger, in the same way as we have an agreement on germ warfare.

There should be a case-by-case assessment of all proposals to release genetically engineered micro-organisms into the environment, with release at the present time being restricted to products with clear benefits to health or the environment. Genetically engineered micro-organisms should be released into the environment only if they are genetically marked with a stable factor other than antibiotic resistance, and if sensitive methods exist for their detection in soil and water.

The other danger is that genetically engineered micro-organisms may be released into the environment, but people may not be aware of them unless they are marked. They cannot be detected in the environment and people do not know what is happening. There must be markers, but not the antibiotic resistance markers, which could cause difficulty.

A regulatory framework must be developed which commands public confidence and which can insist on prior notification, public hearings, independent scientific review and final consent by national regulatory bodies. In this country that should be Parliament.

New products should not subvert the "polluter pays" principle. The fact that some pollutants may in future —and I welcome this—be broken down more efficiently in the environment by genetically engineered micro-organisms being released to attack them should not be used as an excuse for avoiding the treatment of pollutants at source.

There should be an international regulatory agency and convention, with powers to prohibit military applications of the technology and to prevent the release of genetically engineered micro-organisms without the knowledge and acceptance of international and national authorities.

8.57 pm

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): I am most concerned at the prospect that new techniques concerning genetic manipulation will be controlled no longer by the British Government but under laws determined by the Council of Ministers and passed by majority. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State says that we do not have a great deal to worry about, but I hope that he will answer one or two specific questions.

First, my right hon. Friend commented that this measure contains nothing relating to human factors such as human bodies or foetuses that could be of concern on moral grounds. Does he accept that, even on the basis of the Commission's views and one paper prepared by the Government, it is clear that many micro-organisms are being used as a substitute for specific human items? For example, human growth hormones that were previously obtained from human tissue by means of complicated chemical processes can now be produced by micro-organisms. That is clearly and precisely stated. Does my right hon. Friend accept that, in agriculture, the technique goes a great deal further?

Secondly, I cannot understand my right hon. Friend's comment that these proposals will impart no new powers. One of the directives makes mention of

"the deliberate release to the environment of genetically modified organisms."

My understanding is that such a power is not currently available in the United Kingdom or under EC legislation. I also understand from one of the documents that that is considered so controversial in the United States that it has delayed any development in that direction for three years.

The Minister may say that, although there is a directive dealing with the deliberate release into the environment of genetically modified organisms, it does not mean that such will happen. Someone will have to decide, and it may be the Common Market. Perhaps the United Kingdom Government will have some small part to play in such a decision. Nevertheless, to suggest that this is a small matter and one perhaps not best left to the United Kingdom may give the House the wrong impression.

Thirdly, I welcome my right hon. Friend's advice on the explanatory memorandum by the former Minister for Information Technology, who also issued a paper on the subject. He comments that the proposals' main benefit is improved crop yields. If there is one thing that the Common Market does not need as a matter of urgency it is improved crop yields adding considerably to its output of agricultural produce. Considering the extent of world poverty, it is frightening that, because the Common Market is producing too much, it spends £220 million per week on dumping or destroying food. It seems ridiculous to introduce proposals designed to increase the size, scope and quality of fruit when so much money is being spent destroying more than 1 million tonnes of fruit annually.

We appreciate that this matter is not one on which the views of the House of Commons may count for anything, because it can make no decision. Nor is it a matter on which the European Parliament can decide. All we can do is to express a view to the Government, but even they cannot take a decision because of the majority vote. What is decided about this rather frightful measure will be the responsibility not of the Government but of a majority of member states voting in the Council of Ministers. We can at least say to the Government, "For goodness sake, if we are doing something rather significant, and which some of us may regard as somewhat terrifying, let us begin by telling people exactly what is happening."

This development appears to me, as a layman, to be very significant. It is an area of dramatic technical advance, whereby micro-organisms are being produced to serve as a substitute for human features. They will also be used to change the physical characteristics of human beings. Dwarfism is one example I have mentioned. We also face the fantastic and rather worrying second phase, when we shall permit the release of genetically manipulated organisms into the environment. The Minister cannot say that that does not matter or that it is not controversial.

Mr. Cope: I never said anything of the sort. This is an important matter and I emphasised that in my comments. I never said that it was a small matter. On the contrary, I regard it as extremely important. My hon. Friend is right to stress its importance, but he must not accuse me of saying that it is unimportant.

Mr. Taylor: I am sure that all right hon. and hon. Members present in the Chamber heard the Minister say that there is nothing in the proposals that will allow anyone to do anything they did not previously have the power to do.

We are here dealing with a dramatic new proposal to expand existing powers. Once that happens, those powers will not be under the authority of the House of Commons but under the rules of the European Community, although at least four countries do not have any rules at all. We are considering a directive that the Government's own paper clearly states relates to

"the deliberate release to the environment of genetically modified organisms".

My understanding is that no such British power exists.

Mr. Cope: The purpose of the regulations is to extend the strict control that we now have to other countries. My hon. Friend complains that there is no control in other countries, and that is what the directive is all about.

Mr. Taylor: If my right hon. Friend were to say that the deliberate release into the environment of genetically modified organisms is permitted in Britain, that would be a big surprise. It would compare with a paper produced by the former Minister for Information Technology, explanatory memorandum 9501 on document 10399/86 on the Commission's work into biotechnology. The Minister talked about the second phase as something in the future and something that had been blocked in the United States on safety and environmental grounds.

I do not pretend to be an expert, but the brief exchange that we have had with the Minister has shown that we are dealing with something that is fundamental and something that could affect the environment of every person in the United Kingdom. It is a big decision to pass over to the European Community responsibility for making laws and imposing controls. That worries me, and I am worried even more because, when we eventually get the new laws and new controls, which may not be on these grounds, Britain will have just one voice in the Council. We should all be worried about this matter.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will say a little more on the three specific issues which I have raised.

9.5 pm

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): Just how far-reaching are the regulations that come from Europe has been vividly illustrated. Perhaps not many hon. Members realise how far-reaching this motion is. I speak as a layman. I do not adequately understand what is going on, but the suggestions which have been made worry me, just as they would the people whom we all represent.

This is a matter of great importance. We in Northern Ireland have suffered by having to pass legislation such as this in an hour and a half. If the debate on health and safety had continued until 10 o'clock, this debate could have continued for only an hour and a half. It would be deplorable if we could not alter the legislation or adequately debate the issues in such an important matter.

I have every respect for the Minister—not that that might bring any happiness to him—but he is in deep water because of his statements. He realises that this is a big issue. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) said that this was a road that he would not have gone down. The implications are so far-reaching that they are terrifying. Ordinary individuals need to know what is happening. I would not like such a matter to be outside the sovereignty of the House. I should like it decided in the House so that the representatives of the people who have sent us here have a say.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): The hon. Gentleman may be under a misapprehension. Is he aware that the powers to decide on this matter are not in the House or in the Government? If they were, the motion would not contain the phrase

"endorses the Government's endeavours to secure modifications in negotiations."

Does the hon. Gentleman agree that if hon. Members who voted two years ago for the amendments to the treaty of Rome, called the Single European Act, had known that the House was giving away its powers to determine these matters within the United Kingdom, they might have thought otherwise?

Rev. Ian Paisley: If the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) had been in the House when I made my first speech today, he would know that I had underscored that point. The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. Our powers have been abolished. That is why it is so serious a matter. That is why we need to reflect carefully on the effects of its implementation. The point that needs to be highlighted is that the House will have no authority. We need to know what is to happen so that we can alert our constituents.

We have heard tonight about the real implications of EEC membership. A large degree of the sovereignty of this House has already vanished. The president of the Commission said that 80 per cent. of all laws will be made in Europe, not in the Parliaments of the member states. I think that he was right. That is not acceptable to many people, but it is the truth.

9.10 pm

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): I do not doubt for a moment that my right hon. Friend the Minister attaches the highest importance to the proposals to control this new and frightening technology more effectively than it is controlled now, but I do not believe that 99·9 per cent. of my constituents or of hon. Members understand what is involved.

I remind my right hon. Friend that long ago one of the greatest Prime Ministers of this country—and a Conservative one at that—Benjamin Disraeli, said that the first duty of any Government is the health of the people—health in the broadest, protective sense. I do not go all the way with my hon. Friend and dear neighbour the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) in his attitude to the European Community, but I am tempted to draw the line in this case, and in others, too.

We are told that the proposal deliberately to release genetically modified organisms will be useful and constructive, that it will enhance the quality of life and that it will lead to more efficient agriculture. However, that leads to one conclusion: that when a product has been endorsed under the directive, no member state may impede its marketing throughout the Community unless there is evidence that its use may be subject to further conditions. I do not intend to go into the details. I am not qualified to do so. If, however, something goes wrong, I want to know whether there are any safeguards that will allow us to draw back. Where is the line to be drawn? So far as I can see, no line has been drawn. To borrow the language of another great British Prime Minister "up with that I will not put".

Mr. Cope: I would like to try to reassure some of those hon. Members who have spoken, but perhaps I should first respond to the detailed matters that have been raised.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) was worried that we seem to be leaving the matter entirely to experts. As I said in an intervetion, when I drew an analogy with lawyers, we need to have these things explained to us by experts. The people involved in discussions on this matter include the Health and Safety Commission's advisory committee on genetic manipulation and the advisory committee on dangerous pathogens. Included are representatives of the Nature Conservancy Council, local authorities, the Trades Union Congress and the Confederation of British Industry, plus the expert scientists who help to guide them. Many people contribute.

The hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) was worried about defence implications. I assure him that the United Kingdom abides by international conventions on chemical and biological warfare.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford, like others, was worried about the treaty base. He drew our attention to paragraph 4 of my memorandum 6397 of 24 June. We are interested in what the proper treaty base is. Until we have the final form of the directive, there will be some doubt, but our considerations are to be found in my memorandum.

Several hon. Members wondered whether we are giving greater permission for things to happen in Britain or whether we are handing control over what happens here to the European Commission or the Council of Ministers. We are not passing control over what happens here to other countries. We are trying to extend to other countries in the Community the controls that we have in Britain. This is another directive which lays down minimum standards. It does not prevent our developing or improving standards.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way, especially as I was not here for his opening speech. Surely what he has said is not entirely the truth. It is true that these documents, if passed in their present form, may, under EEC law, extend the regulations which are to be found in our domestic law to other countries, but any subsequent instruments about control, which will apply universally, will be within the control of the Council, not of the House. Surely to that extent we are passing over powers.

Mr. Cope: We are not passing over powers in the motion before us. If some future proposed legislation does something else, we can consider it, but that is not what is before us.

Mr. Spearing: Precisely.

Mr. Cope: My right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine), the Father of the House, spoke of new technology being involved. It is very new and to some people it is frightening. He also spoke about the health of the people. As I said at the beginning, I am a layman in these matters—I suspect that we all are—but my view is that the health of the people has a great deal to gain, and has already gained a great deal, as a result of biotechnology. I have been given many examples of the benefits. I have no doubt that there will be more. Many of the applications of biotechnology and of genetic manipulation have been in pharmaceuticals. I believe that we have already gained a great deal.

There have been references to human growth hormones, which were not invented by genetic manipulation. They predate that. They could be used before, but now they can be produced better and more cleanly by means of genetic manipulation. That is one advance. In my opening remarks I referred to insulin, and the same applies to that.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: I am sorry to interrupt my right hon. Friend. I hope that he does not think that I am being difficult, but does he accept that the former Minister for Industry and Information Technology wrote in his note to the Committee about human growth hormones that "could only previously be obtained by low yield traditional chemical means or by tissue extraction."?

He was saying that nothing like that could be done before, but it can be done now. It is there in black and white. However, the Minister appeared to be saying that we have been able to do it for a long time but chose not to do so. They cannot both be right.

Mr. Cope: I meant not that we could carry out genetic manipulation but that we could produce those particular hormones. The same is true of insulin for treating diabetes. Insulin was available before from cows, but now we can produce insulin better by means of genetic manipulation. That seems to me to be an example of a new technique being used to produce something that already exists. I did not mean that genetic manipulation is an old technique. It is not. It is a new technique which is being developed all the time. Important advances can be made from it, but those advances should not blind us in any way to the problems, the dangers and the very strict requirements for health and safety and control, particularly of releases, which have been covered in the directive. They should make us more determined to get them right. In Britain we have gone to a lot of trouble to get them right. We are trying to improve our own regulations. The directives try to extend the same principles to other countries in the European Community.

There are wider thoughts. The OECD has already been mentioned. More is happening elsewhere in the wider world, not only in the European Community. However, that is not relevant to our debate today.

We are right to try to improve the directives and to get them adopted by the European Community so that we can enjoy the benefits of biotechnology while at the same time preserving the health and safety of the workers involved in it and that of the public generally. Therefore, I commend the motion to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved.

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 5836/88 on exposure to biological agents at work, 6397/88 on control of genetically modified organisms and 10399/86 on regulation of biotechnology; supports the proposals in principle as steps towards harmonising safe working practices and improving environmental safety in the field of biotechnology; and endorses the Government's endeavours to secure modifications in negotiations.

Tobacco Products

9.22 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mrs. Edwina Currie): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 4192/88 on the labelling of tobacco products and the Supplementary Explanatory Memorandum submitted by the Department of Health on 7th November 1988 and 4193/88 on tar yields of cigarettes; welcomes continued progress towards removing the remaining barriers to trade between Member States; and, in the interests of public health, endorses the aims of reducing the tar yield of cigarettes and of ensuring that Community consumers are adequately warned of the dangers of smoking.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment in the names of the hon. Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) and his hon. Friends.

Mrs. Currie: The proposals concern the harmonisation of national provisions governing maximum tar yields of cigarettes and the labelling of tobacco products. The European Commission states that the proposals form part of the changes needed to eliminate most of the remaining trade barriers in the European Community by the end of 1992 at the latest.

The proposed directives are linked to the European Community Commission's "Europe Against Cancer" programme. That was based on a report by a committee of 12 European cancer experts, which report was welcomed on behalf of the United Kingdom by the Prime Minister on December 1986, when we last held the European presidency.

Tobacco is the main cause of cancer deaths in the European Community, so "Europe Against Cancer" has given priority to prevention in the struggle against tobacco abuse. In the context of that programme a list of 14 measures for a campaign against tobacco has been drawn up, and so far the Commission has proposed directives on five of those. The draft directive on labelling, one of those to be debated today, is the most advanced of all the proposals.

As the harmonisation measures originated in the cancer prevention programme, the proposals to be debated today take as their base a high level of health protection. That is required by paragraph 3 of article 100A of the treaty of Rome, which states that, in the internal market measures concerning health, safety, environmental protection and consumer protection,

"The Commission . . . will take as a base a high level of health protection."

The Commission's proposals are based on the most stringent existing provisions in any European Community member state.

I shall deal first with the proposal on the harmonisation of tobacco labelling. The Commission based its proposals on the Irish model of labelling, which is part of Irish law. Under the proposals there would be a health warning—on the most visible surface of all tobacco packs and cigarette packs would also carry one of a list of specific warnings on the back. The labelling directive also proposes that cigarette packets should carry numerical information on tar and nicotine yields on the side of the packet. The health warnings and the tar and nicotine yield indications would occupy 5 per cent. of the relevant side.

"Tobacco seriously damages your health"—

Cigarettes sold in the United Kingdom have carried health warnings for the past 16 years, through voluntary agreements with the tobacco industry. Those warnings appear on the side of cigarette and hand-rolling tobacco packaging. Also, through the voluntary agreement, cigarette packets in the United Kingdom carry information on tar yield in the form of tar groups—low tar, medium tar and so on.

The proposals of the labelling directive differ from the present United Kingdom system in several ways. First, the Commission envisages that the directives would have to be implemented by law, whereas the present United Kingdom system is voluntary.

Secondly, under the present United Kingdom system only cigarettes and hand-rolling tobacco must carry health warnings. The labelling directive proposes to put a warning on all tobacco packaging, including cigars, pipe tobacco and so on. The proposed system would make warnings more prominent, and some of the proposed health warnings are taken from those already used in the United Kingdom.

The proposals to provide precise numerical information on tar and nicotine yields on cigarette packets would provide consumers with more information than they currently receive in Britain. At present, information on tar yield is expressed in terms of grouping; for example, low and high tar. Under the current United Kingdom system there is no information on nicotine yield on cigarette packs. It is hoped that the draft directive will be discussed by the Council of Ministers on 13 December.

The second proposed directive is on the harmonisation of maximum tar yields of cigarettes and is much less advanced than that on labelling. There is still much to discuss and we do not know what the final form of the proposals will look like, but I can describe what the present draft sets out to do. We all know that every cigarette is harmful to health, whatever its tar yield. There is no such thing as a safe cigarette, and there is no doubt that the risk of cancer is higher if the cigarettes smoked have high tar yield, as it is the tar that causes cancer.

The World Health Organisation has recommended a tar limit of 15 mg per cigarette. The directive aims to achieve that by the end of 1992. Spain has recently passed a royal decree to apply such a limit, and Portugal has recently introduced similar legislation. Following the recommendations of the European Community's committee of cancer experts, the directive also proposes a further reduction of the limit to 12 mg by the end of 1995.

We support the aim of reducing the tar yield of cigarettes, since we started it. For the past 16 years the United Kingdom has had a programme for continuing the reduction of what is known as the "sales weighted average tar yield"—commonly known as SWAT—of cigarettes. That is done by voluntary agreement with the United Kingdom tobacco industry. In that way we have brought the average tar yield of cigarettes down from 21 mg in 1972 to 13·6 mg today—a reduction of one third.

A difference between the proposals in the directive and the United Kingdom's voluntary system is that there is no general tar ceiling for cigarettes in the United Kingdom. However, there is a ceiling for the introduction of new brands, which stands at 14·5 mg. If the draft directive were to be adopted, it would affect 17·5 per cent. of the United Kingdom cigarette market where the tar yield would be above the proposed ceiling. In virtually all those cases the existing tar yield is between 15 and 18 mg. Brands such as Senior Service, Capstan, and Woodbine would be among those affected in their present formulations.

Lists of tar yield, carbon monoxide and nicotine for brands on sale in the United Kingdom are published by the Government twice yearly and the tables can be found in the Library. The tobacco industry has been reducing the tar yield of its brands and there is a continuing trend towards smoking lower tar cigarettes. By the time any directive comes into force, it is possible that a smaller percentage of the market will be affected.

The voluntary agreement to reduce the "sales weighted average tar yield" of cigarettes has gone a long way towards ensuring that the United Kingdom smoker uses lower tar cigarettes than does the smoker in many other European countries. We hope that further progress will be possible. The future timetable on the draft directive is not clear, but it seems unlikely that it will be ready for the Council in under 12 months.

I should like to share with the House a couple of problems that are associated with the directives. We are concerned to retain the United Kingdom system, whereby voluntary agreements provide the means for controlling the conditions under which cigarettes are marketed. The system is well-established and has been shown to work effectively over many years. It has the advantage of being flexible, as it is negotiated every few years, and we can use that to take account of new concerns and technology. That would be less easy to do with legislation.

We have been arguing strongly in Brussels for the right to implement any directive that may be adopted through our system of voluntary agreements. It has been a general theme in other sectors of regulation and deregulation. We do not take issue with the broad aims of the draft directives, but we wish to keep our system, which has been working well. We shall continue to push for this in further discussions.

Another issue that arises from the draft directives is that each has a clause stating that member states may not prohibit or restrict the sale of products that conform to them. As they stand, this would outlaw present United Kingdom law prohibiting the sale of tobacco to under-16s. Other member states have similar problems. The European Commission is aware of this and is proposing to amend the draft to make it clear that member states may lay down provisions considered necessary to protect citizens' health against the harmful effects of tobacco, as long as the provisions do not affect labelling. It is important that we should be able to maintain the United Kindom's high standard of health protection in this regard, and we shall continue to press strongly for that.

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston): I should like to press the Minister on whether the directive will be implemented voluntarily or legally. Will she comment on the report of the Select Committee on European Legislation, which suggests that the Government have received legal advice from the Council's Commission's legal services that legislation will be necessary if the Government are to implement the directive?

Mrs. Currie: Yes, we have received such advice, and the point will be pressed again at the meeting of Council Ministers on 13 December. My hon. Friends who tabled the amendment will be aware that this issue was raised by Mr. Speaker's counsel in March in the annex to the 19th report of the Select Committee on European Legislation. I note what my hon. Friends say in the amendment, but say that we have, we will and we do. We have raised this issue with the Commission, and will do so with the Council's legal services. We have still to be satisfied that the public health policy content of the directives is within the scope of article 100A3 of the treaty. We must reserve judgment on its appropriateness until we have heard the Commission's explanation.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Why should the Government reserve their position until they have heard the Commission's views? Surely it is possible for the Government to have a view before they receive the Commission's advice.

Mrs. Currie: We have stated our position clearly. We think that we must put our points of view to the Commission and await its explanation. That is a courtesy to people who are putting points to us. That is also the position that we take on voluntary agreements. We have received legal advice and we hear what is being said. We believe that helping people through voluntary agreements has been successful, and we shall continue to say so in Europe.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): The Minister may not be aware that the Select Committee on European Legislation is conducting an inquiry into the treaty base, but has not yet reported. I should not have thought that acceptance of the amendment would be contrary to anything that the Minister has said. Surely the treaty is asking the Government only to raise the issue. Indeed, the hon. Lady has said that they have and will. Do I ascertain from her remarks that she is resisting the amendment, or is she saying "We have done it and therefore we are accepting it"?

Mrs. Currie: The hon. Gentleman has not heard the debate on the amendment. I am not moving the amendment, but I look forward to that being done by my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken). I notice that the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) has put his name to the amendment.

As part of my preparation for today's debate I read through a number of debates on the subject. I think that I have read almost everything that the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) has said about it, and I enjoyed that very much. I note that he said the same thing over and over again and was answered at the Dispatch Box by a variety of Ministers. The hon. Gentleman does not seem always to have absorbed the gist of what they said, since his subsequent speeches were identical to the earlier ones. I look forward to hearing what he has to say later in this debate should he catch Mr. Deputy Speaker's eye.

The use of article 100A, which is essentially related to the establishment of the functioning of the internal market, is being kept closely under review by the Government. We press for the adoption of a different treaty base when article 100A is considere inappropriate. Although I understand the concerns expressed in the amendment, I cannot accept the implication—I hope that my hon. Friends will understand why—that the use of article 100A is not being kept under close surveillance, so I hope my hon. Friends will not press their amendment.

The Government support progress towards removing barriers to trade between member states. They are also anxious to maintain and develop health safeguards against smoking. In the United Kingdom the successful development of such safeguards is based on our well-established system of voluntary agreements between the Government and industry. We want to maintain the advantages of that system. We shall continue, in negotiations on these and subsequent directives, to place great emphasis on these important United Kingdom concerns and successes.

9.35 pm

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston): The Opposition support the thrust of both directives. I understand the constitutional point expressed in the amendment, and I say to all those who have attached their names to it that I find it difficult to disagree with the idea that the directives have more to do with public health than with trade matters, so it is perhaps unfortunate that they are brought before us under this article.

It may have been sensible and salutary for those hon. Members to table their amendment to serve as a warning to the Commission that it will be in some difficulty if it brings in directives in this way about other matters that do not necessarily command the degree of support that the objective of these directives should. I fully support that objective. Having come thus far, it would be wrong to tell the European Commission to return to "Go". The tobacco lobby is immensely skilled in preventing progress on these heads.

With that in mind, I welcome the Minister's speech. It was a great advance on the comments of her noble Friend Lord Skelmersdale, who represented her Department when the matter was discussed in the Council of Ministers. He electrified the atmosphere and entertained the other Health Ministers by saying that he was unhappy about the directives as he took the view that individuals should be free to choose their own method of death—whether from high-tar cigarettes or from throwing themselves in front of the airport bus. I am glad that the Minister did not endorse either proposition.

I strongly support the proposals on labelling which would take the health warning off the side notes of the packet and put them up front on the two larger sides—back and front. That is desirable—[HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] Because cigarettes kill. Fortunately, the labelling will be toughened to make that the message. As a result of the directive the current British expression, "Smoking can cause cancer," will change to the much more blunt and accurate statement, "Smoking causes cancer." It is important that we make these changes and that the labelling should be as bold and prominent as possible.

Although it is clear from many surveys that smokers well understand that substantial health risks attach to smoking, most smokers still do not believe it will happen to them, despite the overwhelming evidence that one in four of them will die of diseases related to smoking.

I also welcome the other directive, which the Minister described as not having made the same degree of progress and which relates to the limitation on tar yields of cigarettes, but I do so with more reservation than that with which I welcomed the first. Britain's gain from the directive will be marginal, as, by 1992, the ceiling will be 15 mg of tar yield per cigarette, which happens to be the average sales-weighted index that we have already secured. The effect of the directive will be merely to make the current average a ceiling. That is a gain, but it is a limited gain that will be offset if it gives anyone the mistaken impression that smoking a low tar yield cigarette is safe. That would be a very unfortunate conclusion for anyone to reach.

There are still serious grounds for concern on public health policy about the incidence of cigarette smoking in our nation. I stress the apparent growth of smoking among the very young. It has been documented in several studies that one in four children has acquired the smoking habit by the age of 15, which is very worrying when one considers future trends in smoking. It is unlikely that labelling alone will alter that trend and reverse the incidence of smoking among the very young, especially if those changes in labelling take place in a context in which the tobacco industry spends £100 million a year on advertising tobacco products.

I do not agree with the Minister's praise of the voluntary agreement with the tobacco industry secured by the Government. It is difficult to share her conviction that that voluntary agreement is successful and worthwhile. On the contrary, there is abundant evidence that the tobacco industry uses much ingenuity and fecund imagination in finding ways round all the heads in the voluntary agreement. A case in point is Marlboro, which, under voluntary agreement, cannot place a cowboy in its adverts because it would represent a figure attractive to youngsters. Instead of showing a cowboy, as it does in America, it shows endless shots of horses that would otherwise be ridden by the cowboy, who was presumably just off camera when the photograph was taken.

In Edinburgh, a disturbing survey discovered that a clear majority of tobacconists who carried on business near to children's playgrounds had external tobacco adverts which breached one or more of the heads of the voluntary agreement.

The voluntary agreement is substantially undermined by our tolerance of a remarkable amount of sponsorship of sports by the tobacco industry. A key point in the voluntary agreement is that tobacco should not be connected with success in sport, but the whole point of sponsorship of sport by the tobacco industry is precisely to connect tobacco with success in sport. It also provides a convenient way round the ban on advertising tobacco products on television. On average, one hour a day of television transmission time is given over to covering sports that are sponsored by the tobacco industry, with the remarkable result that most children still believe that tobacco adverts are allowed on television. They have never seen one; all that they have seen is the sponsorship of sports on television.

The most disturbing feature of the Minister's speech was that, given the history of circumvention of the agreement and its ineffectiveness in substantially reducing penetration by the tobacco industry into commercial sponsorship and advertising, at some stage the House will have to take the step that has been taken by more than 20 other countries and introduce a legal ban on tobacco advertising. Those 20 countries were most recently joined by Canada and some Australian states. I am puzzled by the Minister's references to proceeding by voluntary agreement rather than by legislation. It is difficult to understand how the Minister can give effect to the directive on labelling without contemplating legislation, and I am puzzled by what she said about legal advice.

I understand why, as a matter of public policy, the Government may wish to preserve the voluntary agreement rather than introduce legislation. I believe that they are wrong, but I understand why they may prefer it. I cannot understand why, having received legal advice that it would be necessary to introduce such legislation to adopt the directive, they persist in ignoring it. That can only rest on the fact that there is legal advice available to the Government that counters the legal advice that has been tendered to them by the Council and the Commission. If not, and if the Minister is serious in supporting the directive and welcoming its objective, she will have to accept that it will require legislation. We would welcome such legislation because of the clear principle that it would introduce, that the tobacco industry has to advertise within the law.

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): The hon. Gentleman's remarks are very revealing. Is this clear and firm Labour party policy? In my area, about 3,000 people are still employed in the tobacco industry, and probably five times as many as that are pensioners of a famous company, John Player. They would be interested to hear the final policy of the Labour party, as it now stands.

Mr. Cook: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will take every opportunity of reporting it to them.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: Why not?

Mr. Cook: I did not suggest a single reason why the hon. Gentleman should not do so. I suggested that he should do so. When he does report it to the tobacco industry, I presume that it will be relaxed about the proposal as it constantly lectures us that the point of advertising tobacco products is not to persuade people to smoke but merely to persuade those who smoke to shift brands. Therefore, I cannot understand why the tobacco industry, which keeps assuring us that nobody smokes because it advertises, is the least bit worried about advertising being banned by legal prescription. That has happened in over 20 countries. One day we shall have a Government who will pluck up the courage to take legal action to ensure that the tobacco industry has to advertise within the law and not within a voluntary agreement. To that extent, I am disappointed that the Government propose to implement this directive purely by voluntary agreement. If they do so, they will be throwing away what could possibly be the greater gain from this directive.

9.46 pm

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): I beg to move, at end of the Question to add

'but expresses concern at the extent to which the Commission is presenting directives under article 100A when the issues involved fall more appropriately under other articles of the Treaty; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government to raise the issue of the Treaty Clause base at the Council of Ministers before discussions proceed on the merits of the proposed directive.'.

The amendment raises a small but nevertheless crucial constitutional point about what I believe to be the manifest impropriety in the method that the European Commission has used to bring in this proposed directive on the labelling of tobacco products with their tar content. As the amendment states, and as my hon. Friend the Minister has made clear, the legal basis for these directives is article 100A of the Single European Act's addition to the treaty of Rome.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary was tremendously candid with the House. She made it clear that these directives were being introduced basically for preventive health reasons and, as an ardent non-smoker, I am sympathetic to what the Commission is seeking to achieve and my hon. Friend's endorsement of it. I recognise that others may wish to quarrel with the substance and content of the directives. There are many cheerfully heavy smokers in the House and many with views like those of Lord Skelmersdale.

Mrs. Currie: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way to me as I recognise that, with the leave of the House, I shall have an opportunity to respond later. However, I should not wish my hon. Friend to besmirch my perfect reputation. I said that the Commission said that these directives are part of the liberalisation of the internal market for 1992. I shall come back to that point later. It is not our view that they are being introduced for preventive health measures. There are on the horizon other directives under the "Europe Against Cancer" programme which are under different articles and which will possibly be debated in the House in due course.

Mr. Aitken: Far be it for me to besmirch my hon. Friend's reputation. I know when I am on a loser. However, in all seriousness, I find a certain Dispatch Box schizophrenia in what she said. I am not sure whether my hon. Friend thinks that she is speaking for the European Commission or for the Government. When she spoke for the Government, the major part of her speech seemed to be directed to the health reasons for backing these directives. Leaving aside the legal niceties and the requirement to be polite to the European Commission, I feel that the whole thrust of these directives must be that they are being introduced in the spirit of Euro-nanny knowing what is best.

That is the drive of these directives. We do not need to quarrel about whether we are for or against the content of the directives. I have tabled the amendment on the basis that it is crystal clear and a matter of common sense that we are seeking to introduce some good, preventive health engineering. My hon. Friend the Minister is quite right. That is not what the European Commission would like us to believe.

The clock struck 13 for me when I read the opening line of the directive which states that the elimination of all trade barriers by 1992 requires the harmonisation of national provisions governing the labelling of tobacco products. We should ask why that is the case. In considering the need for harmonisation across European Community trade barriers, the last thing we need to worry about is what labels are on tobacco cartons. Some of the explanatory memoranda make it clear that virtually all the European nations give some kind of health warning on cigarette packets. What appears to be at issue is the precise wording, whether we are being warned against bronchial —cum—cardiovascular diseases or fatal disease or whether smoking is simply bad for our health.

All that needs to be harmonised is the degree of verbal warning, not the fact that there is a message on the cigarette packet. It is nonsense to suggest that it is a requirement of the internal market to harmonise health warnings. It reminds me of the famous remark by the late governor Al Smith of New York who said, "However thin you slice it, it's still baloney." It is baloney that the Common Market Commission needs to gear up to harmonise the precise words.

Why do I take the trouble to labour the point at this late hour? I believe that the truth content of the opening words of the directive, like the tar content, is about 15 per cent. The other 85 per cent. of the truth content is that health is the issue here. In the polite language of the Select Committee on European Legislation, the directive comprises "measures whose prime objectives appear difficult to reconcile with the establishment or functioning of the internal market."

We cannot find a more civil way of putting across the message that I was putting forward in rather blunt terms.

In the manipulation of the legal basis of the directive lies the dangerous thin end of the wedge in constitutional terms. As we contemplate a wide spectrum of directives, we realise that article 100A is a convenient vehicle for the social engineering ambitions of Mr. Jacques Delors and his Commission. Directives brought in under article 100A require majority voting. I cannot put it any better than in the language of Mr. Speaker's counsel. I quote from his observations on the directive in which he said:

"A particular danger is that areas of competence may pass to the Community undetected or at any rate unchallenged on the coat-tails of the internal market element in Commission proposals. This would be an unexpected result if one sees Article 100A as being concerned not with competence but with unblocking the decision-taking process in a particular area already well founded in the Treaty."

Mr. Speaker's counsel has put the case admirably. We, as a House of Commons, should not just let go, without comment, the fact that the legal basis of the directive is constitutionally unsound. The Government's legal advisers, particularly the Cabinet Office legal team which is supposed to fight such battles in the preliminary stages at Brussels, should have done their job much more thoroughly. They were asleep at the switch. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will tell us later whether Lord Skelmersdale raised this point at the Council of Ministers when he spoke on the issue in the early stages. Did he make an effort to insist in the early stages that the directive should have been introduced under a different article of the treaty?

I was impressed by the response of my hon. Friend the Minister: "We have, we shall and we do," suggesting that she was almost enthusiastic about the amendment. However, a moment or two later she skated off on a different and less solid piece of ice and seemed to urge us not to press the proposal. She seemed unwilling to accept it because she said that the Government must preserve their position our of courtesy to the European Commission. I should have expected my hon. Friend of all people to take a slightly more robust approach. She is not afraid to state her position clearly and tread on a few toes from time to time. Surely we do not need to be so elaborately courteous that we do not dare state the British Government's position on a matter of such fundamental constitutional importance.

Mr. Spearing: I had an exchange with the Minister on that very point. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that there is a possible explanation for the schizophrenia to which he referred? According to my information, if a treaty basis is to be challenged, it must be challenged on introduction and by practice and an effective reversal of that basis must be by unanimous decision. Is it not possible that the Government apprehended that that might be impossible and therefore remained silent and will continue to do so despite what the Minister said? Perhaps that is the reason for her unwillingness to accept the amendment.

Mr. Aitken: Perhaps my hon. Friend will respond to that herself.

My hon. Friends and I wanted to put down an important constitutional marker. I would not wish to spoil the directive on this issue, and that is in no way the point of this exercise. However, if we do not protest at this thin edge of the wedge, article 100A will be used in much more sinister ways. In view of what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said recently—in her speech in Bruges and about the social dimension of the market, which she opposes—the sooner we make our position clear the better.

9.57 pm

Mr. Michael Knowles (Nottingham, East): My hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) and I do not often agree about subjects relating to the Community. Generally he is regarded as an opponent and I am regarded as a supporter. Nevertheless, my hon. Friend has raised some valid points, and I should like to add to them.

Who decided that the health department in each country would be the lead department for directives concerning the tobacco industry? Let me declare my interest. I am a Nottingham Member and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) said earlier, 3,000 jobs are at stake in the city, and many more depend upon them. I make no apology to anyone for that declaration of interest. The health departments have been given the lead on a subject affecting a major industry with wide implications for employment and tax yield. If one consults any health department anywhere in the world on the subject of tobacco, one knows what the outcome will be. Quite simply, they are agin it; one can take that as read. Make them the lead department on any matter to do with tobacco and they will come up with restrictions. Rather than restrictions in one country we shall have restrictions from 12 health departments across the whole Community. That outcome was certain, but surely there were other Departments with an interest in such a major industry, such as the Department of Trade and Industry and the Treasury, which would have tax yield in mind. It would seem that their interests have not been included.

There is a problem within the Community—it is highlighted by the debate—that has been well described as the democratic deficit. We know that the Select Committee on European Legislation gets in on the act only at a late stage when proposed measures have already passed through the Council and the Commission. The European Parliament comes in on the act only at the tail end of the process. The idea of any elected assembly having any real say does not apply. Such assemblies are presented with a fait accompli at each stage. That should be of concern to us.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): My hon. Friend and I served on the Select Committee on European Legislation a few years ago, and what he has just said is frequently the reality. The Committee comes in rather late, and he will know that I was pressing for a long time that it should come in much earlier. It is possible within the Committee's terms of reference, and as a matter of procedure, for it to do so. As majority voting applies, as distinct from issues that are subject to unanimity, it would be highly desirable if we were to press effectively for early consideration of these issues.

Mr. Knowles: Absolutely. My hon. Friend and I are at one.

The Danish Parliament has probably gone too far, for its committee is over-restrictive on the Government. The French and German national Parliaments have close liaison between European members and national members and they achieve more of a balance. The United Kingdom Parliament is outstanding because as a national Parliament it gets no say whatsoever. Much is left in the hands of Government Departments. Of course, I share the faith that all of my right hon. and hon. Friends have fingertip control and are aware of everything that is going on within their Department night and day. However, there is the possibility that what we are seeing in Europe is a conspiracy of bureaucracies between the national bureaucracies in the 12 member states and the Community. At no stage does any elected assembly have any real control. That concerns me and it should concern all hon. Members. We should reinforce the powers of the Select Committee on European Legislation.

My hon. Friend the Minister is in the happy position of knowing that the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), the Opposition spokesman, was more extreme than herself. The hon. Gentleman made her appear more reasonable than perhaps she was. I can remember the halcyon days of about 10 years ago when we made speeches about the nanny state. We used to complain also about there being too much legislation. I suppose that times change. The truth is that we now see the nanny state writ large on a European scale. The irony is that without harmonised testing methods and procedures it is likely that barriers to trade could be raised by this measure, not lowered.

Despite what my hon. Friend the Minister has said about the Government continuing to press for the voluntary agreement to be recognised, I have my doubts. I fear that we shall see swept away a system of co-operation between the industry and the Government. I have no doubt that the hon. Member for Livingston would say that it would be much better to replace that system with a system of law, which would introduce much more control. I am not sure about that. When Bills pass through Parliament and become enacted we often think that they will achieve our purposes, but sometimes they do not. If there is a war between a major industry and the Government, I am not sure who will win. I would be wary of going down that path. It is easy to advocate the principle, but the outcome of a confrontation would not be certain.

The effect on the industry in Britain would be devastating, if the proposed ceiling would ban 82 per cent. of cigarettes currently manufactured in this country. That would have a massive effect on the industry.

I believe that the tar proposal in particular has just been disguised as part of the internal market so that it may be passed through the Council of Ministers on a weighted voting system. The proposal has nothing to do with internal trade, which was the point of article 100A. The article is being used for false purposes. That is wrong.

My hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) said that items might be swept under article 100A when they should come under other articles. That means that they must be passed automatically and that opens a very wide gate. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister could repeat her Bruges speech ad infinitum. However, if that gate is opened the powers of the European Community will increase massively. There might be arguments for that, but we should debate them openly and not let matters slip through by inching the gate open steadily without debating the constitutional points.

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend accept that, irrespective of what could or might happen in the Council of Ministers on this point, if there is a technical breach of the vires in that member states are not entitled to use article 100A, that could be taken to the European Court of Justice? Irrespective of the view of some people that the European Court of Justice would naturally tend to side with the Commission, that might be the right route to adopt given the considerable doubts expressed about this matter.

Mr. Knowles: I suspect that the battle has been lost. If that was to be the practice, it should have been done at the beginning when the matter first went to the Council of Ministers. I suspect that it is too late now for this directive. However, that should be the procedure for the next directive on this matter which might be slipped through.

The tar proposal is far in excess of what is necessary to permit the free movement of goods, which is the point of article 100A. We must be aware of that. If the proposal works for the 12 member states' health departments allied to people in the Commission who share their views, that route will be used for many other restrictions in other areas. We must be very careful before we go down that road without sounding a warning.

10.7 pm

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): In his opening comments my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Knowles) said that every health department would be against the use of tobacco. He said that in terms which suggested that they were all part of some sinister plot. However, he is absolutely right, and every health department will be against tobacco.

I want to repeat two propositions that I have uttered in the House before, and I do not apologise for doing so. First, smoking is the largest avoidable cause of death in this country. Secondly, 100,000 people per annum die prematurely from smoking, and thousands suffer painful illnesses and diseases because they smoke.

The House will be aware that I am chairman of the all-party group ASH—Action on Smoking and Health. Hon. Members may also be aware that the group's vice chairman is the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes). That shows that the group covers a pretty wide spectrum in the House.

Members of ASH are subject to frequent criticism from an organisation called FOREST—Freedom Organisation for the Right to Enjoy Smoking Tobacco—which, alas, often demonstrates qualities of intolerance and bigotry which it ascribes to us. FOREST claims to promote the interests of freedom, but it is of course a body financially supported by the tobacco industry. We are neither intolerant nor bigoted. If a man or woman wishes to smoke, that is his or her free choice. However, we claim the freedom for the non-smoker not to have to breathe other people's smoke.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I draw to the hon. Gentleman's attention the specific proposals that are before the House, to which he is not addressing himself.

Mr. Sims: I am obliged to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and in view of your ruling I shall not pursue that point.

I was trying to indicate the areas of criticism made by FOREST. Another takes the form of an implication that there is something unreasonable or improper about a number of the cases made by ASH. We argue that because of the overwhelming evidence of the harm done by smoking there is a heavy responsibility on the Government to reduce the health risks of smoking, to persuade smokers to smoke less or to stop, and to dissuade young people from starting to smoke.

The two draft directives before the House are both useful steps in that direction. There is clear evidence of the relationship between the quantity of tar in cigarettes and the cancer risk. In recent years the level has been reduced from 30 mg to 15 mg, so a further reduction to 12 mg by 1995 should not be difficult to achieve. It will at least offer a modest reduction in the health risk, so I strongly support that directive.

The other draft directive is on the labelling of tobacco products. As my hon. Friend the Minister said, that is nothing new, because tobacco products have carried health warnings for several years, on the smaller sides of cigarette packets. They include the words:

"Smoking can cause fatal diseases,"

"Smoking can cause heart disease," and

"Smoking can cause lung cancer."

Right hon. and hon. Members will note the element of doubt, with the use of the word "can". The fact remains, as was said by the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), that smoking does cause cancer and other diseases.

In 1985 the Health Education Council undertook research which clearly showed that, to be effective, cigarette packet warnings needed to be more prominent and strongly worded. The draft directive achieves both those aims. It requires that health warnings appear on both the larger sides of cigarette packets, and it details a series of strongly-worded warnings. The extent to which a country adopts them is optional. I hope that our country will use them all, because frequent changes of wording are more likely to attract attention. That proposal also has my support, because anything that brings home the danger to smokers, and especially to potential smokers, must be beneficial.

The draft directives refer to tobacco products, not simply to cigarettes. As I understand my hon. Friend, they will also cover cigars, cigarillos, and pipe tobaccos. When my hon. Friend replies to the debate, perhaps she will also indicate whether the directives will cover Skoal Bandits, which are the oral tobacco pouches, with which some right hon. and hon. Members may be familiar. Whether or not they do is academic, because I understand that the Government intend prohibiting Skoal Bandits altogether, although as yet we see no signs of their bringing such a measure into effect. Perhaps my hon. Friend will indicate what is happening on that front.

It is the Commission's intention that the draft directives shall be translated into legislation. My hon. Friend has indicated that, hitherto, the Government have favoured voluntary arrangements and prefer to continue on that course. I join the hon. Member for Livingston in urging the Government to think again. Voluntary agreements are inevitably a compromise. They do not go as far as the Department of Health would want and, by their nature, they cannot be enforced. Compliance with the directives would not, I understand, involve complex legislation. We could comply with the directives simply by orders under the Consumer Protection Act 1987, and I suggest that that would be an appropriate course to follow.

The purpose of the legislation is harmonisation. There is one other matter of great concern on which my hon. Friend touched—the suggestion that member states may not prohibit or restrict the sale of products when they are conforming to those directives. That conflicts with our law prohibiting the sale of cigarette products to the under-16s. Research shows that, in the 11 to 15 age group, 12 per cent. of girls and 7 per cent. of boys smoke regularly. In the 15 to 16 age group, the figures rise to 27 per cent. of girls and 18 per cent. of boys. Half the adult smokers started smoking as children, so it is vital that, far from our powers to restrict sales to under-16s being reduced, they should be strengthened.

I accept that the Commission is aware of this problem, but I put it to my hon. Friend that it must be a condition of our accepting these directives that that point is adequately dealt with. Of course, there has been opposition from the tobacco industry to these directives, perhaps not surprisingly, and no doubt we shall hear more. I have carefully read the submission by the Tobacco Advisory Council and its European counterparts. I find their case unconvincing and very much a matter of special pleading. To draw a parallel between requiring lower tar yields and the complete prohibition of alcohol in the United States is stretching logical argument beyond reason. Nor does a plea that printing health warnings on the front of the packet would depreciate the commercial and legal value of the trade mark carry much weight.

I hope that the House will support the motion. I urge the Government to support and implement the directives as soon as practicable.

10.17 pm

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): I do not smoke, but, to abuse that famous saying, I shall defend my constituents' right to do so. I want to defend more than just my constituents. I refer to an intervention that I made earlier, and to comments by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Knowles), that the six or seven constituencies that make up greater Nottingham contain the homes of about 3,000 people who are directly employed in the tobacco industry by probably the country's most famous tobacco manufacturer, John Player. It is my duty, if nothing else, to represent the interests not just of those who are still working for John Player but of the many thousands of its pensioners who have benefited from that company's commercial activities over many years. Their case is entitled to be heard in the House.

I concede that the aims of the motion are much in line with current thinking, but, as has been mentioned by a number of colleagues, I am disturbed at the route that the EEC has taken. I welcome the comments of my hon. Friend the Minister and hope that something can be done to bring to the EEC some of the depth of feeling on this topic. As my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) said, it is difficult to link article 100A with the functioning of an internal market. By a stretch of the imagination, I suppose that one can, but if we do not stamp on it now I do not think that we shall ever be able to do so.

We are asked to look at this proposal in the context of the single market in 1992. We are also asked to believe that it is designed to ensure the free circulation of tobacco products and to take into account health considerations. I cannot look at it in that light. I am also puzzled by the insistence on packaging being printed in the language that is used at the point of sale. That will make life even more difficult. It will result in a restriction on the circulation of goods.

We are told that the elimination of all trade barriers by 1992 requires the harmonisation of all national provisions that govern the labelling of tobacco products. I am not against the adoption of a common approach to health warnings, but it is a pity that companies with traditional packaging or world-famous logos should be told by the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) that warnings round the sides of the packs are not enough—that people are so stupid that, unless the warnings are plastered across the front of every pack, they will be unable to read them. That is stretching the point much too far. I believe that the black and gold pack of John Player and the blue pack of the French Gauloises are traditional to those companies. I see no reason why they should be forced to change their packs because they have to be plastered with health warnings 50 times over.

I do not believe that the tar proposals should be part of the integrated market programme. I do not like the way in which that proposal is being handled by the Council of Ministers. If we accept the proposed ceilings, 82 per cent. of all our brands will have to go off the market. Customer choice may change over time and the industry may be able to adjust to that change, but the fact is that a staggering 82 per cent. of all our brands would have to come off the shelves if the proposal were to be applied quickly. Even if the ceilings were agreed, it is just possible that, without harmonised testing methods and procedures, barriers to trade would be created.

I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to ensure that in the right quarters our approach to the tax proposals is handled much more carefully. I should hate the tax proposals to be slipped in by the Commissioners by means of another article that did not allow the House to exercise the sovereignty over taxation that hitherto we have taken for granted.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): Does my hon. Friend agree that a directive of this kind means that the value of harmonising trade throughout the European Community has been hijacked, in this case by the anti-smoking lobby? Does he also agree that those who want the market to be opened up are very concerned that the Commission may introduce other measures, under which the proponents of the social dimension will try to hijack measures that are designed to open up the market? It is the confusion between the two objectives——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are discussing the labelling of tobacco products and the tar yield of cigarettes.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The proposed labelling and all it stands for is part of what has correctly been described as a manifestation not of the nanny state but of the nanny continent.

Even the industry does not try to kid anybody that tobacco is good for one's health, but I hope that the taxation arrangements will be much more specific than ad valorem. If we tax ad valorem, we shall merely reduce the number of cigarettes made in Britain. There will be very little reduction in the number of cigarettes smoked. All that will happen is that we shall import cheap, subsidised tobacco from a variety——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will bear in mind what I have just said. We are discussing the labelling of tobacco products and the tar yield of cigarettes, not taxation.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but we are trying to illustrate that the article that we are discussing is one of the danger points. We are anxious that if labelling comes in under this article, so might taxation. That is a matter of real concern——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We are not discussing an article. We are discussing two draft directives with specific intentions, to which I have referred. I hope that the House will direct its remarks to them.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: The Commission seems to be trying to extend its powers in this area of public health by engineering the sole right to amend enacted legislation without reference to national Parliaments.

I am not quite sure how the Greeks will react to this one. During the recess, I had a very happy week going through Salonika where a lot of tobacco is grown. There are no health warnings on Greek cigarettes and 70 per cent. of the male population smokes its head off, but, believe it or not, Greece has the lowest incidence of lung cancer in Europe.

Mrs. Currie rose——

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I offer that only as a piece of gratuituous information which I knew would produce a response.

Mrs. Currie: I am sure that my hon. Friend would not wish anybody to think that lung cancer develops quickly after the smoking rate rises. In Britain we have found that as smoking has dropped, and particularly as the tar yield of cigarettes smoked has dropped, it has taken 10 to 15 years for falls to be shown in mortality from lung cancer.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I am not disputing my hon. Friend's figures. I am simply saying that the Greeks have probably been smoking for as long as people in Britain. There seems to be a strange quirk of reality. Some 70 per cent. of Greek adult males smoke, but they have the lowest incidence of lung cancer in Europe. Even worse is the fact that they smoke tobacco with a much higher tar yield than do the British. That may not fit the received wisdom of the Minister, but it is the reality.

We understand that tobacco is not good for health. We are not trying to push smoking. We are simply trying to ensure that, if people wish to smoke, they understand the risks. The House should recognise that many thousands of people depend, directly or indirectly, on this industry for their jobs and their livelihoods. We should not lightly set their interests to one side.

Sir Trevor Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): I listened attentively to my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken). His argument was very sound.

A convenient instrument—article 100A—has been selected. It was calculated initially to harmonise national law to remove obstacles to free trade. The Community's proposals for ensuring the free movement of goods are excessive. Indeed, they would disrupt trade, industry and competition.

The EEC grows approximately 350,000 tonnes of tobacco in some 250,000 farms, which are largely in the poorer countries of the Mediterranean. The tobacco is low in nicotine and unsuited to the manufacture of low-tar cigarettes. Much of the current crop would be unsaleable by 1991. The countries concerned are Greece, Italy, Spain and Portugal.

Are we to contemplate that the purpose of article 100A is deliberately to thrust people into unemployment? That is not the way to enlarge trade—it will constrict trade, and I do not believe that that was the aim. The Commission had health considerations in mind and proposed to use them as a convenient method to achieve the inevitable result of the majority vote, as has already been said.

My hon. Friend the Minister has said that there is no such thing as a safe cigarette. I dare say that we shall hear from the Opposition that one cigarette will cause death. I do not accept that view. My view is that we should be careful not to lay down maxims, but to do nothing to excess is a reasonable view of life.

As for the draft directive on labelling, 90 per cent. of people recognise the health warning. It cannot be brought to their attention any more clearly. I do not consider that it would be any more significant if it were printed on two or three sides of the carton or if the trade mark were eliminated. The method of smoking is also relevant. If people puff harder, they will get more tar in their lungs. If they smoke lightly, they will be less affected.

Therefore, the battle is not quite as easy as the Minister says. However, I shall support her in one respect. It has been traditional in the United Kingdom to carry out consultation with the industry and that has been very successful. I am not sure that I accept the Minister's figures, so I shall provide my own. The average tar yield of cigarettes has dropped from 22·5 mg per cigarette in 1970 to 13 mg per cigarette in 1987—a reduction of about 40 per cent. in 16 years. That was achieved without legislation through a voluntary arrangement with the industry concerned, with the minimum disruption and without the prohibition of any brand of cigarettes. That is what can be achieved.

Apparently the Opposition are saying that we should have legislation and that everyone should be bound by it. It has been said tonight that, if we were to impose a level of 12 mg by 1995, 80 per cent. of cigarettes in the United Kingdom would be unsaleable, as would 83 per cent. of those in the European Community. I am not certain whether my hon. Friend the Minister would agree with the figures that I have given, but they are the industry's figures. I think that some of the figures that she cited were very much lower. However, that would lead to a massive disruption and loss of employment which we do not wish to see in the United Kingdom.

I shall make only one other point as I do not wish to take up too much of the time of the House. I mentioned that the method of smoking is significant, but for the growers in the United Kingdom and elsewhere I must pray in aid the fact that a marked change must be phased in. Blending tobacco is extremely difficult unless there is the correct leaf and would have to be secured from abroad and that could lead to considerable difficulties during the next two or three years.

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): I have to declare an interest in the matter because my father gained passing notoriety when he successfully saw off a robust bid for the family company by a tobacco company and as a result a poem was published in the Financial Times which lampooned the fact that the tobacco company had gained control of and owned Golders Green crematorium. The late Jimmy Hanley used to say that the only sign of life was the smoke coming from the crematorium chimney. Lest hon. Members feel that I approach the subject with too much flippancy, I should say that my family has done a considerable amount for research at the Royal Marsden hospital and was active in the early days in furthering Dame Cicely Saunders in the hospice movement.

Article 2 of the proposed directive defines tobacco products as "products for the purpose of smoking, sniffing, sucking or chewing inasmuch as they are, even partly, made of tobacco".

Can my hon. Friend the Minister tell me who will decide which is the front and which is the back of a bar of chewing tobacco so that the health warning may be printed upon it?

The question that I should like to ask my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) involves the "sniffing" mentioned in article 2. The House of Commons Public Information Office circular No. 52 states:

"Another curious survival of the eighteenth century is the provision of snuff, in recent years at public expense"—

I stress, "at public expense"—

"for Members and Officers of the House, at the doorkeepers' box at the entrance to the Chamber. A few still avail themselves of the facility. Snuff, however, is the only form of tobacco the use of which is tolerated in or around the Chamber: smoking has been banned there and in committees since 1693."

I learn from the book, "The Great Palace", that the snuff provided is contained in a box made of oak

"saved from the bombed Chamber after the last war, and it contains a blend of snuff milled especially for the Commons. On top of the box there is a silver plaque which lists the names of the Principal Doorkeepers who have guarded the Chamber door."

Our Principal Doorkeeper, like all our Doorkeepers, had considerable and distinguished service in Her Majesty's armed forces. One wonders whether, on his front and back, he will require a health warning of the dimensions laid out in the proposal directive.

I should like my hon. Friend the Minister to direct her attention to the fact that the hypocrisy of the House is yet again evident. It is a case not of do as I do but do as I say. The hon. Member for Livingston made it clear that the Labour party wants to see action on the health hazard, yet we have a tobacco product provided for all hon. Members at the taxpayers' expense.

Apart from motorists in Britain, I know of no other groups who are now as persecuted as smokers. In the past few weeks we have heard much about pensioners, and to many of them their bit of tobacco, their puff and their pint of beer is the comfort to which they look forward in their twilight years.

The objective of the directive is said to be to achieve greater protection of the individual. Nowhere can we see the ghost of Jacques Delors more clearly printed than in that phrase. Conservative Members believe that the protection of the individual is in his own destiny and choice, not in EEC directives.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): I shall be brief, as my hon. Friends the Members for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) and for Nottingham, East (Mr. Knowles) have covered the points that I would otherwise have covered at greater length. This matter is of concern to Nottinghamshire and to those employed in the tobacco industry.

I am sorry that the debate has, perhaps understandably, been bedevilled by hostility to the tobacco industry. If we are to say that tobacco has some of the evil effects described by hon. Members, we should debate it openly and thoroughly. If we are to ban tobacco, we should say so, not try to strangle it by the back door through a European proposal disguised as trade harmonisation. We should do one or the other.

There has been co-operation between the industry and the Government through the voluntary agreement, which has worked. The tar level has dropped from 22·5 mg to 13 mg per cigarette. If the proposal comes into force, all that good will will be dissipated. People will feel aggrieved, especially those in the industry who have co-operated. It will put paid to co-operation completely.

Some people want to go further down the health warning route. These proposals certainly do. I share the doubt that has been expressed by some of my hon. Friends about the effectiveness of the health warnings. I am not a smoker of cigarettes, but I have always found that those who are ignore the health warnings when deciding whether to buy another packet or to have another cigarette. The proposed directive will have no greater effect, but at the same time it will be a further brake on the industry's competitiveness and its ability to trade as it best knows how and legally.

If the EC believes that warnings are effective, why do we need a dual system? Why clutter cigarette packets with a load of information that no one will bother to read? It will be difficult to do so, be it on the back or the front, through the various trade marks or logos. I do not think that a proliferation of print will do anything other than restrict the tobacco industry in the sale of its products in a lawful manner.

Even if the amendment does not appeal to my hon. Friend the Minister, I hope that the way in which it is proposed will. I am a signatory to the amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken). If we are to restrict the sale of tobacco, we should do so in a sensible and correct way. I object to the proposals if the Commission will be able further to restrict tar yields or labelling without reference to Ministers. Civil servants restricting trade without reference to Parliament or Ministers is completely unacceptable.

Even if my hon. Friend the Minister disagrees with my views on the tobacco industry, I hope that she will share the widespread concern of hon. Members about the way in which it will be done.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): It is a pleasure to have the opportunity to speak on some of these important measures.

I hope that before a decision is made by the Council of Ministers the Minister will answer two important questions. First, what will be the cost to the EEC of making alternative provision for the massive European tobacco industry?

As the Minister knows, the European tobacco industry is the third largest producer of tobacco in the world. There are no fewer than 250,000 producers. They operate mainly in the southern parts of Europe, but there are also a few in the United Kingdom. Sadly, these producers make a kind of tobacco that is difficult, even over a period of years, to change to the proposed acutely low levels of tar. The industry will need an alternative system of support. Bearing in mind the astonishing bills that the EEC has landed us with, due to the common agricultural policy and the protection of agriculture that that entails, and that these producers have limited incomes, we need to know the cost of such alternative provision.

Secondly, will the Minister inquire to what extent the directives can fit in with free trade? The only conceivable connection is that Belgium, with three languages, will be put at a significant trade disadvantage because if the warnings are printed in three languagues on the packet there will be no room left on it to describe the contents. Is not that being unfair to Belgium?

I hope that the Minister appreciates the importance of the amendment. I hope that she has noticed that it is supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor), among others. He is an acknowledged enthusiast for almost every part of the EEC, but not for administrative nonsense. Under the Single European Act we gave the EEC additional powers that enable it to take decisions by majority vote. We decided on the category of things that should be so decided.

When the Commission, as my hon. Friends the Members for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) and for Esher and the Select Committee have said, goes beyond that category, it is reasonable that the Government should express their concern about such abuse. We fully appreciate that the Government can probably do nothing; even if they protest, it would need a unanimous Council decision to change from article 100A to the appropriate article. Nothing may be achieved by protest, but when powers are being abused, as almost all hon. Members in the debate have agreed they are, the least the Government can do is to express their displeasure and tell the Commission that it is doing something wrong. That might influence the Commission's future actions.

We know that Parliament does not consider these things. We decide nothing about the subjects that fall within the famous 80 per cent. sovereignty category. Even the Government do not decide most of these things. Measures can be enforced on us by majority vote. On the other hand, if the Commission goes beyond the powers granted by the Single European Act, we have the right to complain. I hope that the Minister, who is noted for her independence and vigour, will tell the Council at the meeting that it is in error, and ask it not to do this again.

Mrs. Currie: This has been an extremely useful take-note debate. We have heard a large number of pertinent speeches. I was distressed to hear that my colleagues feel that the Department of Health should not take the lead. I am speaking for the United Kingdom Government, and lines are cleared with our colleagues in the Department of Trade and Industry, the Treasury and other Departments before and during negotiations. I am not speaking only for myself.

Perhaps I should clear up the important question of how much snuff costs in the House. The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) tabled a question about that to my right hon. Friend the Lord President of the Council on Monday 7 November and was answered as follows:

"The average annual consumption of snuff provided by the Principal Doorkeeper is some 1¼ oz. I understand that only one hon. Member regularly takes advantage of this service. The average annual cost to public funds is 99p."—[Official Report, 7 November 1988; Vol. 140, c 93.]

My hon. Friends have expressed concern about several issues. I shall try to deal with them quickly, recognising that debates on other draft directives are to follow.

Broadly speaking, my hon. Friends have dealt with three main topics. My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) asked whether we should have majority voting, a point hinted at by one or two other hon. Members. That was dealt with in the debates on the Single European Act, which was passed with a large majority. On Second Reading the majority was 159, and the United Kingdom has been a major force in negotiations to make progress on the Single European Act using majority rule. Since 1985, more than 200 measures have been agreed, including 60 this year alone—many under the qualified majority rule—and that has had a catalytic effect on increasing the pace towards 1992. That may be one reason why my hon. Friend does not like it. I recognise the sincerity of the views that he and some of my hon. Friends expressed on that.

The second question is whether we should deal with tobacco as part of the move towards 1992. It is a legal product and a traded commodity, like many others. The trade runs into many millions of pounds. Others may not see the argument for excluding tobacco from our discussions. Labelling and product content are important matters that have been discussed in connection with many other legally traded products—for example, in the food directives, the labelling of cosmetics and the product content of pharmaceuticals. As long as a product is traded, as tobacco is—it is a legal product, and we have no plans to change its status—it is likely to be scrutinised by those concerned with trade. There are trade elements in the directive, so there are grounds for using article 100A.

I apologise to my hon. Friends if that sounds like casuistry, but labelling is different in various countries, and that might be a barrier to trade. Therefore it is appropriate that some discussion should take place on the basis of this article.

We may need to separate in our own minds the Commission's proposals on a traded product from our worries about tobacco as such. I recognise the interests of constituents that have been expressed by several hon. Members. They are honourable concerns, and hon. Members are doing their jobs as constituency Members well. I also recognise the concern that has been expressed about the nation's health and about some of the other claims made about the nation's health, which are not always well supported. We share those concerns. We already have means of dealing with them.

As for Greece, it is for the Greeks to decide their attitude to the directives. As to what my noble Friend Lord Skelmersdale said at the Council of Ministers, I understand that he did not mention the treaty base, but that he did use the words quoted by the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), and therefore left no one in any doubt where he stood.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) asked whether the directive would cover Skoal Bandits. The answer is yes. He asked where we stand on the proposals on Skoal Bandits. Representations are still under consideration.

I have some sympathy with the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken), which were echoed by some of my colleagues. We do not believe in harmonisation for the sake of it. We need to be convinced that the directive will remove barriers to trade, not erect them. The directive should have trade as its objective, as long as it is part of the moves towards 1992 —and little else. The primary purpose of these objectives is trade, but it is permissible under the treaty for health to be a subsidiary purpose, and when it is, paragraph (3) of article 100A is relevant. That is the "best practice" paragraph.

The Commission is considering other directives and documents on tobacco which come under other articles. Smoking in public places and the protection of children from tobacco will come in under article 235; broadcasting under articles 57 and 66; and tax harmonisation under article 99. A preliminary draft for a Commission-proposed directive on tobacco advertising has just been received. It is not yet known what the draft contains, nor under which article of the EC treaty the directive will be proposed. As for tax harmonisation, the directive was passed in 1977, but unanimity is required. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer have said publicly that deregulation, not approximation, is necessary for the completion of the single European market.

The third question that has been well aired tonight is whether we should use voluntary agreements instead of legislation. The United Kingdom has always been pragmatic on this matter. Our approach has been a mixture of legislation and voluntary action, and legislation on the subject goes back more than 50 years to the Public Service Vehicles (Conduct of Drivers, Conductors and Passengers) Regulations 1936. The most recent legislation was the Protection of Children (Tobacco) Act 1986.

This morning I saw Professor Sir Peter Froggatt of Belfast university, who is the chairman of the independent scientific committee on smoking and health, which was set up to advise the Government on a variety of issues relating to smoking and tobacco. He expressed his concern about the sales-weighted average tar yield agreement, which is now faced with some problems. He said that he wanted us to put it on record that he felt that SWAT, which cannot be enforced, is useful, and we should do what we can to keep it. Therefore, we continue to take a pragmatic view on this.

[Mrs. Currie]

I have given some thought to the approach that we ought to adopt to the amendment, especially as it has been tabled by hon. Friends. However, it is much too sweeping in its general criticism of the Commission. As I said, had they done us the courtesy of asking us for our views before they tabled the amendment, they would have found that we had some sympathy with their points. I have had no letters or parliamentary questions from any of my seven hon. Friends who tabled the amendment, on tobacco products or on policy. They have not asked to meet me, although we are always happy to meet colleagues. Had they done so, they might have rewritten their speeches and the amendment in such a way that I would feel passionate about accepting it. In the circumstances, although we do not dissent from the concerns expressed, we cannot accept the amendment.

Mr. Aitken: I am disappointed by the response of my hon. Friend the Minister. I did not expect to get a ticking off. I am mindful of the fact that this is a House of Commons occasion, because views firmly in favour of the amendment have been expressed from both sides of the House. My hon. Friend has not produced a convincing answer, so I shall press my amendment to a Division.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Main Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 4192/88 on the labelling of tobacco products and the Supplementary Explanatory Memorandum submitted by the Department of Health on 7th November 1988 and 4193/88 on tar yields of cigarettes; welcomes continued progress towards removing the remaining barriers to trade between Member States; and, in the interests of public health, endorses the aims of reducing the tar yield of cigarettes and of ensuring that Community consumers are adequately warned of the dangers of smoking.

Titanium Dioxide

11.7 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mrs. Virginia Bottomley): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 6387/83 and 7733/84 and the Supplementary Explanatory Memoranda submitted by the Department of the Environment on 14th June and 22nd July 1988 on waste from the titanium dioxide industry; and supports the Government's intention to seek to ensure that the provisions of any new directive should take full account both of the need to protect the environment and of the need to ensure that the interests of the United Kingdom's titanium dioxide producers are safeguarded.

I welcome the opportunity to discuss tonight an important proposal for European Community legislation. The proposal is significant both in terms of securing a considerable degree of environmental improvement, albeit localised, in several areas of the European Community, and in terms of its potential impact on an important industry.

The debate concerns the titanium dioxide industry and the industrial pollutants that it produces. It is about the way in which the Government are dealing with the issue in relation both to the directives in place and proposed by the European Commission, and within the context of our own policies for strengthening the environmental protection of our rivers and estuaries.

Titanium dioxide is the main source of pigments used in paints and in a number of other products, such as ceramics. We have just three titanium dioxide factories in the United Kingdom, one of which is modern and gives rise to no significant pollution. That is the Tioxide UK Ltd. plant on Teesside, which uses the chloride process. Of more concern, because they are older, are the Tioxide UK Ltd. plant on Humberside, and the SCM Chemicals Ltd. plant, also on Humberside. I welcome Humberside Members to the debate. They have been active in advancing their constituents' views on this important matter.

There are two main production processes. The older and more polluting process is the sulphate method, which produces large amounts of iron sulphate and sulphuric acid. This is the process which is used by Tioxide on Humberside and one of the two processes used by SCM. The newer, less polluting process—the chloride method—is also used by SCM and by Tioxide at its Teesside factory. It results in the production of waste metal chlorides which can either be discharged to water or dumped on land.

Concern about the polluting impact of the discharges from the industry derives not so much from the nature of the substances—they are not on our "red list" or the Community's list I or list II of dangerous substances, the black or grey lists—as from the sheer volume of waste produced. Indeed, it was originally the impact of the wastes discharged by the Italian industry—notably, the so-called red mud—which led to proprosals for a Community directive for this industry in the 1970s.

The background to the proposal from the Commisssion of the European Communities for a directive on procedures for harmonising the pollution reduction programmes caused by waste from the titanium dioxide industry lies in an earlier directive. The existing directive on waste from the titanium dioxide industry was adopted in 1978. This has as its stated aim the prevention and progressive reduction of pollution caused by waste from the industry. It lays down general rules for the disposal of the different kinds of waste.

Article 9 of that directive requires member states to draw up programmes for the progressive reduction and eventual elimination of pollution caused by waste from existing industrial establishments. The article also provides for the Commission to submit proposals to the Council for the harmonisation of member states' programmes. The proposal for such a harmonisation directive is what we are debating today.

Traditionally, our approach to controlling discharges to the aquatic environment has been through environmental quality objectives and standards, having regard to the ability of receiving waters to accept discharges without detriment to the specified uses for those waters. This approach has served us well. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment described in the House recently, we have achieved major clean-ups of our estuaries over the past 20 years through this approach, and it is now the Rhine—certainly not the Thames—which is the dirty river of Europe. Indeed, the quality of both our rivers and estuaries compares very favourably with the quality of those in the rest of the European Community. Over 90 per cent. of our rivers are of good or fair quality, which means that they are suitable for drinking water extraction, support at least good coarse fisheries and have some amenity value.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): The Minister is saying that the way to deal with the pollution is to put the waste out to sea rather than into estuaries. In the light of the recent evidence, do the Government accept that pollution that stems from the chemical industry and paint manufacture is poisoning and killing seals, other aquatic animals and fish? I speak of the evidence that has been produced in the past 24 hours.

Mrs. Bottomley: I knew that it was unwise to give way to the hon. Gentleman. He knows that the virus that is affecting seals is a natural one. He referred to waste from industry, and he knows that pollution can take place in the water, in the air and on the land. If the hon. Gentleman bears with me, he will come to understand that that is the precise justification for the integrated pollution inspectorate, which we established recently. The inspectorate will be able to examine pollution that is caused by any discharge. That is extremely important.

The Humber has benefited from clean-up programmes, especially of the Trent, and further improvements will come about through schemes to tackle some of the badly polluted Yorkshire rivers that feed into the Humber.

How does all this relate to the titanium dioxide industry? It is because through the use of environmental quality objectives that we have been implementing the article 9 reduction programme drawn up with the industry following the 1978 directive. We have laid down environmental quality standards—these set maximum concentration levels for acid and iron—and the companies have invested in new longer outfalls to achieve better dilution and dispersion of the discharges. For example, as a result of the new outfalls, the area of the Humber affected by pollution from acid will be reduced by 90 per cent. This is a considerable achievement.

The Government have long recognised the concern about wastes from the industry in environmental terms.

[Mrs. Bottomley]

That is why, when applications from the two Humberside factories were made to Anglian water authority in 1986 for new discharge consents, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State called them in for determination. It was the first occasion on which these powers under the Control of Pollution Act 1974 had been used. Subsequently, the applications were considered at public inquiries in October 1987. Although the applications for discharge consent were substantially approved, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made it clear in his decision letters earlier this year that he would be looking to review the consents after two years with the view to seeking reductions in the total amount of waste discharged. That will necessarily involve changes to the production processes and the use of less-polluting technology.

That decision has to be seen in the light of the North sea conference declaration last year and the actions agreed by member states substantially to reduce inputs of contaminants reaching the North sea via rivers and estuaries by 1995. Although the main wastes produced by the industry are not persistent or liable to bio-accumulate, they are significantly polluting, and wastes from the industry are specifically indentified in the declaration on the North sea as one of the areas for possible future action.

I should mention two other developments in the environmental context that are now relevant to consideration of the Commission's proposals. First, the Government—as part of a more precautionary approach to the environment—published proposals in the summer for a new unified approach to the control of the most dangerous substances to water, which were identified as the red list.

For industrial processes discharging those substances, we will apply technology-based emissions standards for the first time, incorporating the concept of best available technology not entailing excessive costs, in combination with our more traditional style of strict environmental quality standards. The aim is to minimise the amounts of those substances reaching the aquatic environment and that will require, among other things, investment by industry in better effluent control technology. Industry has generally welcomed those proposals, although we are still considering the detailed responses to our consultation.

Secondly at the same time, we published consultative proposals for a new system of integrated pollution control for major industrial processes— to which I was referring when the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) intervened a moment ago—designed to minimise the overall impact of discharges to land, air and water. That follows the recommendations of the Royal Commission on environmental pollution for wastes to be disposed of according to the concept of best practicable environmental option and the setting up last year of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution as a cross-media pollution control agency responsible for the development of a more integrated approach to pollution control. That seeks to minimise so far as is practicable the amount and harmful affects of waste arising from such processes. The titanium dioxide industry, which discharges waste to water, to air and to land is an obvious candidate for just that sort of approach.

We have to consider the Commission's proposals against that background. The proposal for a new directive to harmonise member states' pollution reduction programmes was first put forward by the Commission in 1983. The proposal at that time gave us some difficulty. We considered that the appropriate way to control discharges of waste from the industry was according to the system of environmental quality objectives. Such an approach is consistent with the method of control laid down for list II substances in the dangerous substances directive. This specifies that the emission standards for such substances should be based on quality objectives.

In contrast, the Commission's proposal was based upon the use of Communitywide limit values. Those are essentially uniform emission standards set for all plants irrespective of location and the nature of the receiving waters for their discharge. We have always preferred to control discharges with reference to environmental quality objectives and standards which allow for the ability of receiving waters to assimilate discharges without harm to the aquatic environment. As our factories are located on large fast-flowing estuaries which offer good dilution, we have always believed that they should be allowed to benefit from those locational advantages.

The House of Lords Select Committee on the European Communities shared our concern about the Commission's proposal. The Committee, in its February 1984 report, expressed itself

"greatly concerned that the draft Directive, contrary to the provisions of the parent Directive and other Directives concerned with water pollution, imposes a system of fixed emission standards without any option of a parallel approach of environmental quality objectives".

That advice which strongly reaffirmed existing policy for water pollution control, provided the basis for our further negotiations on the proposed directive. Because of the nature of the substances discharged by the industry, we could see a persuasive case for arguing that only the environmental quality objective approach need be used. Consequently, we were not then prepared to support that proposal.

Our position has changed since 1983. First, I have already described the main developments in pollution control policy as a result of both domestic and international developments. In particular, we now accept the need for a more precautionary approach to the aquatic environment based on the complementary use environmental quality standards and technology-based emission standards for the most dangerous red list substances.

We are actively implementing those parts of the North sea conference declaration calling for substantial reductions in inputs of contaminants via rivers and estuaries. We are actively developing a more integrated approach to pollution control in this country, taking account of the effects of an industrial process on the environment as a whole.

Secondly, there is now wider public acceptance of the need for higher environmental standards, and industry, is responding to that. Consequently, it is right that we should now consider the next stage of the article 9 reduction programmes for the titanium dioxide industry with a view to achieving substantial reductions in the amounts discharged when the new consents are reviewed in 1990. Such reductions will call for specific measures by the companies concerned.

Thirdly, there is little doubt that recent discussion of the proposal has been influenced by the outcome of the important North sea conference hosted by my right hon.

Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. Equally, the proposal has been strongly supported by a number of other member states, especially Germany and the Netherlands, which are encouraging their industries to invest heavily in cleaner technology. To a large extent, that involves replacing old sulphate capacity with new chloride capacity. I should point out that United Kingdom industry has been doing that over the past decade and currently has most of the installed chloride capacity in the Community.

After a period of some years in which this proposal was given little precedence in discussions of the European Council, negotiations began again in earnest in late 1987. Initially, our participation in the detailed negotiations was constrained by the public inquiries into the proposed discharge consents on Humberside, which were then taking place under the Control of Pollution Act 1974. Until their outcome was known and the Secretary of State had made his decisions public, we had to avoid saying anything which might be prejudicial to those cases.

As a result of a short intensive period of negotiations at the June 1988 Environment Council, the German presidency put forward a package of principles for agreement designed to reflect so far as possible the concerns of all member states, and intended as the basis for future agreement.

The compromise package was made up of the following elements. First was the prohibition of the discharge of strong acid wastes and solid wastes from both processes and treatment wastes from the sulphate process to all waters from 31 December 1989, although where individual member states face particular difficulties the date might be put back to 1 July 1993.

Secondly, the discharge of other wastes to all waters would be regulated either by reference to limit values or by reference to enviromental quality objectives. Thirdly, there would be rules, to be agreed, on discharges to the atmosphere. That package proved to be a helpful way forward. The Commission's proposal was first presented in 1983. The continued failure to adopt a directive had left our titanium dioxide industry uncertain as to future pollution control measures. The industry found it difficult to plan future investment. Adoption of the proposed directive would provide the industry with the certainty and stability it needs to conduct and expand its business.

The measures proposed were stringent but feasible, even though the proposed time limits allowed barely sufficient time for all the necessary work to be completed. The compromise also protected our policy on environmental quality objectives and was consistent with the precautionary approach. There was a clear advantage in exploring it further and at the Environment Council my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan) agreed, together with the other Ministers, that the compromise should provide the basis for further consideration of the proposal.

In further detailed discussions since then, over the last few months, good progress has been made in a number of areas. Numerical values have been set for the limit values applicable to the weaker wastes. Rather than lay down numerical environmental quality objectives, the working party has chosen to place upon member states using that approach the burden of satisfying the Commission that its approach is being used correctly. Agreement has been reached on the numerical values for the controls on discharges to the atmosphere and for the dates of their applications.

We remain concerned that the Commission has changed the legal base of this proposal from articles 100 and 235 of the treaty to the new article 100A. Although we can understand that the Commission wishes to concentrate on the single market aspects of this proposal and the importance of avoiding distortions of competition, we are unhappy that the Commission should choose to disregard the new environmental article 130S. We believe that it would be an unfortunate precedent for article 100A to be used for what seems to us fundamentally misguided reasons, particularly when so much progress has been made to reach a sensible environmental consensus.

We hope that reason will prevail and that my noble Friend the Earl of Caithness will be able to negotiate a satisfactory resolution of this issue. The alternative would be further damaging uncertainty for the industry. We believe that adoption of the proposal will safeguard the interests of our industry by giving it a secure framework for planning its future operations and will lead to important environmental gains.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): The draft directive is welcome, to the extent that it makes improvements, but it does not go far enough. We have heard from the Minister the history of the negotiations—once again a history in which Britain, within the EEC, has been trying to hold up and limit the controls on the grounds that the Government are protecting British interests, environmental controls and industry.

The main aim of the directive is the prevention and progressive reduction of pollution caused by wastes from the titanium dioxide industry. Eventually, we hope, all pollution will be eliminated. Titanium dioxide is a white pigment used in paints and for other purposes. Its manufacture may result in a much larger quantity of waste than product, and this has frequently been dumped at sea or discharged into estuaries. Much of it is still disposed of in that way.

The directive would provide for the dumping of wastes at sea to be banned by 31 December 1989. Discharges of solid wastes, strong acid and treatment wastes from the sulphide process and discharges of solid waste and strong acid wastes from the chloride process into all waters would be banned by 1 December 1989. The Opposition welcome both proposals. In certain circumstances, that date could be put back to 1 July 1993. What are those circumstances? We would guess that the British Government got that written into the directive.

Discharges of weak acid waste and treatment waste from the chloride process to all waters would be substantially reduced by 31 December 1989 by limit values to be fixed, although in certain circumstances that date could also be put back. The emissions into the air would be limited, as the Minister said, and, as an alternative to using the limit values referred to in the two previous examples, discharges might be controlled by reference to environmental quality objectives, to be fixed by the Community. We welcome that. Labour Members do not believe in the gospel according to limit values. We want stricter controls than the Government's reliance on limit values provides. The legal base for the directive is to be decided later. The Government might, to coin a phrase, be treading water in the future if industry has not had the necessary expenditure made available to it to control its emissions.

We are concerned that the control of discharges of wastes from the industry in the United Kingdom is, in the view of the Department of the Environment, on the basis that stated environmental quality standards—EQSs, as the Government call them—are complied with in respect of discharges to water. The standards are set on the basis of scientific evidence and the controls on discharges are set so as to protect the receiving environment. We do not think that they are set in a way that protects the receiving environment, as evidence shows. They allow the United Kingdom to use and benefit from the absorptive capacity of our estuaries—the dispersal concept, to which the Government cling, even though dispersal in estuaries and in our seas has been proved to be misguided and to lead to a cumulative build-up of pollutants.

If adopted, the proposal would require, according to the Department of the Environment and the Minister, the banning of the more polluting types of waste from discharges and would require other discharges to be controlled according to Communitywide limit values, which we welcome. However, the Government claim—as, I am sure, will hon. Members who represent constituencies in which the titanium dioxide industry is based—that it will lead to additional costs for the industry. It is claimed that the provisions could add about 10 per cent. to production costs. That would clearly have implications for the profitability of the United Kingdom's titanium dioxide industry, although in general those costs could be absorbed.

I, too, am concerned about jobs in the industry, but if the directive applies to our competitors as well as to the United Kingdom, the expenditure that will be incurred to implement the controls will have to be borne by them as well as by the British industry. It is said that the directive represents a serious threat to employment in the industry, but if we consider what other countries have done to control the discharge of titanium dioxide because of its environmental consequences, we see that the United Kingdom has no excuse for continuing to discharge such powerful pollutants into the rivers or the sea.

The acid waste that is discharged by the titanium dioxide industry has four components: dilute sulphuric acid, differing concentrations of many heavy metals, very high concentrations of iron and residual ore. Those are very powerful pollutants that are being discharged into our rivers and seas. The immediate effect of these pollutants on biological systems results from the acidification of the water. The acid causes direct death of the single-celled organisms called plankton. They are the plants that are important for generating oxygen in the water that is used by other organisms. Plankton also provide the basic foodstuff for other life forms in the water, but the plankton are destroyed.

There are also differing concentrations of many heavy metals that are discharged into the rivers and seas by means of titanium dioxide pollution. They are found in titanium, zinc, chromium, nickel, copper, lead, arsenic, cadmium and mercury. The effects of heavy metals, even in trace concentrations, are wll documented. They have remarkable powers of accumulating into higher organisms through food chains. It is the "Ilkley Moor baht 'at" syndrome:

"Then ducks will come and eat up worms
And then we'll come and eat up ducks."

The fish absorb the nickel, copper, lead, arsenic and mercury, and we eat the fish. Heavy metals have been shown to affect a wide variety of marine organisms, causing fin-rot erosion, disease in fish and shell diseases in crabs and lobsters. They can also affect humans. Minamata disease is poisoning by mercury.

The high concentration of ferrous sulphate in the waste has severe effects on aquatic organisms and may be considered to be the most important damaging factor in acid waste. Cockles and mussels in the Humber, into which a great deal of the titanium dioxide is discharged, have been affected, and human beings cannot eat them. However, birds and fish eat them. The birds are then eaten by other forms of wildlife, and we eat that wildlife. It can be very dangerous.

It has been shown in laboratory experiments that flounders subjected to dilutions of titanium dioxide acid waste collect a brown precipitate, consisting of iron titanium, on their gills. The precipitate in turn affects the fish, altering their conditions to such an extent that they are unable to swim properly. In this way metals can be readily concentrated into living organisms. Flounders caught in the areas where titanium dioxide waste is dumped contain 12 times more lead, eight times more copper, three times more cadmium and twice as much zinc as fish caught in unpolluted waters. The pollution consequences are enormous.

Tests have been carried out recently on dead seals in Liverpool bay, pointing to the illegal dumping of paints or resins, titanium dioxide and other substances. High levels of mercury contamination have been found in the dead seals. The analysis of blubber and liver samples from four grey seals and a pilot whale showed high readings of a form of polychlorinated byphenyls—PCBs—used only in the production of paints and resins. Levels similar to those found in the Dutch Waddenzee could be expected to interfere with reproductive processes.

Those are the findings of tests done this week, yet the Government—the Minister repeated it today—still say that this pollution does not kill the seals. They say that the seals have a natural virus and that pollution has nothing to do with it. That is absolute nonsense. The Government are hiding their head in the sand. If pollution does not cause the virus, it lowers the resistance of seals and other sea animals to the virus. It creates the problem. If the Government had really adopted a precautionary approach, they would be ending the pollution of our seas and estuaries to save the seals. In reality, their policy assists with the seals' deaths.

The Green party would solve the problem by closing the factories. The Conservative party wants, reluctantly, to interfere with the free market, but it allows the pollution to continue when it should not. The Labour party believes that we can have jobs and an industry which is run in an environmentally sound way. We believe that it is not necessary to pollute and destroy our environment to keep industry going.

In 1978, the Council adopted a directive which required member states to take certain actions in respect of wastes produced by the titanium dioxide industry and to establish national reduction programmes for the prevention and eventual elimination of pollution caused by such waste. The Commission published proposals. Now, 10 years after the first directive, white pigment makers are still split about how to deal with acid and metal waste.

Germany is building acid recycling plants, and the Netherlands is switching to another manufacturing process. The United Kingdom's answer? Lengthening outfalls from the Humber and elsewhere to dump the pollutants into the sea rather than into the estuaries. A recycling plant is now under construction at Duisburg in West Germany. When it comes on stream at the end of this year it will reclaim 99 per cent. of the factory's waste sulphuric acid. Sachtleben's plant will also handle the waste from another German manufacturer—Kronos Titan. The chemical giant Bayer already has an acid recovery facility of a different design, the output of which is used on other processes. The spur of the plants is environmental legislation. Five years ago, West German firms were given a deadline of 1990 to stop dumping in the North sea. Belgium and the Netherlands have enacted similar laws. Once again, the United Kingdom is lagging way behind.

The titanium dioxide industry in the United Kingdom seems intent on exaggerating costs and availability of alternative technology to delay acceptance and implementation of the directive. Such corporate exaggeration, supported to some extent by the Government, is typical of companies, the operations of which take no account of social and environmental costs. They have successfully manufactured a scenario in which there appears to be only one option open to industry on implementation of the directive—cessation of operations. We do not believe that that is the only option.

A wide array of methods for waste treatment is available to the titanium industry. Some merely neutralise the acidic component of the waste; others produce useful by-products. Several techniques that completely recycle the waste are available. They include neutralisation. I shall not go into detail, because we do not have the time, but some companies have neutralised waste to gain profitable by-products which offset the cost of the processes. It is quite possible for the British industry, with the Government's assistance, to deal with the directive in such a way as to benefit the industry. There are jobs in the production of environmentally sound technologies and in recycling much of the waste which is at the moment put into estuaries and seas.

I welcome the directive to the extent that it moves us forward. I welcome some of what the Minister said. We are suspicious that, under pressure from the industry, the Government will not assist by making available the resources that are needed for recycling to prevent dumping and for the removal of longer outfalls—for which they have just given planning permission—which dump the titanium oxide in our seas.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): My hon. Friend the Minister will be pleased to know that I do not seek to divide the House on the draft directive. I welcome the specific wording employed by my hon. Friend and her colleagues. I draw the attention of the House specifically to the words:

"That this House . . . supports the Government's intention to seek to ensure that the provisions of any new directive should take full account both of the need to protect the environment and the need to ensure that the interests of the United Kingdom's titanium dioxide producers are safeguarded."

I am particularly concerned with those interests.

In her opening remarks, my hon. Friend referred to Humberside Members of Parliament. I am privileged to represent one of the country's titanium dioxide factories which is operated by SCM Chemicals, a subsidiary of the Hanson Trust group of companies. That organisation employs 700 people, many of whom are my constituents, although some may be constituents of the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) or of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). Until 1982, that company which was then known as Laporte, employed about 1,600 people. The work force has been halved, yet the yearly output, which was about 85,000 tonnes at the end of the 1970s, is now about 115,000 tonnes. That shows how the industry has been able to cope with the problems of the world recession earlier in the decade, and it is still a massive provider of jobs in my constituency.

The hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) has been somewhat unfair. I do not often disagree with him on environmental issues, but on this occasion he is wrong. The industry is aware of pressures from Europe, from the European Commission and from the Government, that require it to recognise that there is a sea change—a political change and a change in public perception. Those in the industry do not want to be bad neighbours and create environmental pollution. However, we are not talking about chickenfeed. The hon. Member for Bootle felt that it would be easy for companies to comply with the directive, but it has been estimated that for SCM Chemicals, the capital expenditure involved would amount to £24 million—depending on the final details of the directive—and that £1·25 million would be spent on additional gas cleaning equipment to reduce air emissions. That is not chickenfeed; that is a major financial outlay that has to be argued for when the company seeks approval for capital expenditure from its senior board.

I was glad to hear my hon. Friend express the Government's concern at the use of article 100A, which allows the proposal to be adopted by majority voting, when previously, under articles 100 and 235, unanimity would be needed. I was also very glad to hear my hon. Friend's assurance that the Government would be pressing hard for that.

The draft directive and tonight's debate are timely because I understand that the draft directive is to be considered by the Council of Ministers on 24 November. I am glad that my hon. Friend put on record a number of proposals which my hon. Friend the Minister of State will be presenting on behalf of the Government at that Council meeting.

I want to put one or two points to the Minister, to which I hope she will respond if she is able to catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker. My comments challenge what was said by the hon. Member for Bootle. He said that there would be no unfair competition for this country. He implied that there would be a level playing field and that the directive would apply equally across the Community. I do not think that that is the case. I can give two examples.

One unsatisfactory feature of the directive with regard to the chloride process is that a German chloride process of 80,000-tonne annual capacity, discharging its waste into the Rhine, will be allowed to discharge up to 150 tonnes of calcium chloride or sodium chloride into fresh water each day. A proposed 40,000-tonne plant on the Ghent-Terneuzen canal in Belgium will be allowed to discharge 78 tonnes a day into fresh water. That is not fair.

Another unsavoury aspect of the directive is the introduction of the concept of equality of competition. It should not be the responsibility of a directive such as this to introduce equality of competition. I understand that, in the interest of equality of competition, the same limits are imposed on the two United Kingdom plants, both of which discharge a sodium-calcium chloride brine into the marine environment. Such legislation, masquerading as environmental protection, does nothing to encourage the sensible siting of plants so as to have minimum environmental effects. In the German and Belgian cases the plants could have been sited on the coast had they addressed environmental requirements rather than proximity to markets.

Mr. Allan Roberts: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that one of the difficulties faced by British industry is that the Government have not put pressure on the industry in the same way as other Governments, so we are behind in introducing alternative methods of dealing with the waste? In Japan, one of our competitors, the marine disposal of titanium dioxide was forbidden in 1978, and 60 per cent. of the waste is treated with ammonia. The resultant ammonia sulphate is used as a fertiliser. An annual production of 100,000 tonnes is sold. It is the same in Germany and Holland. They have the plants and are producing side-products that can be sold to make a profit for the industry. We could do the same.

Mr. Brown: I do not agree. Many years ago, successive Governments co-operated to ensure that the titanium dioxide industry in Britain was sensibly located. It is an unpleasant process. However, it is a fact of life. We all use white paint and white paper. Everything that is white has titanium dioxide in it. Over the years Britain has been ahead of its rivals. Our rivals have sited their plants near their markets but we have ensured that the plants have been sited sensibly on the coast. That is not to say that we should simply discharge waste into the estuaries.

I do not agree with the hon. Member for Bootle that the Government have done nothing. I spend a lot of time with the senior management of SCM Chemicals in my constituency. I am told of the pressures brought to bear on them by my hon. Friend the Minister and her predecessors. The industry would argue that the Government have been tough and strong in the way in which they have asked the industry to clean up its act. The industry recognises that there is a political dimension and that it has to address public opinion, as do the Government and Europe.

I have reservations about the directive, but I recognise that we are too far down the road to be able to start from scratch. My hon. Friend the Minister said that a public inquiry was under way in 1987, when we might have been negotiating hard on the detail of the directive. The Government were precluded from playing their part in the early stages of those negotiations. They have had to work hard and fast to secure the best interests of the titanium dioxide industry. If there is a lesson for the future, it is essential that, once it is obvious that a European draft directive will involve some control of the industry, the Government should use their expertise in Europe to protect the interests of the environment and of those who work in the industry. We have lost out a little, for the reasons that I have outlined and that I fully understand.

It appears that the final directive will be approved on 24 November. I hope that when my hon. Friend replies to the debate she will be able to assuage my worry about the lack of a level playing field and confirm that the Government will be pressing hard at the meeting of the Council of Ministers next week.

11.50 pm

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): I welcome the draft directive. It is a useful step in harmonising European pollution levels.

I represent part of the Humberside area and my constituency abuts the River Humber. There is no point in denying that for a long time there have been considerable problems with industrial waste from many outlets on the estuary. They have had demonstrable effects on the decline of Humber fisheries. At one time, there was a thriving inshore fishery, but it has declined dramatically in recent years.

There is a new fishery on the Humber that abuts my constituency and that of the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown). I should not claim that such a fishery employs as many people as a titanium dioxide factory, but nevertheless it is important to employment in the area. The fishery relies almost exclusively on exports, and the directive will do much to assist it by making it clear that the Government are adamant about them taking steps to clean the estuary.

I do not wish to hold the titanium oxide industry responsible for all the pollution of the River Humber—it is no better or worse than other industries. It is better, however, than the Government's record regarding the amount of raw sewage that is dumped into the estuary.

I know well the arguments that have been advanced about the importance of the titanium oxide industry receiving the same treatment as its European rivals so that it can be competitive and can protect jobs in the area. That is a fair and valid argument, but it underlines one of the strengths of the directive. It would not be fair if one of our industries was at a disadvantage by having to implement stronger pollution controls than its rivals on the continent.

It could be argued that, if there is equal treatment in the Community, the industry may be at a disadvantage with its competitors outside the Community, which may not apply the same rigorous standards. When the Council of Ministers meets, it should discuss a form of environmental tax on products entering the Community from competitors that do not apply the same rigorous standards of pollution control and are therefore an unfair form of competition. That would answer the arguments advanced by some industries in the EEC—that these measures cost jobs and put them at a disadvantage.

Mr. Michael Brown: The problem with the hon. Gentleman's argument is that about 60 per cent. of this country's production of titanium dioxide is exported. The industry has to compete in the world market; it faces competition from Australia, non-EEC and Third-world countries.

Mr. Morley: That is a valid point. The answer is to campaign throughout the developed nations to get them to apply similar controls, and to use the EEC's considerable influence in world markets to suggest to countries involved in unfair competition that the EEC will not regard them favourably in future dealings. As an advanced industrialised country, we must set an example to other countries which may not share our scruples.

I am concerned, too, about the Government's response to the directive. The explanatory memorandum reads:

"It is better to dispose of most wastes to waters where they are rapidly diluted and dispersed."

I disagree strongly. We do not know the long-term consequences of marine pollution in the North sea. About 20 million cu m of sewage are dumped every day—on top of 15 million cu m of chemical waste.

The Minister referred to the recent seal virus as a natural virus. That is only partly true. Scientific evidence points to a link between pollution and the suppression of the seals' immune system, which reduces their resistance to infection. I am sure that the Minister does not underestimate the public concern about the pollution of the sea that was highlighted by the seal problem. It was well expressed in a petition organised by the children of Rochdale road school in Scunthorpe, who have called for action to help the seals.

The directive goes a long way towards dealing with marine pollution. It would not be fair to single out any one industry. I do not want to make the titanium dioxide industry the scapegoat for all the problems of the North sea. The algae bloom last May, which was triggered off by a high concentration of nitrates and phosphates, and which reduced 100,000 sq km of the seabed to a biologically dead wilderness, showed the scale of the problem.

I deeply regret the Government's weak-kneed qualifications of the directive. I do not want any industry in this country to be disadvantaged: these controls must be applied fairly and vigorously across the EEC to ensure that the seas are safe for future generations.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: With the leave of the House, I wish to answer the debate.

In response to the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts), I make it clear that the reason for the possibility of extending the time limit to 1993 from December 1989 is that, if there are cases of major techno-economic difficulty, this is a way of protecting the industries concerned. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) and the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), who have spoken forcefully for their constituents and local industries, will appreciate that.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes that the standards applicable to plants discharging into inland waters should be stricter than those applicable to plants discharging into salt water. We have pressed hard for that in the Council, but have so far received no support from other member states. But I am sure that my noble Friend the Earl of Caithness will make the point again at next week's Environment Council.

I hope that we are all agreed on the need to end the uncertainty and inaction which the protracted negotiations on this proposal have caused. We have the clear prospect of agreement on a measure that would produce significant benefits for the water environment and that would provide industry with a clear and practical basis on which to plan its future investment.

I have listened carefully to hon. Members' comments, and I shall bring them to the attention of my noble Friend before he attends the Council meeting on 25 November.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos 6387/83 and 7733/84 and the Supplementary Explanatory Memoranda submitted by the Department of the Environment on 14th June and 22nd July 1988 on waste from the titanium dioxide industry; and supports the Government's intention to seek to ensure that the provisions of any new directive should take full account both of the need to protect the environment and of the need to ensure that the interests of the United Kingdom's titanium dioxide producers are safeguarded.

Articulated Vehicles

12.1 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Peter Bottomley): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 6882/88 on the dimensions of articulated vehicles; and endorses the Government's objective of resisting this proposed directive on the grounds that longer articulated vehicles would present significant environmental disadvantages to the United Kingdom.

The Commission proposes to amend directive 85/3 EEC by increasing the maximum length of articulated vehicles from 15·5 m to 16·5 m. The Government oppose that for significant reasons: it is environmentally more intrusive; it will increase the risk of road accidents; and it will disadvantage British hauliers. The Commission was correct to identify the problem, but its proposed solution is wrong.

I often wish that when we talk about social space, others in the Community would spend more time listening to those who have been run over by articulated lorries, which cut in, destroy cyclists, damage pedestrians and do other things with which we in Britain cope rather better. If the rest of the Community had our road safety record, 40 per cent. fewer people would be injured, whether by long articulated lorries or in other ways. We have much to teach the Community. It might spend some time examining the minibus driving directive, too, because we have more welfare journeys in small minibuses than they have in other European countries.

The directive is not accompanied by a limit on the minimum dimensions of the cab or coupling mechanism, or the maximum dimensions of the semi-trailer. Consequently, some continental operators—mainly French, Belgian and Dutch—have sought to maximise the length of the semi-trailer within the international limit of 15·5 m. They increase loading space at the expense of the coupling mechanism and the driver's cab. They have exploited a loophole in the directive, with the result that the safety and ergonomic conditions of the driver have been reduced.

To maintain articulation of the vehicle, novel and potentially unsafe coupling mechanisms have been introduced. The semi-trailers that have been built are about 13·6 m long—more than 1 m longer than those used in the United Kingdom for domestic transportation. The directive allows for that type of configuration for international transport. The United Kingdom, as well as adopting an overall length of 15·5 m, also restricts the size of the loading space of the semi-trailer to 12·2 m. That allows adequate cab and coupling dimensions within the 15·5 m and the transportation of the popular ISO standard 40 ft container.

The technical developments by continental operators to maximise the semi-trailer length improve the economic use of commercial road vehicles. They allow the transportation of more pallets or, in the extreme, the longer 45 ft container. According to the Commission's proposal, those developments have negative effects on the health, safety and comfort of the driver and the quality of transport. The United Kingdom agrees with those observations.

Let us turn now to the Commission's misplaced solution. It should have plugged the loophole by setting a semi-trailer length dimension on the lines of United Kingdom legislation. Instead, within the 15·5 m envelope, the Commission has chosen to allow the longer semi-trailer to continue in operation. It has attempted to provide for adequate cab and coupling dimensions by increasing the overall length of the combination by 1 m to 16·5 m. The ISO standard No. 1726 for the dimensions forward of the semi-trailer kingpin is given prominence in the proposed directive to ensure that the overall turning circle of the combination is not increased over and above that of the 15·5 m articulated units that predominate at present.

This proposal allowing the extra metre would present extra difficulties in overtaking or being overtaken by these vehicles, not just on motorways, but on every sort of road. On crowded roads it would cause more congestion, and there would be an added safety risk to vulnerable users of the road, such as pedestrians and cyclists, due to the added tendency for the longer semi-trailer to cut in on the pavement when the vehicle turns a corner. I do not want to load all the blame for injuries to pedestrians and cyclists on articulated vehicles, but I remind the House that, in Britain, 60,000 pedestrians and 30,000 cyclists were injured last year. Those are underestimates, because the information is that roughly three times as many cyclists are injured as are reported in our accident figures.

The United Kingdom is opposed to any increase in the length of articulated vehicles because of the effect on traffic movement and the additional risk that it poses for road safety. Another reason for United Kingdom opposition to the proposal is that, as currently drafted, it would have the effect of prejudicing the use in international transport of vehicles built to current British standards. The proposed directive would require all new articulated vehicles entering into circulation after 1 July next year to comply with the technical provisions of the directive. This does not mean that the vehicle would have to be used at 16·5 m, but it means that the tractor and semi-trailer would have to be built to the ISO standard before they could be allowed to run at over 15·5 m on international transport.

The United Kingdom-type tractors and semi-trailers are incompatible with the proposed construction requirements for tractors and semi-trailers. The nose of the United Kingdom trailer is shorter, and less space is allowed for it behind the tractor cab. An ISO trailer has a longer nose and will not fit on a United Kingdom tractor. The semi-trailers built to meet the proposed directive would not be able to be towed by British-type two-axle tractor units because the semi-trailer would foul the back of the cab. This would place United Kingdom operators at a disadvantage against their European counterparts. To meet the turning circle requirements of the directive, a three-axle unit could not be used in conjunction with a two-axle semi-trailer at an overall length of 16·5 m. This is recognised in the proposed directive, which allows only the two-axle tractor unit with the three-axle semi-trailers, or the more expensive three-axle tractors with three-axle semi-trailers to run at 16·5 m.

The Commission's proposal, in favouring the two-axle tractor unit, ignores the fact that heavy loads are better carried by a three-axle tractor than a two-axle tractor. It makes no sense to introduce a regulation that has a bias against the less damaging three-axle tractor unit.

We benefit from the services of the lorry. It plays a vital role in our economy. The haulage industry should be able to function within necessary controls. Much has been done to reduce the unpleasant effects of lorries and to improve safety. The heavy lorries' record on accident reduction over the past decade is far better than that for cars. There needs to be the right balance between the needs of freight movement and those of other road users. The proposal does not strike that balance. There is a technical solution to the squat cab problem, and the United Kingdom has already adopted it. Those member states that have exploited the loophole in the directive should not be allowed to use this to gain yet longer lorries. The United Kingdom's line is strongly against this type of vehicle combination being increased in length any further. The House should endorse the motion.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): Once again, the Minister and I are playing to a packed gallery on this fascinating subject, which has important consequences. The Minister has read his speech well, and I have some sympathy with his argument. There is no doubt that we would face problems if the EC directive were to be adopted.

I shall ask the Minister a straightforward question, and it will not surprise him to learn that I already know the answer to it. Will he confirm that this directive is subject to the qualified majority voting system? I see the Minister nodding to confirm that. Could he also confirm that the Government accepted that that is an acceptable way for things to be done? We now depend on other countries to support the case put forward by the United Kingdom. I hope that the Minister will tell us which EC countries are prepared to reject the directive. It is important that we know from where our support will come. We need a combination of other nations to build the 23 votes that are required to overturn that qualified majority. That can come only from one of the larger Community nations with one of the medium sized ones, or by a combination of small ones.

It is pointless pretending that the House of Commons has a scrutiny role when it is in fact powerless in this respect. The presence tonight of the Government Chief Whip, the right hon. and learned Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Waddington), is interesting, but I doubt whether he has hundreds of troops rallied outside for fear that the Opposition will seek to press the House to a Division on the issue—[Interruption.] The right hon. and learned Gentleman tells me that I might be surprised, but I am never surprised at anything that goes on in this place. I can assure him that I do not intend to press the matter to a Division, because I am not sure what would be the effect if we did not take note of the document. I do not believe that that would advance the case in Europe one jot.

We are now in the hands of people who have an incentive to force the directive on to the freight industry and on to those in this country who depend on that industry. It is a peculiar state of affairs that other nations should have an incentive to adopt a directive to our disadvantage, yet we have to persuade the Council of Ministers to support us, on the basis either of good nature or of horse trading.

One of the legitimate reasons for opposing the directive is that our roads and bridges are not capable of taking the impact that would result from its implementation. The directive would allow gross axle weights to be increased from the present maximum of 10·5 tonnes to 11·5 tonnes. Will the Minister confirm that there are about 11,000 sub-standard bridges in Great Britain and that it will cost about £750 million to strengthen them so that they can take the 40-tonne limit that the Government have chosen to adopt instead of the 38-tonne limit that we presently operate?

The Minister looks a little puzzled about that, but that was the evidence of his Department's officials to the Public Accounts Committee some time ago. Those officials said that it was the Department's policy to raise the standard of those bridges to the 40-tonne limit. I shall be happy to show the Minister his officials' evidence later, if he wishes.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The bridges are being strengthened, but the hon. Gentleman will realise that the British derogation is based on what we put forward as a 15-year programme. I do not think that we should echo his comments because they might be heard outside the House and people might then misinterpret the Labour party's position on the issue. I hope that we shall have a blocking minority on this draft directive and that we shall retain the Labour party's support against such ideas as the hon. Gentleman was putting forward—which, on reflection, he might regret tomorrow morning.

Mr. Lloyd: I should be a little surprised if the European Commission or the Council of Ministers took greater note of my comments than of those of senior officials of the Department of Transport.

One of the problems with the 15-year programme mentioned by the Minister is that, at present levels of spending, the Government will not achieve the upgrading of those bridges over that period. It is a matter of simple mathematics. The Minister might wish to tell the House that the bridge-strengthening programme is to be greatly increased. That would be in the interests of the travelling public of Britain, but I do not believe that the Minister can say that, because such expenditure was not mentioned in the Government's spending plans earlier this year. In any case, the Government are not able to ratify the directive.

If the directive is adopted and forced through by the majority in the Council of Ministers, against the will of the British Government, what will be the consequences for the exemption that will apply to all freight that was on the roads before 1989, given that the trailers to which the Minister referred measure 13·6 m? Under the cabotage arrangements, they would be free to ply their trade on the roads of this country. That would pose a serious threat to our roads and bridges; and it is important that the public should be aware of that fact.

Yet again, the unsatisfactory way in which we scrutinise European legislation is underlined. The directive is unacceptable and runs counter to the needs of the travelling public in Britain, yet we are in no position to do anything unless we are prepared to go cap in hand to other members of the Community.

I am used to the Minister telling me that I am not a good European every time I say that European legislation is not satisfactory, although I am not sure whether simply resisting European legislation is being a bad European. The Minister tells us that we should be maximising the advantages of the European Community process, so perhaps he will reflect on my question. Earlier, he told us that Europe had a lot to learn from us. If the Council of Ministers forces the directive through against Britain's interests, how shall we have maximised the advantages of the European process, given that we know that the provision will be severely to the disadvantage of the British freight industry, consumer and road user?

[Mr. Lloyd]

For those reasons, I support the motion. There is no ambiguity about that. Nevertheless, I must add that many of the problems that have arisen have been invoked by the Government.

Mr. Kenneth Warren (Hastings and Rye): I agree wholeheartedly with my hon. Friend the Minister in his opposition to the directive. I also understand why the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) finds it difficult to make his way through the tangle. I understand, too, that Mr. Stanley Clinton Davis, who speaks on behalf of the European Commission on these matters, may shortly be standing as a candidate with a view to joining the hon. Gentleman on the Labour Benches, where he has been before.

The question that really concerns me is how the proposal arose at all. The EEC is after one more metre to solve a problem; but where did the problem come from in the first place? My hon. Friend will know that I have communicated with him over a number of years about the length of vehicles because our own Department of Transport takes no account of that factor when considering traffic loads on roads—for example, in determining whether a by-pass should be built.

The United Kingdom solution should be promoted by the House and there should be all-party agreement on the matter. The explanatory memorandum put forward by the Commission reeks of problems—problems identified in part by my hon. Friend the Minister—concerning the general safety of the promotion of yet one more metre. It is rather like the last straw that breaks the camel's back.

What about the road requirements? No one in the Commission seems to have taken any account of the problems of the roads in Greece and southern Ireland.

One wonders how those in Brussels have got themselves into this tangle, which is recorded inadequately in the explanatory memorandum. Apparently the directive which has already been adopted

"implicates that a number of vehicles which were built according to that motion will be prohibited."

Legally, we are told, it will be difficult to make this correct in retrospect. It is simply not acceptable that we should endorse a mistake, especially as it would mean that some old semi-trailers on the road would be more competitive than new types. That is wholly unacceptable. The Commission has made a mistake, and it cannot expect us, or any other Government in the Community, to make right that which it has got wrong. This is an occasion when the House must unite. There are only a few of us in the Chamber, but I am sure that we speak for all those who would wish to be present.

The documentation includes phrases such as "proposal for a Council directive . . . Having regard to the proposal from the Commission . . . Having regard to the Opinion of the European Parliament . . . Having regard to the Opinion of the Economic and Social Committee", but we are not told who is in favour of the proposal. We have bureaucratic propaganda trying to cover up a substantial mistake of the past. Of course we all make mistakes, and I am the first to acknowledge that I am among those who have made many mistakes. I only hope that I have not made too many in the House.

We have before us a proposal that includes a reduction in the space for the driver and a consequent deterioration in the comfort and safety of the driver's working area. Surely all hon. Members would agree that it is vital that the driver should give correct conduct to his vehicle. He must ensure the safety of his vehicle and therefore of all other vehicles on the road.

The proposal illustrates one of the many problems of the Commission, which is that it often separates its legalistic intentions and ambitions from what life is like, for example, on British roads and those of the other countries of the Community. What is the main reason for introducing the measure? The answer is to make right a wrong decision of the past. Safety standards must come first and last, and we should endorse that which the Government propose.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): I find myself in the strange position of endorsing a Government proposition. It is not one in which I often find myself. They are right, however, to resist the proposal. I shall spend a few minutes explaining how the proposal came about.

There was a legislative loophole and the Commission, with its usual flexibility towards some member states, decided to extend all the limits by 1 m. That is extremely unfair, and, as a general harmonisation proposal, it should be resisted. As my hon. Friend the Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) said, majority voting applies and we may find ourselves in a minority that is unable effectively to resist the proposal. The Government are being consistent with the Armitage proposals, which were debated by the House in 1973. Assurances were given by the then Minister that the increase of overall vehicle weight to 38 tonnes, with the accompanying dimensions, would be the limit to which the Government and successive Governments would go. It is unusual to find the Government being consistent and adhering to the assurances that were given when the Armitage proposals were debated.

Unfortunately, we are no longer our own masters. The Commission will be pressing for further harmonisation. As the Minister must know, there is a draft directive in the hands of the Commission that proposes an increase in dimensions and overall gross vehicle weight to 44 tonnes, with derogations for the United Kingdom and Ireland, but with limited time for them to operate. The United Kingdom and Ireland will be required to bring the derogrations to an end in a phasing-in period.

The draft directive, which we support the Government in resisting, is part of a process to harmonise road transport throughout the 12 EEC states. Our roads are already over-burdened. The cost of strengthening bridges and widening roads will be at least £1·5 billion. That will be spread over a number of years, because of the work involved.

In spite of that work, more expenditure would be required on a number of bypasses because many of our towns and villages cannot cope easily with the present size of juggernauts, let alone juggernauts that are 1 m longer. Far from making the driver's job easier, an extra metre will make the already difficult job of driving those vehicles even more difficult and a greater strain. Therefore, the Commission's proposal will not ease the task for drivers in the United Kingdom: they will make the strain so much greater. That is another reason why we should resist the proposal.

Since the Armitage report was debated in Session 1982-83, the number of new registrations of lorries in the heaviest category—between 33 and 38 tonnes—increased 3,000 in 1983 and 8,400 in 1987. Over that period, there were 30,000 new registrations in the heaviest categories, and almost 800,000 new commercial vehicle registrations between 1983 and 1987. That means that there are nearly 1 million vehicles on our roads in the various categories ranging from 3·5 tonnes to 38 tonnes—the maximum vehicle capacity. Those figures are based on a reply that the Minister gave me on 13 May 1988.

Our roads are becoming choked with commercial and car traffic. To allow large vehicles would not necessarily produce fewer vehicles. The Armitage report stated that, with bigger vehicles, fewer vehicles would carry loads around. More miles would be covered by fewer vehicles. That simply has not happened, as the figures show.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): Do those figures represent net gains, or do they take account of the amount of scrapping that has occurred over the past few years?

Mr. Cryer: They do not take account of the amount of scrapping since 1983, although there would obviously have been some scrapping. My figures represent the number of new registrations since 1983 and they do not take account of a reduction because of scrapping. On our roads we see a fair range of age of commercial vehicles, which, by and large, seem to have a longer life than motor cars. Therefore, the commercial vehicle population seems to be more stable. No doubt the Minister will provide some background statistics if he has them to hand when he replies.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I do not have the figures to hand, because I thought that hon. Members on both sides of the House were opposing the draft directive. Also, I would have thought that the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer), with his usual skill, would have another of my parliamentary replies, which showed that the number of miles travelled had been reduced with the increase to 38 tonnes. We are not particularly concerned about the weight tonight. We are rightly concerned about dimensions. We should try to give a clear message to the Commission and to other member states that it is environmentally wrong, and in safety terms worse, to allow the proposed increases.

Mr. Cryer: I could not disagree with the Minister. However, I stress that the pressure for an extra metre on this type of vehicle is part of a general pattern. There is a move by the Commission to increase the overall weights of vehicles, so we must watch the proposals very carefully.

If we want to keep our roads reasonably free and accessible to other road vehicles and pedestrians, and give people who live along side roads in towns and villages some kind of a half-reasonable life, free from the pollution of road vehicle traffic, we must have some limit on the number and size of vehicles. Therefore, I endorse the Minister's view that we should not allow the vehicle size to be increased.

I have a brief from the Freight Transport Association. Why it should send one to me I have no idea, but it concludes by saying that the FTA

"believes strongly that on questions of vehicle weights and dimensions it is essential for a harmonised regime to apply throughout the EC and would not want to see any exceptions made for the UK on articulated vehicle length."

I hope that there is not a powerful lobby within the Department of Transport wanting to accept a development in legislation that has occurred because of a breach and a warping of legislation.

I hope also that the Minister will resist the pressure that exists. When he says that both sides of the House are prepared to resist, he is right. However, I warn him that there are invidious influences pressing ahead.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: How does my hon. Friend interpret the evidence of Sir Alan Bailey, the Department of Transport's permanent secretary? He told the Public Accounts Committee that it was in the ministerial view most cost-effective to allow for the possibility of upgrading to 40 tonnes in setting the standards for reinforcement. Does my hon. Friend smell a rat on the Government's side?

Mr. Cryer: Yes, and my hon. Friend vividly and graphically illustrates a point of concern.

Many people regard the Minister's Department as the "Department of Road Transport", with railways playing a secondary role. It is true that many people have bought cars, that commercial vehicles provide a service, and that there have been changes over the past quarter of a century. Nevertheless, things are changing again. Nothing stays the same. Because of overcrowded roads, some road journeys are taking the time to complete that they did before motorways were introduced in the 1960s.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: That is rubbish.

Mr. Cryer: The Minister says that I am speaking absolute rubbish. That is not the case. In my own area of Bradford, some journeys take longer at peak times than they did a quarter of a century ago. I can tell the House from my own experience that that is the case. We know from our knowledge of the M25—as another example—that at certain times of the day journeys are taking longer than they did five or 10 years ago.

People are moving off the roads, which is very welcome, and on to the railways. In west Yorkshire, trains generally are crowded, so much so that British Rail is increasing fares to put people off travelling by rail. That is a generally accepted policy.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that we are not having a general debate on transport, but discussing a directive. Perhaps he will return to that subject.

Mr. Cryer: You are right, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I conclude by emphasising that we should resist the proposed extention in commercial vehicle lengths. We want to keep our environment as decent as burgeoning road traffic allows, but in pressing our case against the Commission's proposals we must not forget that we have an excellent railway system. If we are to safeguard our environment, we must seek ways of transferring traffic from the roads to rail. The Minister is nodding, and I hope that he will carry on nodding as I say that that also means keeping the 72 miles of railway from Settle to Carlisle.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): After that last comment, I shall keep my contribution very brief. I join the consensus by supporting my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren) in resisting the directive, because it constitutes a back-door method of extending lorry lengths.

I cannot understand the EC's thinking. It says that it is necessary to stop the trend towards short cabs, small trailer wheels and strange dimensions within those trailers, so that the negative effects on health, safety, comfort and quality of transport can be reduced—whatever that means.

I cannot speak for European truck manufacturers, many of whose trucks are built in this country under licence as part of partnership arrangements, but looking at the directive's main objective—to improve safety and comfort of lorry cabs—one notes a strange platitude at the end of the explanatory memorandum:

"The dimensions of the cabin are not fixed but incentives for the construction of short cabins are taken away since this would not result in an increase of loading space."

That will not make a difference. One of the most important aspects of lorry construction is vehicle weight. Designers and manufacturers will not put in a bigger cabin simply because there is a larger space, because that would add to the gross vehicle weight. Having acquired the expertise of building fairly small and ergonomically satisfactory cabs, manufacturers will not build bigger ones for the sake of piling sheet metal on to a vehicle. The directive's objective is misplaced. It asks designers to put the clock back and return to a bigger cab, which means more weight on the vehicle and a smaller payload.

The explanatory memorandum refers to "smaller wheels of trailers in order to gain loading space in height".

What is the problem with small wheels if they will stand up to the punishment of travelling along a motorway at fairly high speed? There seems to be no reason why a large truck with small wheels should not be filled with shredded wheat, which has an enormous volume. This recommendation is a pathetic example of trying unnecessarily to restrict operators' flexibility.

On internal dimensions, the explanatory memorandum refers to "thin wall equipment for refrigerated vehicles in order to gain loading space in width."

Why not, if the technology exists to use new materials and to put a bigger load on a semi-trailer? Of course, it must not go over the maximum permissible weight. However, what is to stop manufacturers from using space-age materials to provide better facilities? Why must we have legislation to prevent us from developing road transport systems? It is like putting the clock back.

I say, more power to my hon. Friend's elbow. There is nothing in the directive that improves safety or affects health or the comfort and quality of transport. Those aspects are in the designers' hands. Any trip to a commercial motor show, such as the one a few weeks ago, shows that the modern truck is a highly sophisticated piece of equipment, capable of providing comfort and quality of environment for the driver.

If we are to talk about extra lengths for lorries and semi-trailers and about higher gross vehicle weights, let us do so. Let us not ensure, by allowing the legislation to be passed unchallenged, that we get there by the back door, to the disadvantage of our road system.

12.37 am

Mr. Hugo Summerson (Walthamstow): In view of the lateness of the hour relative to the early sitting of the House tomorrow, I shall confine myself to supporting my hon. Friend the Minister in his opposition to this disgraceful directive.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Summerson) for his support. I wish that more colleagues on both sides of the House were as clear.

I am grateful to the hon. Members for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) and for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) for their comments. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) spoke with the greatest expertise. He said that the Community was not solving the problem that it set out to face. Perhaps we should copy the provision that the hon. Members for Bradford, South and for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) managed to put into the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974. In trying to improve safety, we should not do something that makes the position worse.

Clearly we want an ergonomically designed cab for drivers. One reason why road safety for drivers of heavy goods vehicles has improved is that they are more often treated like human beings. They are getting better cabs, but their provision is not always supported. Les Huckfield spoke against the provision of sleeper cabs, but for many drivers that is an advantage.

I emphasise that, in our view, what is being put forward in the draft directive is less safe and more environmentally damaging.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Minister is a member of the Transport and General Workers Union and he has always had the interests of the truck drivers at heart, but can he explain the difference between the way in which the European Community wants to tackle the size of cab and the way in which the British Government want to do it? In fact, it is identical. It is done by specifying a maximum trailer length and a maximum usable trailer length. The difference is the maximum possible cab length. If the Minister believes that that is unsatisfactory—that was the clear implication—I shall agree with him. If he introduces legislation that provides guaranteed minimum standards for cab drivers in terms of size of cabs, the Opposition will support it. Is that the way that the Government intend to go?

Mr. Bottomley: Yes. I suspect that other hon. Members will think that that was a planted question. I shall illustrate what I am about to say with my little lorry. We control the length of the semi-trailer. That allows, within the overall length, the cab size to be a proper length. I do not want to play with too many of my toys. I have a collection of them here, but I do not think that I ought to use too many of them. If, however, there are more axles on the prime mover, we reduce the damage to the road and make sure that there is greater safety. There is braking on both the drive axles, rather than on just one.

If the hon. Member for Stretford reads my opening speech, he will find that that is spelt out very clearly. We went further than the directive and made sure that there were no loopholes in the United Kingdom legislation. We wish that the European Community had done the same. It is an example of perhaps sloppy negotiations leading to the current directive, which allows people to go further than was intended when the directive was approved.

In fact, it is worse than that. I have here Transport News Digest of November 1988, which gives a rundown on the month's important road freight news. It is headed "Supersize container plan by shippers" and says:

"Plans are being laid by the shipping lines to introduce an additional supersize container on the international scene—49ft long, 2·6 metres wide and 2·9 metres high. Several American states have agreed to allow land movement of such big containers and the Dutch and West Germans are believed to be sympathetic in principle, although it would mean 17·5 metre long artics to do it . . . The shipping interests are attempting to put a stamp of respectability on their supersize container by calling for its consideration by the International Standards Organisation. But vehement opposition can be expected from many countries' transport ministers: You can carry supersizes by sea or rail if you can, but no way are they going on our roads, might sum up the frequent reaction."

That is certainly my reaction.

The hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) said that rail should be made as competitive as possible. Leaving aside his 72 miles of special pleading, my aim is to get as much freight on to the railways as is commercially viable. That is one reason why the Channel tunnel will provide great help. That is why we expect a greater proportion of freight to be carried by the railways.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To London; that is all.

Mr. Bottomley: Beyond London, too, and through the Channel tunnel to the rest of Europe.

The hon. Member for Bradford, South also referred to the Armitage report, page 149, which deals with standard axles and damage numbers. It is important that he should understand the difference between a three-axle tractor and a two-axle tractor. I said earlier that we want to create no bias in favour of a two-axle tractor. If anything, we want a bias in favour of a three-axle tractor, as the third axle reduces road damage dramatically.

Britain is, I think, the only Community country with a taxation regime for heavy goods vehicles which fully covers the track costs. When other countries talk about tolls, as West Germany is apparently doing, and as Belgium did one year ago, they might start wondering whether they should analyse damage numbers and standard axles. They would find that the British approach is the right one.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: It is calculated that the Department of Transport's ineffectiveness at controlling overloading represents at least £50 million in damaged road costs each year which is not recovered in track costs. Although I accept in general what the Minister has said about road maintenance, with bridges, which are the crucial part of the British road system, three-axle tractors do not necessarily alter the situation. It is quite possible to have all three axles on the bridge at the same time, and we must remember that it is the dynamic weight that matters with bridges.

Mr. Bottomley: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I am sure that, if he had not reminded me, I might have forgotten the answers I gave which probably provided the information that he has just fed back to me.

I do not intend to go into the question of majority voting, except to say that Italy, Portugal and Denmark are opposed to this draft directive. That is the good news. The bad news is that they, we and others are unlikely to agree about what would be better because different countries have different interests. We must use the blocking minority, although I do not think that it will come to that if it is seen that significant countries are opposed to the draft directive. We must also try to use the power of persuasion to establish what is right and make it possible.

I must tell my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) that if we concentrate too often on which directive we are considering—although that is necessary for some of our debates—we take our eye off establishing what is right and how to make it possible. I believe that we can provide leadership in Europe on covering and reducing track costs and on getting road casualties down. Whether we are approaching the matter from the point of view of road safety, environmental damage or the ergonomics of the cab, which my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren) mentioned—he also made a passing reference to a bypass that he would like built——

Mr. Warren: Two bypasses.

Mr. Bottomley: Two! I should not have spoken again. Each time I speak my hon. Friend wants an extra one.

Hon. Members have reinforced the leadership provided by the Government in saying that the draft directive is counter-productive, that the Commission has identified the problem—the exploitation of a loophole by some countries—but that it has come up with the wrong solution. I ask the House to support the Government's lead. We must see whether we can do better.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 6882/88 on the dimensions of articulated vehicles; and endorses the Government's objective of resisting this proposed directive on the grounds that longer articulated vehicles would present significant environmental disadvantages to the United Kingdom.

The Borders (Rural Development)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dorrell]

12.47 am

Mr. Archie Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): My right hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) and I wish to raise the issue of rural development in the Borders in this, the last Adjournment debate of this parliamentary Session.

The significance of the subject goes beyond the Borders region. I am sure that the Minister knows that the European Parliament meets later this week to decide a new set of criteria for the distribution of European Community structural funds to rural areas throughout the EC. The final policy will be ratified by the Council of Ministers by the end of this year. It is therefore important that the House should know what view Scottish Office Ministers will take on assistance to rural areas.

We all recognise that the Government's guiding economic philosophy is a free rein for market forces. Presumably that also applies to rural economies. The difficulty is that areas almost identical to the Borders, such as the Highlands and Islands, have assistance and support via a combination of private and public bodies and authorities. In such areas, help is not only available; it is proving extremely successful.

The first question for the Government is: why is the Borders region being left out? Our needs may be different from those of inner cities or of peripheral housing estates in the central belt, but they are no less great and are not substantially different from those of areas such as the Highlands and Islands.

A number of very worrying trends are appearing in the economy of the Borders. Local agriculture is beset with uncertainty about the future. As the Minister is aware, the changes in the system of support for beef and sheepmeat, moving away from support for the finished animal to premiums for breeding sheep stock and reared cattle, is causing widespread insecurity among the farming community in the Borders.

It is now being said that in western Berwickshire today one can drive for 30 miles through farms that are for sale. More than 60 farm units have been sold this calendar year in the region. The upland units—those between the hill farms and the lower ground units—are no longer viable. Those farms carry livestock and have no viable alternative sources of income. The uncertainty of the European Community changes in the variable beef premium and the sheepmeat regime is certainly taking a very heavy toll of the industry, which forms the backbone of our rural communities. Some of those communities are now at risk.

Do the Government recognise the problem? If they do, what steps are in hand to compensate the agricultural community for the inevitable reduction in European Community support in future?

In the commercial and industrial sectors, the situation is not much more secure. The combination of interest and exchange rate fluctuations and the imminent prospect of a uniform business rate is causing problems. Everyone in the Borders recognises that manufacturing capacity is far too heavily concentrated in textiles and electronics, and there is an urgent need to diversify employment opportunities, with all the consequences that would flow from that in terms of education and training. If the knitwear industry went into recession, the economy in major centres of population, such as Hawick, would collapse.

What are the Government doing to co-ordinate and assist the work of the various agencies, public and private, that already carry out such work? The Borders region has no urban programme assistance, no "Business in the Community" organisation and no enterprise trusts; it relies exclusively on the work of the local authorities and the Scottish Development Agency.

If it is difficult for manufacturing industry, it is even more difficult for the self-employed and those who run small rural businesses. In addition, the demographic change in the age structure of the population will exacerbate the difficulties. A smaller proportion of the work force will be economically active and there will be greater demand for local health and social service systems for the elderly who live in the more remote parts of the area with little or no public services.

The whole rural infrastructure of the region is under increasing pressure. The regional council is undertaking a survey of local shopping patterns. Small high-street shops and post offices are threatened. Control of Lowland Scottish may leave the area if the bus group privatisation plans amalgamate the company with Eastern Scottish. Local school rolls are falling, and school transportation generally presents difficulty for families in country areas.

Those are all classical examples of a situation which produces depopulation, which is evident in my constituency in areas such as Cranshaws and Craik, Liddesdale, Hutton and Paxton, and which is causing concern locally.

I recognise the work done by the regional council planning department in conjunction with the recently devolved local Scottish Development Agency office. I commend the work that they do. They work well together and the people are of a high calibre. They have made considerable strides in the right direction. They are certainly aware of the problems, but they have limited means and a restricted remit.

What needs to be done can only be done by the Government, acting within the framework of a rural development agency which would be given specific power to operate in rural areas to retain the services and facilities that still exist, to take initiatives to help pump-prime new small businesses and to oversee future major developments. There are dozens of examples to illustrate what could be achieved in the Borders and is being achieved in other areas.

At local level, the post office at Roberton in the Borthwick valley is rumoured to be threatened by a substantial reduction in its hours of opening. A rural development agency could find quick ways to ensure the survival of such a vital service.

At regional level, there is a demonstrable need to maintain and repair timber extraction roads. Previously, European grants were available. Because we no longer have development status, the grants are no longer available. A rural development agency could make specific grants where timber extraction accelerated the need for road repairs.

At national level, there is a need to extend Eyemouth harbour. That would be a considerable asset to the entire Scottish fishing fleet. Pressure already exists in the local coastal communities on the Berwickshire coast, where the way of life is being threatened by diminishing catches and financial returns. The inshore fleet and the shellfish sector would benefit, as would the storage and processing industries, if the new harbour were to be built. A rural development agency could contribute to making that new harbour a reality.

Other examples in tourism and food processing could be quoted. For example, there is a worthwhile plan doing the rounds in the agricultural community in the Borders region, the object of which is to set up a Borders sheep marketing group. It could lead to the setting up of some meat processing facilities which could have a major and positive impact on the local economy. The list is almost infinite. I could rehearse many ideas and examples from discussions I am having within the Borders region with the various interest groups. Those that I have mentioned should suffice to make the point.

I advocate making the Borders region a rural development area. I know that the Minister has corresponded with the convenor of the Borders regional council and that his hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) and his regional council have played a notable part in arguing for a rural development fund to be set up in their areas.

If the Government set their face against that and refuse to concede some such status, they will have to say why. They will also have to say why we, in the Borders, are being treated differently from other similar areas in the United Kingdom. There is a strong case for the Borders region to be a potentially eligible area, under objective 5b of the new formula, for European structural funds. If the Government refuse to back the region's claim, they will have to explain why they consistently fail to recognise the need to co-ordinate and fund an integrated plan to rejuvenate rural life in the Borders region and to counter the real threat of rural depopulation.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): I commend the persistence and initiative of my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) in securing this Adjournment debate, and I am grateful to him for allowing me two or three minutes to underline one of the points that he made and to add two others. I wholly support his plea for the Borders to be granted rural development status. Much more immediately, the Government must give a positive response to the Community's revisions of its structural funds.

The Minister will appreciate that, since the removal of development area status in 1980, we have suffered from the fact that development area status exists in high unemployment areas. It is therefore difficult to compete for the attraction of new industry. Considerable opportunities are offered in the Highlands and Islands by the development board, and excellent work is being done in Northumberland by the Development Commission. We are landed between those opportunities, attempting to compete for economic development with no outside assistance. We are placing high hopes on the new wider definition of objectives and we look to the Scottish Office to push the case for the Borders which has been well prepared by the Borders regional council.

I do not want to dwell on this in my brief intervention, but the closure of the mill at Walkerburn in my constituency showed that it is difficult to get a quick response from the Scottish Development Agency because its powers are severely limited. I shall say no more about that because negotiations for purchase of the mill are at a critical stage.

I wish that we could wring from the Government an undertaking for which we have asked several times—that when the South of Scotland electricity board is privatised there will be the same policy requirement in the south of Scotland as there is in the north for common pricing in rural areas. Without such a guarantee, the cost of electricity supply and repairs in rural areas is likely to be greatly increased. I cannot understand why rural areas in the north of Scotland should be treated more favourably than those in the south. I hope that the Government will eventually give that undertaking.

The Minister will know—he gave me a long written answer on Friday—that I am concerned about the way in which, suddenly, factoring of Scottish special housing in the Borders has been removed from local authorities, without any reason being given, and handed over, in my constituency, to a trust that does not yet exist. It is a most extraordinary procedure. I am pursuing the matter with the Scottish Special Housing Association and do not expect the Minister to reply to it tonight.

Housing is the main function of district councils in the Borders. They do not enjoy the powers of other district councils in Scotland. To continue eroding the powers and authority of local government is a mistake when we are looking forward to the possibility of assisting the growth and development of the Borders economy with the help of local authorities and through the previous co-ordination that we had for the development of new housing where it is needed. I am concerned that the drift to the private sector may rob local authorities of the chance to direct housing as part of economic development in the rural areas in the future.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): I congratulate most warmly the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) on obtaining this Adjournment debate. He has raised a number of issues on behalf of his constituents and I shall attempt to respond to all of them. I have made the Secretary of State aware of the points that he made about bus privatisation. Between 1981 and 1987 the population of the Borders increased substantially.

The right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steele) mentioned housing. I shall follow up the point that he made about the South of Scotland electricity board and ensure that he receives a letter about it.

There has been no disposal of housing, as the right hon. Gentleman acknowledged. The SSHA has agreed in principle to enter into arrangements with Waverley housing trust only for the management or factoring of its Borders stock. These changes do not require the approval or consent of the Secretary of State. I was, of course, advised of the nature of the arrangement proposed, because of the wider policy implications, and have been assured that the SSHA council of management has satisfied itself that the arrangement will constitute good value for money.

Secondly, final decisions on the financial arrangements have not yet been made and will depend on the total number of houses managed by Waverley housing trust at any time. The cost will, however, have to take into account the very different nature of the arrangement proposed by Waverley housing trust, so that this provides good value for money in relation to the standards of service to be provided for the tenants. I understand that there has been wide dissatisfaction among SSHA tenants in the Borders area about the standard of service provided in the past. I can therefore confirm that we are prepared to respond, through an adjustment to the grant in aid for Scottish Homes, to meet any modest increases in the cost of new management arrangements which might prove more satisfactory.

Thirdly, there is no question of the association being required to consult the tenants on a change in the factoring or management arrangements. The association has statutory responsibilities as landlord towards its tenants. It is for the SSHA, as landlord, to make appropriate management arrangements so that these obligations are fulfilled, and it is not customary to consult tenants on such matters.

In that respect the proposed arrangement between the SSHA and Waverley offers no firm commitment on future purchase of the housing stock. Any such proposals would be a matter for the SSHA or Scottish Homes in the first instance, but would also require the consent of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that such consent would be withheld unless the principles set out in the guidelines by the Scottish Development Department on voluntary disposals of stock by local authorities were properly reflected. In particular, my right hon. and learned Friend would be concerned to be assured that the tenants had been fully consulted in accordance with the provisions set out in clause 135 of the Housing Bill, which is likely to become an Act tomorrow.

Finally, I have made it clear that neither the provisions of the Housing Bill nor the separate provisions in the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988 in any way derogate from the current rights of secured tenants of the SSHA or any other public sector landlord. The new legislation will have specific safeguards by ensuring that tenants are fully consulted and have the opportunity of presenting their views.

The hon. Member's speech tended to dwell on what he sees as limits in the region's ability to diversify its economy, rather than on its potential and how best to exploit its natural assets. For example, he referred to the Borders status as a non-assisted area.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, the purpose of the Government's regional policy is to stimulate enterprise and wealth creation and to reduce inequalities in employment opportunities. Regional assistance is therefore directed to areas of greatest relative need as identified on the assisted area map. Assisted area designation is based mainly, but not wholly, on unemployment factors, and it is against such criteria that the Borders do not have assisted area status. The unemployment rates in the Borders, at 6·9 per cent., are well below the Scottish average of 12·8 per cent. and below the current average of 13·8 per cent. for assisted areas with intermediate status. There is therefore no strong case for amending the present designation.

I know that one of the attractions to the region of securing assisted area status is the belief that it would render the area eligible for support from the European Community's regional development fund. The new regulations governing the structural funds are currently the subject of intense negotiations in Brussels and we are negotiating hard to protect our interests. The Borders region has asked for a case to be presented to the European Commission in support of its claim for Community assistance as a rural area under the new regulations. We shall consider these claims, and those of other non-assisted areas, once the new regulations have been finalised. Funds available for such areas will, however, be limited—some estimates suggest 2 per cent. of the structural funds—and concentration on the most needy areas will inevitably be necessary.

As an alternative to assisted area status, it has been suggested that the entire Borders region be designated a rural development area. The hon. Gentleman echoed that argument in making a plea for a rural development agency. The benefits are usually seen as providing access to further financial assistance from the Government or the European Community and ensuring closer co-operation between those public bodies active in encouraging economic development. But we must be extremely clear about what additional benefits we hope to gain before we could be justified in following the rural development area route.

I am sceptical about whether such a designation would have any relevance in Scottish circumstances, even if the entire region could qualify. Unless it was combined with designation as an assisted area, rural development area status would not render the Borders region eligible for any more Government or EC support than it already receives, and, as I have already suggested, there is no compelling case for adjusting the present assisted area map.

As to improving the co-ordination of development effort in the region, I would, in principle, welcome any such improvement, but I must ask why that cannot be done within the existing mechanisms. What is to prevent the local authorities, the Scottish Development Agency and others from building on the existing relationships to improve the service to rural communities in the Borders?

Mr. Kirkwood: They have no money.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Scottish Development Agency has substantial funds, and I shall give the House some examples of what it is doing. We have often stressed the importance that we attach to the agency playing an active role in rural areas, and I know that that is acceptable to the agency's board.

The recent reorganisation of the SDA on to a regional basis is intended to improve the delivery of its services to its customers. A new expanded Borders office was opened in the summer by the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale. That office provides a one-door approach to all the SDA services: access to the agency's business development activities, investment functions, enterprise initiative schemes, property development and management, improving derelict land and other environmental work. Individual projects include its work at Newcastleton, in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, where it is working with the local community to reverse the decline in population and improve the local economy by improving the environment and supporting local businesses.

In Berwickshire, the agency is working with the regional council to identify and encourage areas of economic growth. In Galashiels, those partners are looking at ways of improving the physical and business opportunities in the town centre. Throughout the region, the agency, the regional council, the Scottish tourist board and others are studying how to exploit the tourism potential of the area. The agency owns and manages more than 50 properties in the Borders, working with the local authority on specific accommodation problems. An example is the estate at Tweedbank, where all the units have been allocated, with a similar development expected to begin construction in early 1989.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned Eyemouth. The agency maintains a close interest in the proposals for the redevelopment of Eyemouth harbour. I note the hon. Gentleman's strong support for the project. The application for assistance has just been submitted to the Scottish Office for support. It is under active consideration.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned food processing. I understand that the Borders regional council and the SDA have examined the scope for providing added value to the region's agriculture industry by introducing food processing industries. The study's findings are under consideration by both bodies, but it shows the close co-operation that already exists.

Those are just some examples of how the SDA is working to improve the Borders economy and the close links that it enjoys with the local authorities and others——

Mr. Kirkwood: But it does not have any money.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am aware that the hon. Gentleman is worried about the funds. I shall draw that point to the attention of the SDA.

The SDA is well placed and well equipped to perform the tasks that it has been given by the Government, enabling it to work with the local community in promoting the Borders economy. It will be happy to give advice and assistance, where appropriate, to small businesses in the region. I hope that the extensive range of support that is available will be of great assistance.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned training. The Training Agency is actively working to increase the level of training throughout the country, and I am sure that it will be interested to learn of any specific problems affecting rural businesses. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman's constituents might like to contact the nearest Training Agency office, whose staff will be happy to solve any problems. Both the SDA and the Training Agency are there to help.

The provision of general infrastructure is largely a matter for the local authorities. The particular needs of rural areas are recognised in the allocations that they receive. In the present year, the Borders region's capital allocations total some £8 million and are projected to rise to £9·3 million by 1990-91. We fully acknowledge the special problems of housing in rural areas. That is why rural authorities already receive a greater share of resources available, compared to the scale of their housing stock, than do others. However, in these areas, more than anywhere else, local circumstances have to be considered and it is for local authorities, housing associations and others to determine how best to meet the needs of their areas.

It is refreshing to see how much the population in the Borders region has grown. In the perids 1971 to 1981 and 1981 to 1987, even in Roxburgh district, where the population fell slightly, the rate of decline was less than for the whole of Scotland. I acknowledge that specific problems remain, but depopulation is no longer a serious problem, except in the remote parts of the area, where there continues to be some difficulty. The Borders region is extremely attractive to tourists, and I hope that tourism will be strongly encouraged. This is one of the most beautiful parts of the world.

The Government are aware of the process of change affecting the Borders region and other rural areas. Our task is not to resist such changes, but to manage them to the benefit of the people who live and work in rural areas. That challenge is being met through agricultural diversification and the resources provided to the Scottish development agency, the local authorities and others to promote the growth and diversification of the rural economy. The mechanisms for support are well placed to help the Borders region develop its economy from the strong base that it currently enjoys. I would encourage local people to make full use of those mechanisms to secure the future of their communities.

Under the rural transport innovation grant scheme, the Secretary of State may authorise grants for the establishment, continuance or improvement of public passenger transport services for the benefit of a local community. Two applications have been received from the Borders region. One of these, the Southdean and Hobkirk community bus, was successful, and received a small capital grant. We are now actively considering with colleagues in the Department of the Environment, who administer similar schemes, how to achieve greater take-up of the resources available. If the hon. Gentleman has any ideas about this, I strongly urge that they be followed up.

The motion having been made after Ten o'clock on Monday evening, and the debate having continued for half an hour, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH

Mr. Speaker: I have further to acquaint the House that the Lord High Chancellor, one of the Lord Commissioners, delivered Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech to both Houses of Parliament, in pursuance of Her Majesty's Command. For greater accuracy, I have obtained a copy and also directed that the terms of the speech be printed in the Votes and Proceedings. Copies are being made available in the Vote Office.

The Gracious Speech was as follows:

My Lords and Members of the House of Commons,

The Duke of Edinburgh and I were pleased to receive the State Visits of His Majesty King Hassan II of Morocco in July 1987, His Majesty King Olav of Norway in April of this year, His Excellency the President of the Republic of Turkey in July, and the President of the Republic of Senegal and Madame Diouf earlier this month. I was pleased to receive President Reagan of the United States after his visit to Moscow in June.

We recall with pleasure our visit to Canada in October last year, where I was also present on the occasion of the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting in Vancouver. Earlier this year we visited Australia in her Bicentenary year and the Netherlands to mark the William and Mary Tercentenary. Also to mark the Tercentenary, I received Loyal Addresses from both Houses in July. We remember with much satisfaction our State Visit to Spain in October.

My Government have helped to promote better relations between East and West and have played an active part in the Vienna Review Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe.

My Government have continued to enhance Britain's defences and have played a full part in the Atlantic Alliance.

My Government have worked vigorously for balanced and verifiable agreements on arms control in respect of nuclear and conventional weapons and for the abolition of chemical weapons. They have supported the treaty between the United States and the Soviet Union for the elimination of their intermediate and shorter range missiles, as a result of which cruise missiles are being removed from the United Kingdom.

My Government have fully supported the United Nations in its recent efforts to negotiate a ceasefire between Iran and Iraq. They have welcomed the start of the Soviet troop withdrawal from Afghanistan and have supported efforts to restore that country's independence and non-aligned status. My Government have encouraged the forces for change in Southern Africa and have urged the countries of that region to settle their problems peacefully.

My Government have reached agreement with our European Community partners on the restructuring of the Community's finances and on certain measures of reform of its common agricultural policy. They have continued to play a full and active role in negotiations to achieve the completion of a single market within the European Community by the end of 1992, and have encouraged business to prepare for the opportunities and challenges that this presents.

My Government welcomed the agreement reached on their initiative to provide debt relief to some of the poorest countries in Africa. They have continued to provide a substantial aid programme, both directly and through the European Community, including emergency assistance to the victims of natural disasters in Asia, Africa and the Caribbean.

My Government have continued their vigorous efforts to combat international terrorism. They have signed agreements with the United States, Canada, Australia and the Bahamas to provide reciprocal assistance in combating trafficking in drugs.

My Government and the Chinese Government have continued to make good progress in implementing the Sino-British Joint Declaration on Hong Kong. My Government have stood by their commitments to the people of the Falkland Islands, while continuing to seek more normal relations with Argentina.

Members of the House of Commons,

I thank you for the provision which you have made for the honour and dignity of the Crown and for the public service.

My Lords and Members of the House of Commons,

My Government have continued to pursue sound financial policies designed to keep inflation under control and to sustain economic growth. They have made a public sector debt repayment. The national output has continued to grow, as has the number of people in work. Further steps have been taken to help unemployed people into work through the introduction of the employment training programme and the extension of the youth training scheme.

As part of my Government's programme to encourage enterprise and improve the performance of the economy, the basic rate of income tax has been further reduced and all but the lowest of the remaining rates have been abolished. Legislation has been enacted to reform and simplify the tax system and to provide for the independent taxation of married couples.

In further pursuit of my Government's commitment to encourage greater industrial efficiency and to promote wider share ownership, legislation has been enacted to provide for the sale to the public of shares in British Steel and to enable the water authorities and the electricity supply industry to prepare for privatisation.

An Act has been passed for England and Wales to replace domestic rates with the community charge and to introduce uniform non-domestic rates.

An Act has been passed to reform the legislation on rented housing and to give local authority tenants new rights to choose their landlord.

Legislation has been enacted to promote further competition in the provision of local authority services.

An Act has been passed to reform the education system by widening parental choice, by making provision for a national curriculum and by increasing the autonomy of educational institutions.

An Act has been passed to provide for greater democracy and accountability within trades unions and to provide further protection against trade union enforcement of closed shops.

Legislation has been passed to improve the working of criminal justice; to reform the law of extradition; and to improve the assistance available to victims of crime.

An Act has been passed to strengthen the controls over the possession of firearms.

Legislation has been enacted to reinforce firm but fair immigration control.

An Act has been passed for England and Wales to introduce greater flexibility in licensing hours and to strengthen provisions to curb the misuse of alcohol.

Further progress has been made in the consolidation of our statute law. Legislation has been passed to improve the arrangements for legal aid.

An Act has been passed to reform the law of copyright and to make improvements in other areas of intellectual property law.

A reformed system of social security has been introduced.

An Act has been passed further to reform the law on shipping and safety at sea.

An Act has been passed to authorise the construction of a railway tunnel under the English channel to link Britain and France.

Legislation has been enacted to authorise a third crossing of the Thames at Dartford.

In Northern Ireland, my Government have continued their efforts to combat terrorism. They have developed their constructive relations with the Repulic of Ireland through the Anglo-Irish Agreement and have continued to promote the economic revival and political stability of Northern Ireland.

For Scotland, measures have been passed to create a new housing agency and to encourage the provision of private rented housing, to improve the management of schools and to reform the law on civil evidence.

An Act has been passed to establish a statutory authority for the Norfolk and Suffolk Broads.

Legislation has been enacted to encourage the planting of farm woodlands and diversification by farmers.

My Lords and Members of the House of Commons,

I pray that the blessing of Almighty God may attend you.

Thereafter a Commission for proroguing the Parliament was read, after which the Lord Chancellor said:

My Lords and Members of the House of Commons,

By virtue of Her Majesty's Commission which has now been read we do, in Her Majesty's name, and in obedience to Her Majesty's Commands, prorogue this Parliament to Tuesday the twenty-second day of this instant November, to be then here holden, and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued to Tuesday the twenty-second day of this instant November.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 7 November 1988

PRIME MINISTER

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Prime Minister what representations she has received from people living in the corridor delineated by British Rail for routes 1 and 2 for the proposed high speed rail link to the Channel tunnel, concerning the levels of compensation payable to people disturbed by the introduction of new high speed railway lines, and the mechanisms for deciding such compensation; and what plans she has for reviewing the relevant legislation.

The Prime Minister: As far as I am aware I have received one representation which raised this issue. I have no reason to believe that the existing levels of compensation provided for in the Land Compensation Acts, and the mechanisms for deciding it, are inadequate.

Australia (Visit)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to her answers of 19 October, Official Report, column 855, and 24 October, column 16, and the answer of the Minister of State for the Armed Forces of 19 October, Official Report, column 860, if she will explain the relationship between the estimated costs figure of £174,000 for her Australian visit and the estimated charge of £195,000 for the RAF VC10.

The Prime Minister: The provisional estimate of the cost of my Australian visit that I gave in my answer of 19 October was based on estimates of the costs of the RAF VC-10 (given by the Minister of State for the Armed Forces in his answer of 19 October) and of communications, accommodation and ancillary costs incurred by the official party. In arriving at the figure of £174,000 allowance was made for the recoveries expected to be made from journalists and others who also travelled on the VC-10.

"Spycatcher"

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to her reply of 2 November to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton, with respect to the book "Spycatcher", how many copies were ordered; in which country they were obtained; which edition or editions were obtained; how much was expended in their purchase and postal or other costs; and whether any measures were taken to prevent royalties from these purchases accruing to Peter Wright.

The Prime Minister: I have nothing to add to the reply that I gave to the right hon. Member on 2 November at column 641.

10 Downing Street (Furnishing and Decoration)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister if, pursuant to the answer of 1 November, she will give an analysis of the figure of £213,318 spent to date in 1988-89 on furnishings and decorations in 10 Downing street.

The Prime Minister: No.

Armed Forces Pay Review Body

Mr. Mans: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make a statement about the chairmanship of the Armed Forces Pay Review Body.

The Prime Minister: Sir Peter Matthews has advised me that he will wish to retire as chairman of the Armed Forces Pay Review Body after it has completed its next report in 1989. I take this opportunity of expressing the Government's gratitude to Sir Peter for his service as chairman of that review body since 1984.

I am glad to be able to announce that Mr. Peter Cazalet has agreed to take over the chairmanship from Sir Peter Matthews from 1 April 1989 for a period of three years.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Autism

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many children and adults have been recorded as autistic by each local education authority; what special provision is made by them to cater for their special needs; and what contribution is made by his Department and by charitable bodies.

Mr. Butcher: This information is not available. School children in England have not been classified in accordance with categories of handicap since 1983 and further education students have never been so classified. LEAs must make provision for all schoolchildren with special educational needs in accordance with the Education Act 1981. This provision may include placement in one of 14 independent schools in England which are run by the National Autistic Society or local autistic societies. In securing adequate facilities for further education in their areas, LEAs must have regard to the requirements of persons with learning difficulties. A two-year research project into autism, funded jointly by my Department and the Department of Health, began on 1 May 1987.

Universities and Polytechnics

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will give the number of academic departments in United Kingdom universities and polytechnics which have been closed since May 1979;

(2) what information is available to his Department from the universities and polytechnics and college funding councils as to the number of academic departments in United Kingdom universities and polytechnics which have closed since May 1979.

Mr. Jackson: This information is not collected centrally.

British Geological Survey

Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he is yet in a position to announce his decision on the proposal that the British Geological Survey should cease to be under the auspices of the Natural Environment Research Council; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Yes. As Sir Clifford Butler's report recognised, the British Geological Survey is an important national resource whose primary function is to meet national surveying needs. It will remain within the responsibilities of my Department and as part of the Natural Environment Research Council. But changes and developments are needed. I accept the concept of a core programme of surveying as recommended by Butler; and, within this, the centrality of the National Geosciences Data Centre. Further work is needed to define that programme, having regard to the priority needs of users both in the private and public sectors; and to examine the survey's future financial and funding arrangements, including such matters as charging for goods and services. Pending completion of this further work, I am making available for the survey, through the NERC, an additional £3 million in 1989-90, with planning additions of £4 million in 1900-91 and £5 million in 1991-92. These planning figures will be subject to review in the normal way through the annual Public Expenditure Survey.

Education Reform

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will issue guidelines to local education authorities on the availability of lists of parents' names and addresses to parents of children in schools considering opted-out or city technology status.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Education Reform Act 1988 requires the governing body of a school to provide a list of the names and addresses of parents of registered pupils at the school, on request, to any such parent seeking the list in connection with a possible application by the school to become grant-maintained. Parents may ask the governing body to exclude their names and addresses from the list they release. The Department has recently issued guidance on this matter for local education authorities and others in Circular 10/88 and in the booklet, "School Governors: How to Become A Grant-Maintained School". Parallel arrangements for city technology colleges would not be appropriate since these are independent schools.

Assisted Places

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to introduce more schools into the assisted places scheme.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Subject to the satisfactory completion of participation agreements, 52 additional schools will be joining the assisted places scheme from September 1989. The schools concerned are all of the high quality required for participation in the APS. I am confident that they will enhance this successful and popular scheme which is now on course to reach 35,000 places by the mid-1990s.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

British Rail (Fraud Allegations)

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Attorney-General if there are to be any prosecutions arising from the recent police investigations into allegations of fraud among senior British Rail management in London and Scotland in relation to privatised contracts; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: In consultation with the Crown Prosecution Service fraud investigation group, officers of the British Transport police are inquiring into certain allegations of crime involving British Rail in England and Wales. The inquiries are at an early stage and no prosecution decision can be taken until they are complete. The prosecution of offences in Scotland is a matter for my Noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate.

Adoption

Mr. Ray Powell: To ask the Attorney-General if he will introduce legislation to make it unlawful for foster parents who have made application to adopt the child in their care to change the surname of the child before consent to the adoption has been given by the judge.

Mr. Mellor: I have been asked to reply.

We are sympathetic to making changes in this direction.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Departmental Statistics (Review)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what review is taking place of the collection of statistics undertaken by his Department; with whom officials are consulting in the review; when he expects to make any public statement about the outcome of the review; and what representations he has received.

Mr. Maude: The review of DTI statistics was announced on 22 June 1988 in the Government's response to the Treasury and Civil Service Committee report on the 1988 Budget. (House of Commons Paper 541.) The terms of reference for the review were published in British Business on 12 August 1988.

The review is being conducted as an efficiency scrutiny. The scrutiny team is consulting widely, including statisticians responsible for individual surveys, users of DTI statistics and providers of statistics. The team is due to report at the end of December and any public announcement would be made after then. The scrutiny team will continue to consider the views of interested parties. No representations about the scrutiny itself have been made to my Department. However, a number of representations have been received from industry and commerce about the availability of statistics of trade with EC member states after 1992. A framework regulation concerning these statistics is in the final stages of preparation and is expected to go before the Council of Ministers within the next two months; a copy will be deposited in the House.

Beaulieu (Aid Repayment)

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what information he has received from the European Commission regarding the Belgian Government's compliance with the Commission's decision of 27 June 1984 and the European Court of Justice judgment of 9 April 1987, concerning the required repayment of aid of £3·7 million by a subsidiary of Beaulieu, a Belgian carpet manufacturer.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 1 November 1988]: I understand the European Commission has now required the Belgian Government to recover the aid from the subsidiary of Beaulieu by the end of next month.

WALES

Job Creation

Sir Raymond Gower: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has made of the number of new jobs to result from new factory projects and extensions to existing factories in Wales already announced during 1988; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: The factory building programmes for 1988-89 announced earlier this year for the Welsh Development Agency and Mid Wales Development have the potential to accommodate over 4,800 jobs.

Public Bodies (Salaries)

Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what annual salaries are paid to each of the following (a) chairman, Land Authority for Wales, (b) vice-chairman, Land Authority for Wales, (c) chairman, Cardiff Bay development corporation, (d) chairman, Housing for Wales and (e) members of the Welsh Development Agency.

Mr. Peter Walker: The information is as follows:

Post	Salary £
(a) Chairman, Land Authority for Wales	24,008
(b) Deputy chairman, Land Authority for Wales	6,816
(c) Chairman, Cardiff Bay Development Corporation	24,290
(d) Chairman, Housing for Wales[1]	22,135
(e) Members of the Welsh Development Agency	4,825

[1] Subject to parliamentary approval of the proposals for Housing for Wales.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Microenterprises

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he is taking to stimulate the growth of microenterprises in developing countries.

Mr. Chris Patten: We are able to provide support in this area both directly through the bilateral country programme and also through our contributions to selected non-governmental organisations working in developing countries. Recent examples include support for microenterprises in two Indian urban projects, for handicrafts in Zimbabwe and for small industries in St. Helena and Mozambique.

China

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's support for development projects in China.

Mr. Chris Patten: I visited China in September to sign a new agreement on concessional financing arrangements. It will provide support through the aid and trade provision, in the form of both soft loans and mixed credits, for development projects with a total value of £300 million. This follows the £300 million soft loan agreement with China signed in 1986, which is now largely committed.

Kampuchea

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received concerning the provision of development assistance to Kampuchea.

Mr. Chris Patten: We have received numerous inquiries from hon. Members, voluntary agencies and members of the public about aid to Cambodia. I set out our policy on this issue in reply to the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) on 28 July, at column 697. As I said then, we are contributing £100,000 to the Food and Agriculture Organisation/World Food Programme appeal for Cambodia. Last month I announced an additional allocation of £500,000 to support projects, including humanitarian projects in Cambodia, proposed by British voluntary agencies for assistance under the joint funding scheme.

Hurricane Joan

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what aid the United Kingdom has given to Nicaragua to date in the wake of Hurricane Joan.

Mr. Chris Patten: Including our share of European Community emergency aid, total British disaster relief stands at £346,000.

Ecological Development

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will increase the amount of aid spent on projects which restore, protect and improve the ecological basis for development including those which build up the environmental capability of Ministries and personnel in small countries.

Mr. Chris Patten: Allocations to particular projects and sectors within our country programmes are agreed with recipient Governments and this involves weighing up competing priorities. I aim to agree with these Governments more support to the forestry sector and the institutions responsible for it; this will help ecologically in a number of ways, including the protection of watersheds and halting of desertification.

Social and Environmental Aid

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will increase the number of staff at the Overseas Development Administration dealing with social and environmental aspects of aid.

Mr. Chris Patten: The number of social development advisers has increased from two to four over the last year and an associate professional has just been appointed.

All project managers have responsibility for the environmental aspects of aid which must be addressed at the earliest stage of the project cycle. Environmental advice to the Department has recently been strengthened by a formal link with the International Institute for Environment and Development.

Environmentally Sustainable Projects

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to call on the European Commission aid organisations to devote more staff and resources to environmentally sustainable projects.

Mr. Chris Patten: At the recent opening of negotiations for a successor to the present Lomé convention the Community made clear the importance it attached to the protection of the environment and reaffirmed its willingness to step up co-operation with its African, Caribbean and Pacific partners in this field.

The Government are concerned that the European Commission, which manages Community aid, should make the best use of its resources to cover environmental concerns; currently the Overseas Development Administration is financing a foresty expert to work with the Commission's own staff.

Nicaragua

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the latest information regarding the damages to the Nicaraguan economy and people by the recent hurricane; and what is the most urgent aid needed by the Nicaraguans, especially the English-speaking Nicaraguans on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. Chris Patten: The latest information we have is that 29,000 houses, 66 bridges, 24 roads and 300 schools were damaged or destroyed. One hundred and sixteen people are reported dead and 278 badly injured.

The most urgent aid required, particularly in the Bluefields area, is for contributions towards the replacement or major repair of housing which has suffered the most severe damage. We have given £60,000 to OXFAM for the supply of zinc sheeting to Bluefields. This would form part of the £250,000 which we have offered to Nicaragua for disaster relief.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Nuclear Reactor Technology

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what instructions he has given to the United Kingdom representative to the Co-ordinating Committee for Multilateral Export Control in Paris regarding the application by the Federal Republic of Germany that high temperature nuclear reactor technology be given permission to be exported to the Soviet Union.

Mr. Waldegrave: The West German authorities have yet to submit any application to COCOM for such an export of a high temperature nuclear reactor to the USSR. Were they to do so, relevant officials would examine the specifications of the equipment involved in the usual way to assess whether we considered it to be acceptable in security terms. We would then be in a position to issue instructions to the United Kingdom delegate to COCOM.

Boris Chernobilsky

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make urgent representations to the Soviet Government about their decision to withdraw the exit visa granted to Boris Chernobilsky.

Mr. Waldegrave: Mr. Chernobilsky has not yet been granted a visa, but has been asked to provide further documentation to support his application. We are following this case closely and will certainly take it up again if Mr. Chernobilsky is not granted an exit visa.

British Council

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the location of staff, number of offices and expenditure by the British Council in South Africa.

Mr. Eggar: The British Council has the following offices in South Africa.

	Staff
	London appointed	Locally engaged
Johannesburg	3	9
Cape Town	1	3

Estimated expenditure for 1988-89

	£'000
Gross main local budget (including staff costs)	577
Agency funds administered on behalf of others (mainly ODA)	3,224

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the location of staff, number of offices and expenditure by the British Council in the Caribbean.

Mr. Eggar: The British Council has no offices in the Caribbean. In 1988-89 a total of £31,500 has been allocated for academic exchange and arts events. The council also administers £3 million on behalf of others (mainly ODA); manages a World Bank-funded technical assistance programme worth £1·26 million in Barbados and administers a privately-funded fellowship training programme worth £257,000 in Guyana.

Bus Attack, Jericho

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, in his assessment of middle east policy, he has made any assessment as to the affiliation of those responsible for the recent fire bombing of a bus near Jericho.

Mr. Waldegrave: No.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Ewe Premium

Mr. Amos: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will review the rules relating to the application procedures for ewe premium claims.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The rules governing applications for sheep annual premium are laid down in EC regulations. We keep under review the way in which these rules are implemented in the United Kingdom.

Apples

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what level of import duty or tax is applied to foreign apples coming from outside the EEC; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: The common customs tariff of the Community in respect of third country apples is as follows:

	Per cent. ad valorem
1 August-31 December	14
1 January-31 March	8
1 April-31 July	6

In addition countervailing charges may be levied under the reference price system.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the current wholesale price of apples in London expressed in pence per pound.

Mr. MacGregor: The average wholesale prices of the main varieties of apples currently on sale in London are set out in the table. These figures are an average of the most usual prices recorded at New Covent Garden market for the week ending 2 November 1988.

Country of origin and variety of apple	Class	Pence per pound

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the current policy of the EEC on the growing and marketing of apples.

Mr. MacGregor: The EC policy on the growing and marketing of apples forms part of its general policy on fruit and vegetables, and is set out as follows in Council regulation (EC) 1035/72:

"the achievement of a balance between supply and demand at fair prices to the producer, account being taken of trade with third countries, while encouraging specialisation within the Community".

These aims are implemented through a system of quality standards designed to improve the product, to guide production to meet consumers' requirements and to facilitate trade, and through measures to facilitate the formation of producer groups, as well as through a limited system of price support, export refunds, and import charges.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Marriage Bureaux (Developing Countries)

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what measures his Department is proposing to take to protect Filipino women resident in the United Kingdom as a result of arranged marriages through commercial marriage bureaux who are subsequently deserted by their British husbands;

(2) what steps his Department is taking to monitor and regulate the activities of British-based marriage bureaux who are operating in the Philippines and other developing countries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: Relevant provisions are already in place under the immigration rules. As a result of the Immigration Act 1988, the rules have since August provided that neither a husband nor a wife may be admitted to the United Kingdom as the spouse of any person (including British citizens) settled here unless the entry clearance officer is satisfied that the marriage was not entered into primarily to obtain admission to this country and that the couple intend to live together permanently as husband and wife.

Persons admitted as spouses are given leave to remain for 12 months in the first instance. At the end of that period, a spouse may be given indefinite leave to remain provided that the marriage has not been terminated and the intention of the parties remains to live together permanently as husband and wife. If the marriage is not subsisting at the end of that period, an application for further leave to remain may be refused. Each case is, however, considered on its merits.

The Government have no present plans either to change the rules in this respect or for legislation in respect of marriage bureaux.

Women's Issues

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when the ministerial group on women's issues will next be meeting; whether the group will be meeting at regular intervals; and whether scrutiny, for direct or indirect sex discrimination in past and present legislation will be a future agenda item for the group;

(2) whether the ministerial group on women's issues consulted with the Equal Opportunities Commission, appropriate trade unions, or other equal opportunities expert opinion from the United Kingdom and the European Community before drawing up the proofing system and checklist which will be used to identify direct or indirect discrimination against women in future Government legislation; and whether he will publish the proofing checklist;

(3) how the operation of the proofing system, recommended by the ministerial group on women's issues, will be monitored and reviewed;

(4) how may training hours and days have been allocated for the staff awareness seminars recommended by the ministerial group on women's issues.

Mr. John Patten: The ministerial group on women's issues will next meet in February 1989. The function of the group is to co-ordinate policy issues of special concern to women, including the practical effect of legislation. At its meetings on 24 October, the group endorsed model guidance on "equal opportunity proofing" and a checklist for staff of Government Departments. These were prepared after discussion with the Equal Opportunities Commission. A copy of the model guidance and the checklist has been placed in the Library.

The ministerial group will keep its operation under review to see whether any changes are required in the light of experience. In addition, the Civil Service college is running a one-day pilot seminar on equal opportunity proofing in the new year and it will be repeated on future occasions to meet departmental needs. The ministerial group is also asking departmental trainers to liaise with the college in order to incorporate appropriate guidance in their own training courses.

British Rail (Fraud Investigation)

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to the progress of police inquiries into allegations of fraud by senior managers involving contracts put out to private tender by British Rail; and if he will list the contracts involved.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No. I understand that inquiries are being carried out by the British Transport police, for whom my right hon. Friend has no responsibility.

Prison Population

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what was (a) the sentenced and (b) the remand population for all prisons in England and Wales and for the latest date available;

(2) how many females are currently being held in prison establishments under sentence in England and Wales.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The information is given in the following table. On the same date, 1,742 males and 50 females, most of whom were likely to be remand prisoners, were held in police cells.

Population of Prison Service establishments in England and Wales on 30 September 1988: by type of prisoner and sex

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the certified normal accommodation and actual population for each local prison in England and Wales, for the latest date available.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: On Friday 4 November the certified normal accommodation (CNA) and population of each local prison in England and Wales was as follows:

Prisoners (Police Cells)

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners were held in police cells on each Friday during September and October in England and Wales.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The number of prisoners held in police cells in England and Wales on the dates specified by the hon. Member were as follows:

	Number
2 September 1988	1,474
9 September 1988	1,575
16 September 1988	1,620
23 September 1988	1,634
30 September 1988	1,792
7 October 1988	1,752
14 October 1988	1,774
21 October 1988	1,811
28 October 1988	1,486

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners who were remanded in police cells were sentenced by the courts without a social inquiry report since 1 January.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: This information is not available.

Prisoners (Suicides)

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many suicides occurred in prisons in England and Wales in (a) the remand population and (b) the sentenced population during 1988.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Verdicts of suicide have been returned on 17 inmates who died in Prison Department establishments in England and Wales during 1988. Of these inmates, 11 were on remand and six had been sentenced. Inquests have yet to be held on 14 other inmates (of whom seven were on remand and seven were sentenced) who died in Prison Department custody during this period and whose deaths are thought to have been suicide.

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many attempted suicides occurred in prisons in England and Wales in (a) the remand population and (b) the sentenced population during 1988.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have received reports of 424 apparent suicide attempts made by inmates in Prison Department custody in England and Wales during 1988. Information on whether these inmates were on remand or sentenced is not held centrally.

Women Prisoners

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many women are currently being held under sentence in Durham prison.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: On Wednesday 2 November 1988 there were 35 women held under sentence in Durham prison.

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans to transfer women prisoners held in Durham to all-female establishments.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: There are no plans at present to transfer women prisoners held in Durham to all-female establishments.

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many women with their children are currently being held under sentence in prisons in England and Wales.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: On 4 November 1988 there were 27 adult women and six young offenders under sentence being held with their children in prison mother and baby units.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements are made to safeguard the mental and physical health of category A female prisoners held on remand in solitary confinement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 4 November 1988]: No prisoner is held in solitary confinement.

The care of the mental and physical health of category A female inmates, as of all other inmates in prison custody, is the responsibility of the medical staff supported by all the resources available to the prison medical services.

The conditions in which it is necessary to hold category A female prisoners provide a regime which is as varied and constructive as the needs of security allow, and include opportunities for exercise, recreation and association with others.

Police, Prison and Probation Services

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans to expand (a) the police service, (b) the probation service and (c) the prison service during the financial year 1988-89; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hurd: Estimated spending in 1988-89 is £3,800 million for the police, a £310 million increase on 1987-88, and £250 million for the probation service, a £30 million increase on 1987-88. The published estimate for the prison service is £802 million, a £27 million increase over estimated outturn for 1987-88. There is likely to be additional expenditure in the prison service arising from measures to relieve prison overcrowding; and necessary financial provision will be sought through spring Supplementary Estimates.

Prisoners (Sentences)

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons were sentenced to a period of imprisonment in England and Wales during (a) 1986 and (b) 1987.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested can be found in Table 7.1 of "Criminal statistics, England and Wales, 1987" (Cm. 498), copies of which are in the Library.

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of persons sentenced to a period of imprisonment in England and Wales in 1986-87 served less than six months.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Following the increase in August 1987 to one half in remission for persons serving sentences of 12 months or less, all persons received with sentences of under 12 months who qualified for full remission would serve under 6 months in custody. In 1986, the latest readily available data, about 60 per cent. of the 67,000 persons received under an immediate custodial sentence had a sentence of under twelve months, and virtually all the 19,000 received in default of payment of a fine. Information about the time served in custody under sentence is published annually in "Prison Statistics England and Wales" (tables 4.11, 5.11 of the latest issue, for 1986 Cm. 210).

Prisoners (Statistics)

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners whose country of origin was either (a) the Republic of Ireland or (b) Northern Ireland are currently being held under sentence in gaols in England and Wales.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Citizens of Northern Ireland are not separately identified from other citizens of the United Kingdom. However, on 30 September 1988 about 300 sentenced prisoners in prison service establishments in England and Wales who were citizens of the United Kingdom or whose citizenship was unknown were known to have been born in Northern Ireland.

The recording of nationality on the records held centrally for citizens of the Republic of Ireland is not completely reliable because it depends upon the information provided by the prisoner. On 30 September abut 430 sentenced prisoners in establishments in England and Wales were recorded as citizens of or born in the Republic of Ireland.

Prisoners (Transfers)

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many requests for transfers to gaols in Northern Ireland or the Republic of Ireland have been received from prisoners, currently serving their sentences in England or Wales, in the current year;

(2) how many prisoners have been transferred from a gaol in England and Wales to a gaol in Northern Ireland or the Republic of Ireland during 1988.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Since the beginning of the year there have been 48 requests for permanent transfer to establishments in Northern Ireland and 15 for temporary transfer. There have also been 10 requests for permanent transfer to the Republic of Ireland.

During the same period six inmates have been accepted for permanent transfer from England and Wales to Northern Ireland and five for temporary transfer. Not all these transfers have yet taken place. Transfers of prisoners to and from the Republic of Ireland will not be possible until the Republic ratifies the European convention on the transfer of sentenced persons.

Prison Educational Classes

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any prison educational classes have been cancelled or curtailed in local or dispersal prisons during 1988.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The unavoidable absence of teachers and the operational requirement of establishments have caused some curtailment or cancellation of classes in these establishments during the past year.

Custodial Remands (Statistics)

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of persons who were originally remanded in custody, were eventually given a non-custodial sentence, or were acquitted or not proceeded with during 1986 and 1987.

Mr. John Patten: The information is given in the following table.

Persons remanded into Prison Service establishments in England and Wales in 1986 and 1987 who were not given a custodial sentence: by result of court proceedings.

Percentage

	Year of initial remand in custody
	1986	[2]1987
Not guilty or not proceeded against	5	4
Given a non-custodial sentence or freed on rising[1]	30	27
Ultimate disposal not recorded	13	21

[1] Persons freed on rising are those who were sentenced to immediate custody of such length that it had already been served on remand.

[2] Provisional figures.

Prisoners (Ethnic Composition)

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, for the latest date available, what was the ethnic composition of (a) male and (b) female prisoners held under sentence or remand in prisons in England and Wales.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The readily available information is given in the following table. The information is published annually in "Prison Statistics, England and Wales", table 1.11 of the 1986 issue, Cm. 210, copies of which are in the Library.

Population[1] of prison department establishments in England and Wales on 30 June 1987 by type of prisoner, sex and ethnic origin

[1] The figures are those recorded centrally and are approximate.

Prisoners (Mental Illness)

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, for the latest date available, what was the number of prisoners held under sentence who were suffering from a recognised mental illness or personality disorder in gaols in England and Wales.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: On 31 March 1988, the most recent date for which figures are available, 235 inmates of Prison

Department establishments in England and Wales were, in the opinion of medical officers, suffering from mental disorder of a nature or degree which would satisfy the criteria in the Mental Health Act 1983 for detention in hospital for medical treatment. This compared with 345 inmates so reported on 30 September 1987.

A total of 156 of the 345 recorded by prison medical officers on 30 September 1987, and 119 of the 235 recorded on 31 March 1988, were under sentence.

Young Persons (Custody)

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans to abolish the use of custody for 14 to 17-year-olds in England and Wales.

Mr. John Patten: No.

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans to extend to adult offenders the criteria which must be satisfied before a court may pass a custodial sentence on a person under 21 years of age in England and Wales.

Mr. John Patten: No; but the Green Paper, "Punishment, Custody and the Community" (Cm. 424) published in July, invites comments on the future use of custody and the desirability of defining in legislation the circumstances in which the proposed supervision and restriction order might be used.

Sentences (Ethnic Monitoring)

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans ethnically to monitor sentencing decisions in magistrates' courts and Crown courts in England and Wales.

Mr. John Patten: Because of differences in the gravity of offences and the circumstances of offenders, it is difficult to do this routinely. Research studies provide some information, such as a study of Crown court sentencing which we hope to publish in due course.

Correspondence

Sir Geoffrey Finsburg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will give a definitive answer to the letter from the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate dated 18 August and acknowledged under reference 21401/88 on 23 August.

Mr. Renton: I regret that due to an oversight in my private office my reply to the hon. Member was delayed. I have now written to him.

Unlicensed Vehicles

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement regarding the recent action taken by the Metropolitan police to reduce the number of unlicensed vehicles on London streets.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Metropolitan police enforce the law in respect of unlicensed vehicles throughout the year and from time to time mount special campaigns to detect such offences. I understand from the Commissioner that the most recent of these campaigns took place in May.

ENERGY

CEGB (Area Workshops)

14. Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board; if he discussed the proposed closure of the area workshops; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: My right hon. Friend and I meet frequently with the chairman of the CEGB to discuss a range of subjects.

Gas Prices

15. Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy by how much gas prices have increased in real terms in each of the last five years.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Gas prices to the domestic sector have not increased in real terms in any of the last five years; they have fallen at an average rate of 3·1 per cent. per year.

Gas prices to the industrial sector have increased in real terms in only one of the last five years; over the five year period as a whole they have fallen at an average rate of 6·9 per cent. per year.

Electricity Industry

16. Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what proportion of each distribution company's purchases of power he will require to be supplied from non-fossil fuel sources after privatisation.

Mr. Parkinson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) on 11 May 1988 at column 112.

38. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he now expects to announce the details of the Government's proposals to privatise the electricity supply industry.

Mr. Parkinson: The Government intend to introduce legislation at the earliest opportunity.

45. Mr. Prescott: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next intends to meet the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board to discuss the privatisation of the electricity supply industry.

Mr. Parkinson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend, the Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Franks).

Energy Requirements (Elderly People)

17. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on his Department's plans to ensure the energy requirements of elderly people are met over the coming winter.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Government recognise the particular needs of the elderly. This winter my Department will join again in the Government's "Keep Warm Keep Well" campaign. We recognise the importance of the fuel industries' code of practice which protects those in genuine difficulty with their fuel bills.

EC (Energy Policy)

18. Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on progress towards the development of a European Community energy policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: As I have informed the House, the Energy Council of 9 June was unable to agree conclusions on the Commission's review of Member states' energy policies with regard to the Community's 1995 energy objectives. The review will be reconsidered at the Energy Council tomorrow.

Sizewell B

19. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what estimate he has made of the economic benefit of the construction and operation of Sizewell B for the local community.

Mr. Michael Spicer: This issue was fully covered in the report of the Sizewell B public inquiry, a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

27. Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the British companies involved on the construction and future operation of Sizewell B, and the total number of personnel employed on the project.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The construction and operation of the Sizewell B PWR is a matter for the CEGB, however, I am advised by the board that a total of 57 contracts have been let to British companies. I am asking the chairman of the CEGB to let my hon. Friend have the names of these companies.

The total number of permanent CEGB staff working on the project, in the project management board, is currently 850, with another 1,200 in the design consultants. I understand that there are also over 1,000 contractor's staff on site. The CEGB estimates that the numbers employed on work associated with Sizewell, together with the jobs actually generated on site, will average out at roughly 10,000 jobs per year being created over the seven-year construction period.

Coal Production

20. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the productivity figures for British Coal for each of the last three years; and if he will express the figures as a percentage increase-decrease on the previous year's figures.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Productivity increased by 21 per cent. in 1986-87 and by 10 per cent. in 1987-88. The productivity figures are as follows:

	Output per manshift tonnes	Percentage increase over previous year[1]
1985-86	2·72
1986-87	3·29	+21
1987-88	3·62	+10
1988-89 to date	4·07	+15

[1] Provisional data, year to date compared with similar period last year.

High Technology Research

21. Dr. Michael Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what plans he has for maintaining high technology energy related research after privatisation of the electricity industry.

Mr. Parkinson: I keep electricity research under continuous review.

Home Insulation

23. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make it his policy to incorporate demand-side management incentives in his electricity privatisation proposals designed to encourage the wider insulation of homes.

Mr. Peter Morrison: No. In most circumstances the best way of promoting energy efficiency is to ensure that individual consumers are free to make informed decisions on whether to invest in conservation or supply in the light of their individual needs.

Electricity Generation

24. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will instigate an inquiry into the comparative costs of electricity generated from coal as against nuclear fuel in Britain in the past, currently, and in the future.

Mr. Michael Spicer: No. I understand that the CEGB has agree to provide information on economic comparisons to the Hinkley inquiry.

Grimethorpe Fluidised Bed Project

25. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will make a statement on the implications for his Department's research and development funding of the impending closure of the Grimethorpe fluidised bed project.

22. Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will institute an energy audit and energy conservation scheme for households based upon low interest loans administered by building society, bank, local authority, housing trust or other responsible organisations with repayment phased over the investment's pay-back period.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The provision of low- interest loans by financial and other institutions is a matter for their commercial judgment. The Government already operate schemes for improving the energy efficiency of housing by way of the homes insulation scheme and community insulation projects.

46. Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what steps he is taking to ensure the continuation of the fluidised bed project at Grimethorpe; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The future of the facility is a matter for British Coal and private industry wishing to exploit the technology.

Energy Policy

26. Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what contribution his Department is making to research into the energy policy implications of the greenhouse effect.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The greenhouse effect is a complex and developing subject and the extent to which energy production and use contribute to the effect are not yet clear. The Government, in their commitment to the development of nuclear power and renewable sources, are taking steps to minimise energy's impact upon climatic conditions.

North Sea Oil and Gas

28. Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many (a) new drillings have been made and (b) new finds have been discovered in the North sea over the last three years; if he will split the figures between oil and gas; what percentage these new workings represent of the total output; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The total number of wells drilled on the United Kingdom continental shelf since 1985 is as follows:

Year	Number
1985	290
1986	198
1987	256

Note: 251 offshore wells have been drilled so far this year (to end September). The total for the corresponding period in 1987 was 184. (Figures include exploration, appraisal and development drilling).

The total number of significant offshore oil and gas discoveries announced in the last three years is as follows:

	Oil	Gas
1985	14	8
1986	6	9
1987	8	11

A further three significant discoveries, all of them oil, had been made by the end of September this year.

Significant discoveries since 1 January 1985 represent 28 per cent. of those made since the commencement of offshore exploration in 1964.

The high level of drilling activity during 1988 reflects the continuing confidence of the oil industry in the United Kingdom continental shelf. Current activity is at a level not far short of the record years of 1984 and 1985 when 290 wells were drilled.

British Coal

29. Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if consideration has been given to a proposal that there should be a management purchase of British Coal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: We intend to privatise the coal industry after the next general election. We are currently considering the options; no decisions have yet been made.

31. Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met with the chairman of British Coal; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Parkinson: I meet the chairman of British Coal regularly to discuss all aspects of the coal industry.

41. Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what options he is considering for privatisation of the coal industry.

Mr. Parkinson: No decisions have yet been made. The Government will look at a wide range of options.

Radioactive Waste

30. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what assessment he has made of the implications of the rundown of the fast breeder reactor programme at Dounreay for the continued reprocessing of spent fuel in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Dr. Thomas) on 28 July 1988 at column 484.

Domestic Heating Costs

32. Mr. Holt: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the average annual cost of heating a two-bedroomed house in (a) south-east England, (b) the west country, (c) the north-east and (d) Scotland.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Table I gives the costs of heating a standardised two bedroom house in the four regions requested. For any region the costs will vary according to the type of fuel utilised and the level of house insulation. Table II gives current and price deflated indices for fuel used for domestic heating. In real terms the cost of heating a house (irrespective of the fuel used) is lower in 1988 than at any time since 1981.

Table I
Calculated Costs for Heating a Standardised 2-bedroom House (by region and type of fuel)

	Gas	Electric	Coal	Oil
West Country	£115-200 (195-280)	£130-240 (205-315)	£115-215 (255-355)	£95-165 (160-230)
South East	£120-210 (200-290)	£140-255 (215-230)	£130-240 (280-390)	£100-170 (165-235)
North East	£140-240 (260-320)	£160-295 (235-370)	£120-220 (240-340)	£115-195 (180-260)
Scotland	£140-245 (260-325)	£165-300 (240-375)	£135-250 (270-385)	£115-195 (180-260)

Basis for Calculations:
1. Costs are calculated for a standardised house on the same basis as the last published (February 1986) set of monergy guides, with fuel prices updated to April 1988.
2. The house used is the 'small semi-detached' as in the guides.
3. Figures given first are for space heating only, the range representing the 'poor insulated' and 'well insulated' cases. The bracketed figures include water heating also.
4. No standing charges or maintenance costs are included.
5. The calculations are based on standard wet central heating systems for gas, coal and oil. For electric heating storage radiators using Economy

7 are assumed.
6. All day heating is assumed (16 hours, as in moncrgy guides).
7. Figures are adjusted for regional degree days. For coal only, figures also take account of regional fuel price variations.
8. An allowance has been made for electricity used to power central heating pumps.

Wytch Farm

33. Mr. Michael Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what are the current production figures from the Wytch Farm oilfield; and if he will list the production figures for each of the last three years.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Total production from the Wytch Farm oilfield for 1988 up to 30 September is 362,000 tonnes.

Total production since 1985 is as follows:

	('000 tonnes)
1985	252·6
1986	276·4
1987	292·0

Energy Conservation

34. Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if his Department plans any further campaigns to promote energy saving.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East (Mr. MacKay) on 9 June 1988 at columns 634-35. This described the new aims of the Energy Efficiency office and its main areas of work from 1989-90. Work is continuing to develop new strategies and programmes to promote energy efficiency.

Electricity Industry

35. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what progress has been made on the appointment of board members and the formation of the management team for the smaller of the two generating companies.

Mr. Parkinson: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given today to my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. French), and to the press notice which has been placed in the Library of the House.

Sellafield (Safety)

36. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the report by the Health and Safety Executive on safety procedures at Sellafield; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Merionnydd Nant Conwy (Dr. Thomas) on 25 October 1988 at column 133. A copy of the Health and Safety Executive's press release which includes the conclusions and recommendations of the report has been placed in the Library of the House.

Power Station (Fawley)

37. Sir David Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether, in the light of Her Majesty's Government's policy toward the prevention of pollution from fossil fuel sources, he will invite the Central Electricity Generating Board to withdraw its application to build a 1,800 MW coal-fired power station at Fawley on Southampton Water.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) on 27 October 1988 at column 320.

Oil-related Construction

39. Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the current level of oil-related construction activity in the United Kingdom economy.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Capital cost of the 17 offshore projects approved so far this year alone is around £3 billion. The current level of United Kingdom oil and gas construction activity is 129,000 tonnes and has the opportunity of increasing when the fabrication orders for the recently approved £1·1 billion Miller project go out to tender.

Gas and Electricity Charges

40. Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received regarding the effect of recent gas and electricity charge increases on various age and income groups in the population; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Gas tariff prices are a matter for British Gas plc within the limits set by the price formula.

I have received a number of representations on electricity prices.

Coal Imports

42. Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what was the total amount of coal imported each year since 1979.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The information the hon. Member requests is as follows:

Year	Quantity '000 tonnes
1979	4,375
1980	7,334

Environmental Protection

43. Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what plans he has to increase the priority given to the protection of the environment in his Department's activities.

Mr. Parkinson: I fully recognise that all forms of energy production and use have environmental implications. Accordingly, my Department attaches high priority to promoting measures which will minimise those environmental consequences while maintaining diversity of supply. Relevant programmes include: promotion of energy efficiency; endorsement of the CEGB's major programmes to install SO_2 and NO_x emission controls; the proposed non-fossil fuel obligation for the privatised electricity supply industry; support for nuclear power and continued development of commercially viable alternative and renewable energy sources; and preparation of full environmental assessments for all major energy projects with significant environmental impact. Increasing international understanding of the environmental implications of energy production will continue to be reflected in all aspects of my Department's activites.

British Coal Enterprise Ltd.

44. Mr. Knowles: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many alternative job opportunities were created by British Coal Enterprise Ltd. over the last 12 months in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: This is a matter for British Coal Enterprise Ltd. and I am asking the chairman to write to the hon. Member.

Radiation

47. Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what are the levels of radiation from each of the following sources of energy (a) coal, (b) nuclear, (c) geothermal, and (d) peat, oil and gas.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) on 31 October 1988 at col. 534.

Board Members

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what progress has been made on the appointment of board members and the formation of the management team for the larger of the two generating companies.

Mr. Parkinson: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given today to my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. French), and to the press notice which has been placed in the Library of the House.

Electricity Generation

Sir David Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what are his latest estimates of the comparative unit costs of electricity generation from two new base load power stations using, respectively, nuclear fuel, coal, oil, gas and hydro.

Mr. Michael Spicer: This is an operational matter for the Central Electricity Generating Board and I have asked the chairman to write to my hon. Friend.

Deep-mined Coal

Mr. Stevens: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list costs per tonne of deep-mined output for British Coal over the last 12 months: what equivalent information he has for (a) West Germany and (b) France; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: In 1987-88 the cost of deep mined output by British Coal was £41·90 per tonne. The latest consistent international comparisons are for 1986 and cover all mining costs, including interest. They show United Kingdom costs at £52 per tonne, compared with £79 for West Germany and £68 for France.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Trials

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish in the Official Report in how many cases, in each year from 1983, judges were unable to draw inferences from (a) the failure of the accused to mention particular facts when questioned about or charged with an offence, (b) the failure of the accused to testify in trial when called upon by the court to do so, (c) an accused person's failure to account for objects, substances or marks in certain circumstances, and (d) an accused person's failure to account for their presence at a place about the time the offence for which the accused was arrested was committed, indicating in how many cases failure to draw such inferences led to acquittal.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The information requested is not available.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will publish in the Official Report any representations from the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland he has received seeking amendment of the rules of evidence with respect to (a) allowing inferences to be drawn from the failure of the accused to mention particular facts when questioned about or charged with an offence, (b) allowing inferences to be drawn from the failure of the accused to testify in trial when called upon by the court to do so, (c) allowing inferences to be drawn from the failure to account for objects, substances or marks in certain circumstances, and (d) allowing inferences to be drawn from an accused person's failure to account for their presence at a place about the time the offence for which the accused was arrested was committed:

(2) if he will publish in the Official Report any representations from the Royal Ulster Constabulary he has received seeking amendment of the rules of evidence with respect to (a) allowing inferences to be drawn from the failure of the accused to mention particular facts when questioned about or charged with an offence, (b) allowing inferences to be drawn from the failure of the accused to testify in trial when called upon by the court to do so, (c) allowing inferences to be drawn from an accused person's failure to account for objects, substances or marks in certain circumstances, and (d) allowing inferences to be drawn from an accused person's failure to account for their presence at a place about the time the offence for which the accused was arrested was committed:

(3) if he will publish in the Official Report the representations from the Northern Ireland judiciary he has received seeking amendment of the rules of evidence with respect to (a) allowing inferences to be drawn from the failure of the accused to mention particular facts when questioned about or charged with an offence, (b) allowing inferences to be drawn from the failure of the accused to testify in trial when called upon by the court to do so, (c) allowing inferences to be drawn from an accused person's failure to account for objects, substances or marks in certain circumstances, and (d) allowing inferences to be drawn from an accused person's failure to account for their presence at a place about the time the offence for which the accused was arrested was committed:

Mr. Ian Stewart: No. Exchanges between the Government and the Director of Public Prosecutions, Royal Ulster Constabulary and Northern Ireland judiciary are confidential.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish in the Official Report any representations from the Police Federation for Northern Ireland he has received seeking amendment of rules of evidence with respect to (a) allowing inferences to be drawn from the failure of the accused to mention particular facts when questioned about or charged with an offence, (b) allowing inferences to be drawn from the failure of the accused to testify in trial when called upon by the court to do so, (c) allowing inferences to be drawn from an accused person's failure to account for objects, substances or marks in certain circumstances, and (d) allowing inferences to be drawn from an accused person's failure to account for their presence at a place about the time the offence for which the accused was arrested was committed.

Mr. Ian Stewart: No. Representations by the Police Federation which are not made public by it, are confidential.

Custodial Sentences

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the average length of custodial sentence of female prisoners in Northern Ireland in the first six months of the current year.

Mr. Ian Stewart [holding answer 1 November 1988]: The average length of determinate sentences was 8·8 months, excluding those committed to prison in default of payment of a fine, and including persons sentenced to detention in a young offenders' centre.

Firearms

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table in the Official Report showing the number of firearms by type, including handguns, rifles, shotguns or fully automatic weapons, which were seized by the security forces in Northern Ireland in 1987 and 1988; and for each type, how many were legally held weapons stolen by terrorist organisations from (i) civilians, (ii) Royal Ulster Constabulary sources, (iii) Royal Ulster Constabulary Reserve sources, (iv) Ulster Special Constabulary sources, (v) Ulster Defence Regiment sources and (vi) regular Army sources.

Mr. Ian Stewart [holding answer 1 November 1988]: Information is not readily available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, information about weapons which have been recovered or stolen is given in the following table:

	Pistols/ Revolvers	Rifles	Machine Guns	Shotguns
Terrorist firearms recovered by the Security Forces in Northern Ireland in 1987	91	183	23	47

Stolen from:
Army	2	1	0	0
Royal Ulster Constabulary/Royal Ulster Constabulary Reserve	6	1	0	0

A large number of parts of weapons have also been recovered.

DEFENCE

Nuclear Tests

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the service records of Army personel, involved in British nuclear tests in the 1950s and whose records were not available to the NRPB report, will be made available for subsequent reports; and what assessment he has made on the effect of the absence of these records on the accuracy of the findings of the NRPB report.

Mr. Sainsbury: The confidence of the authors in the validity of the findings of the NRPB report takes into account that some participants were not included. As I stated in an answer given to the hon. Member on 31 October, column 525, consideration is being given to improving coverage during the follow up study, the effect of which will be to increase the level of confidence in its findings. At no stage has the MOD withheld from the NRPB access to relevant records.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what advice is available to him as to why service men of higher than average levels of good health have not exhibited lower than average levels of cancers, especially multi myeloma and leukaemia, in the studies arising out of nuclear tests in the 1950s.

Mr. Sainsbury: I am advised that while the observation of somewhat lower than normal national average mortality in service personnel in both the participant and control groups of the NRPB study may be due in part to the selection of healthy recruits, and in part due to other factors on which the selection process was based do not necessarily lead to lower than average levels of cancer mortality or morbidity.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he can give a breakdown of medical conditions involved in disability claims for British nuclear test veterans and give information pertaining to service rank and military units in which they served during the 1950s.

Mr. Sainsbury: The information requested by the hon. Member is not available as the collation of information on medical conditions of service claimants to the Naval, Military and Air Forces etc. (Disability and Death) Legislation Act Service Pensions Order 1983 Number 883, operated by the Department of Social Security does not specifically allow test participants to be distinguished from other claimants.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many British military personnel were involved in American nuclear tests in the 1950s;

(2) what information he has as to whether any British civilians were involved in American nuclear trials in the 1950s.

Mr. Sainsbury: No identifiable groups of British military personnel were involved in the American atmospheric testing during this period. However, the increased United States/United Kingdom co-operation which took place following the 1958 agreement led to some exchanges of personnel, in particular involving a few civilian scientists, and may have included very small numbers of senior military personnel.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many British military personnel were involved in American nuclear tests in the 1960s;

(2) what is the total number of American nuclear tests in which British military personnel were involved, where these tests took place and which British military units took part.

Mr. Sainsbury: The numbers of United Kingdom personnel from 1962 onwards were stated in the reply that I gave to the hon. Member on 31 October, column 527. The enhanced co-operation which dated from the 1958 agreement led to the United States using Christmas Island as a base for the series of United States tests known as Operation Dominic. The tests, starting April 1962 and continuing until November 1962, in its vicinity were all air drops of mainly low or intermediate yield, a few being in the low megaton range. Twenty four tests were conducted in this series, referred to in United Kingdom terms as Operation Brigadoon. The infrastructure built for the United Kingdom tests in the Grapple series (Grapple X, Y and Z) in the period 1957-58 was expanded to accommodate United States test personnel.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he plans to investigate mortality and morbidity in British military personnel involved in American nuclear tests; and whether the NRPB included these servicemen in their report on the effects of nuclear tests in the 1950s.

Mr. Sainsbury: The United Kingdom personnel present for Operation Brigadoon were included in the NRPB study. I have no plans to conduct a study specifically on these individuals. As I stated in my answer on 31 October, column 525, consideration is being given to improving coverage of this group, as part of the participant group as a whole, in the planned follow-up study.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how the testing of water supplies was undertaken on Christmas Island during British nuclear tests there in the 1950s; and what was the frequency of water sampling.

Mr. Sainsbury: The main source of supply was surface water accumulated over a very long period below the atoll. It was tested extensively and found to be sufficiently pure for drinking purposes. When demand was high, recourse was made to supplementary supplies of slightly brackish water which was treated by distillation. The environmental monitoring programme included routine checks on all rainfall for radioactivity to ensure that its addition to the source supply did not degrade it below drinking standards. The standard methods of checking water for radioactivity were to measure the activity of solids obtained by evaporation or precipitation.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the NRPB, as part of its inquiry into cancer incidence in British military personnel serving in British nuclear tests in the Pacific during the 1950s, received and considered evidence from the British Nuclear Test Veterans Association pertaining to cancer incidence amongst its members; and if the NRPB will consider such information for future reports.

Mr. Sainsbury: In order to ensure that no bias was introduced between test participants and the control group, the NRPB study relied on information on mortality and the incidence of cancer from the National Health Service central register (NHSCR). The NRPB has received and is content to continue to receive information from the BNTVA and other associations on individuals who took part in the nuclear weapons test programme. If test participants not included in the study are identified by this route, reference is made to the NHSCR in order to obtain similarly unbiased mortality and cancer incidence data for them.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the present status of the First Independent Field Squadron; and what was its major function during British nuclear tests in the 1950s;

(2) what information he has as to how many members of the First Independent Field Squadron, serving during British nuclear tests in the 1950s, are still living today;

(3) why members of the First Independent Field Squadron, previously serving on Christmas Island during British nuclear tests, were later involved in a series of experiments conducted at Porton Down; and what was the nature of these experiments.

Mr. Sainsbury: I have been informed that the First Independent Field Squadron was formed in Malaya in 1948. In 1950 the unit was posted back to the United Kingdom where, in November that year, it became known as the First Field Squadron. In January 1952 the unit was posted to BAOR Germany where it has remained to this day. There is no record of this unit ever being involved in the United Kingdom nuclear weapon tests or work at Porton Down.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what action was taken to test seaborne radiation levels around Christmas Island during British nuclear tests there.

Mr. Sainsbury: Sea water and fish were monitored throughout the test programmes at many locations. The levels of activity found for fish and for the majority of sea water samples were zero. For the few exceptions where a small increase in natural background radiation was found, it was at such a level that the possibility of harm to any personnel or to the indigenous population could be dismissed. At no time did the levels monitored in sea water exceed 1/20th of the permitted limits for drinking water.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has about the United States legislation providing for monthly payments in respect of different cancers contracted within 40 years of service during American nuclear tests; what assessment he has made of the extent of the similarity or otherwise between the degree of liability acknowledged by the United States Government in relation to those nuclear tests on the one hand, and that accepted by Her Majesty's Government, on the other; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: In the light of the evidence of the effectiveness of the radiological protection arrangements adopted throughout the United Kingdom nuclear weapons test programme (which were recently fully vindicated by the findings of the NRPB report), I announced on 21 July at column 736, that the Government cannot agree to the payment of any special compensation. I cannot comment on the United States Act which embodies a presumption of service connection for certain radiation exposed veterans; this is a matter for the United States Government.

Extramural Research

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will state the proportion of extramural research and development as shown in the Defence Estimates 1987-88 placed with private industry and the public.

Mr. Sainsbury: In the 1987-88 Estimates about 90 per cent. of total extramural research and development expenditure was placed with private industry and less than 1 per cent. with public corporations. Almost all of the remaining expenditure is overseas or with universities or other further education establishments.

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will give the breakdown of the overseas extramural development, as shown in the Defence Estimates 1987-88 into country, company and project.

Mr. Sainsbury: The information requested by the hon. Member could be provided only at disproportionate costs.

Atomic Weapons Establishment, Cardiff

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the total income from sales to the health-care-hospital sector from work done at the atomic weapons establishment, Cardiff over the past five years.

Mr. Sainsbury: The figures are as follows:

1983-84	31,572
1984-85	32,829
1985-86	6,280
1986-87	3,189
1987-88	3,631

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the total income from sales to the civil aerospace sector from work done at the atomic weapons establishment, Cardiff over the past five years.

Mr. Sainsbury: The figures are as follows:

1983-84	—
1984-85	—
1985-86	—
1986-87	202
1987-88	57,268

Wormhoudt Massacre

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on progress made on inquiries in respect of the Wormhoudt massacre during the summer adjournment.

Mr. Freeman: Following the review of the evidence we hold and the reopening of the case in Lubeck, British officials visited the office of the Lubeck public prosecutor for discussions during the summer. Arrangements are now being made for the prosecutor to examine our material in detail, as part of the active pursuit of evidence which he is undertaking.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Civil Servants (Location)

73. Mr. Holt: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many senior civil servants at grade assistant secretary and above are permanently located outside the south-east area.

Mr. Brooke: On 1 April 1988, a total of 1,060 civil servants at grade 5 level and above were located outside the south-east.

75. Mr. Devlin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of the Civil Service is currently located outside London and the south-east.

Mr. Brooke: On 1 April 1988, a total of 61·8 per cent. of civil servants were located outside London and the south-east.

Charitable Donations

74. Mr. Yeo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many civil servants have made use of the Give-As-You-Earn scheme to make donations to charity.

Mr. Brooke: A total of 1,668.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the cost to the Treasury of introducing relief for single donations to charities by companies in 1986-87, 1987-88 and for the first six months of 1988-89; and how much of the cost was attributable to such donations to professional arts organisations with charitable status in the same periods.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The cost accruing from single donations made in the periods specified are now estimated to be:

1986-87	[1]2
1987-88	[1]3
April-September 1988-89	[2]3

[1] Revised.
[2] Provisional.

The cost attributable to donations to professional arts organisations is not known because many payments are made through intermediaries.

European Monetary System (Devaluation)

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the cumulative revaluation or devaluation of (a) the deutschmark, (b) the French franc and (c) the Italian lira since the inception of the European monetary system.

Mr. Lilley: In the 11 realignments of the currencies in the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system since its inception in 1979, the central rates of the deutschmark, French franc and Italian lira against the ecu have been revalued by +22, −16 and −22½ per cent. respectively.

Married Women (Investment Income)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report the amount of investment income returned in 1986-87 in respect of (a) earning and (b) non-earning wives by range of the total income of the married couple, distinguishing separately those cases in which a wife's earnings election was in force.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Available estimates are in the table. All estimates are provisional and subject to a wide margin of error because they are based on a projection of the 1985-86 survey of personal incomes and the coverage of investment income in the survey is incomplete. In some cases, investment income on which basic rate liability is satisfied by deduction at source is not reported. No reliable estimates can be given for wives where the total income of the married couple is less than £5,000.

Mortgages

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he proposes that one spouse will be able to claim half of the mortgage interest relief against his/her income when separate taxation of men and women is introduced.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Yes. Married couples will be able to divide the allowable mortgage interest relief between them in whatever proportions they wish.

Mortgage Interest Relief

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the saving to the Exchequer in a full year at 1988-89 rates of taxation and income of (a) abolishing mortgage interest relief against higher-rate tax, (b) offsetting unearned income in excess of £200 a year against the relevant interest payment and (c) combining both (a) and (b); and if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing in each case his estimate of the numbers affected and the consequential saving by income bands.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The latest estimate of direct revenue yield, in 1988-89 terms, of restricting relief on mortgage interest to the basic rate is £320 million. This estimate is based on the assumption that the mortgage interest rate in October 1988 continues to apply for the remainder of 1988-89. I refer the hon. Member to the replies which I gave him on 29 July. The first of these replies indicates the distribution of the cost of excess over basic rate relief on mortgage interest and of the number of mortgagors affected.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, further to his reply dated 19 October, Official Report, columns 936-38, concerning higher-rate taxpayers, he will publish in the Official Report a table showing his estimate of the average of mortgage interest paid in each case.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The table in the previous reply shows the average amount of mortgage interest relief received. As mortgage interest that is above the limit for interest that qualifies for relief does not have to be reported to the Inland Revenue, estimates of the average mortgage interest paid by each of the categories of tax units in the previous reply are not available.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, further to his replies dated 29 July concerning mortgage interest relief, Official Report, columns 732-35, he will publish in the Official Report the rate of mortgage interest assumed in each case in calculating the amount of relief.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The estimates given were based on the actual mortgage interest rate between April and July 1988 and on the assumption that the mortgage interest for the remainder of the financial year remained at the level which took effect in August 1988.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each of the relevant income bands for single persons and one-earner and two-earner married couples of non-pensionable age the increase in revenue yield in 1988-89 from (a) disallowing mortgage interest relief against higher rate tax and (b) not including the amount of interest paid as an allowance against income in assessing the starting point for higher rate tax.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 3 November 1988]: The latest estimate of the direct revenue yield, in 1988-89 terms, of restricting relief on mortgage interest to the basic rate is £320 million. Of this, £50 million relates to basic rate taxpayers who are kept out of higher rate tax by higher rate relief on mortgage interest. The distribution of relief is indicated in my reply of 29 July at columns 731-34. It is clear from the table in that reply that almost all the yield would arise from non-aged tax units.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the reason for not setting off investment income against mortgage interest tax relief in cases where investment income amounts to more than £500 a year; and if he will publish in the Official Report his estimate of the revenue yield from disallowing mortgage interest relief against all investment income in excess of £500 a year gross.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 3 November 1988]: Mortgage interest relief is allowable, up to the limit on relief, against total taxable income. I refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave him on 29 July 1988 at column 495.

Disaggregation of Income

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, further to his written reply of 19 October concerning wife's earnings election, whether he will provide the information requested on the same total income basis as that given in his written reply of the same date concerning higher-rate taxpayers with a wife's earnings election together with the information on investment income and mortgage interest relief.

Mr. Norman Lamont: More detailed figures for taxpayers with incomes above £20,000 are in the table. They are based on a projection of the 1985-86 survey of personal incomes and are therefore provisional.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Nicholas Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will announce the result of his discussions with representative charitable bodies about the effect of the recent European Court judgment on the value added tax position of charities.

Mr. Lilley: I have received a number of representations from charities about the potential impact on them of the recent European Court judgment on VAT zero rates, and I and Customs officials have also held meetings with representative groups. The issues raised are now being considered in detail; an announcement will be made in due course.

Company Taxation

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the principal reason for the reduction between 1985 and 1986 in the amount allocated by industrial and commercial companies out of income for the payment of United Kingdom taxes.

Mr. Norman Lamont: A reduction in payments of petroleum revenue tax by North sea companies.

Debt Interest

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the amount of debt interest paid in 1987-88 by companies liable to corporation tax.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I regret that this information is not available.

Taxation

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, further to his reply dated 19 October, Official Report, columns 936-38, he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each income group in each category the loss of revenue in the current financial year as a result of the reduction in higher-rate tax to a uniform 40 per cent.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) on 29 April, at columns 323-24.

Company Cars

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) whether he will publish in the Official

Report his estimate of the increase in yield from (a) higher rate and (b) income tax in 1988-89 by adding to the income for tax purposes of employers and their employees, respectively, an amount equal to the full cost, on a leaseback basis, of the provision of a passenger road vehicle other than a light van for personal as well as for business use grossed up to take account of the individual's marginal rate of tax, assuming that (i) a mileage allowance is given and assessed to tax where business journeys have been authorised and properly recorded and (ii) no such allowance is given;

(2) what is his estimate of the gain to the revenue from disallowing as a business expense the cost of acquiring, fuelling and maintaining passenger road vehicles, other than light vans in business livery, assuming that the properly recorded mileage actually driven on business is catered for by a mileage allowance;

(3) whether he will publish in the Official Report his estimate of the increase in taxable (a) corporate and (b) other profits in 1988-89 if the cost of leasing, purchasing and depreciating all passenger road vehicles other than light vans is disallowed as an expense, assuming that (i) a mileage allowance for business use is given where journeys have been authorised and properly recorded and (ii) no such allowance is given.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Insufficient information is available on which to base reliable estimates.

Unpaid Tax

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has on back tax owed by insurance companies to the Inland Revenue.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 4 November 1988]: The Inland Revenue cannot, of course, comment on the tax affairs of any individual company. But in the main, insurance companies receive large amounts of tax credits and suffer income tax at source on their investment income. Their corporation tax liabilities will normally be satisfied by set-off against any repayment due.

Customs and Excise

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what guidelines are set to give consideration to the daily business operations of port operators and to the fast and efficient movement of traffic through ports when freight and passengers are being cleared by the Customs service.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 3 November 1988]: Customs facilities are provided at ports in response to reasonable trade needs and subject to requirements such as the provision of security, office accommodation and adequate facilities for examining cargo. The policy is to approve an appropriate number of locations to balance the need for speedy clearance with the requirement for effective and economic revenue control.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the number, type and cost of customs facilities required by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise which port authorities were requested to provide in 1986 and 1987.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 3 November 1988]: I regret that statistics for the provision of Customs facilities are not kept centrally and can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what criteria have been laid down to ensure that the provision of customs facilities at ports does not become a financial burden to ports and that these facilities are utilised by Customs and Excise in a way and for a length of time which reflects the value of the investment made.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 3 November 1988]: When considering approval of a port, Customs require the operator to provide basic accommodation and cargo examination facilities. At wharves attended only infrequently, the operator must also pay Customs' charges for attendance. The financial implications involved are matters for commercial judgment by the port authorities at the time facilities are sought. Approval of facilities is normally for a period of three years and is renewable.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the £5 million saved from the Customs and Excise budget by the utilisation of direct trade input systems by certain ports and airports will be used to increase Her Majesty's Customs and Excise resources at ports to increase effectiveness of controls and trade facilitation at those ports.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 3 November 1988]: Resource savings flowing from the introduction of direct trader input systems are being used to improve the effectiveness of existing controls and to accommodate increases in the volume of international traffic and thereby facilitate trade.

CIVIL SERVICE

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service in what form information is held within his Department of the amounts reclaimed each year by Her Majesty's embassies and high commissions arising from ministerial visits.

Mr. Luce: Such payments as may be made for amounts reclaimed each year by Her Majesty's embassies and high commissions arising from ministerial visits attributable to this Department are held in aggregate form with our other disbursements to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

SCOTLAND

Juvenile Crime

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list in the Official Report the initiatives being considered to stem the rise in juvenile crime in Scotland; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what additional funding is being made available to stem the rise in juvenile crime in Scotland;

(3) what specific proposals have been discussed with the police to combat the rise in juvenile crime in Scotland;

(4) what specific proposals have been discussed with educational and professional bodies and local authorities to combat the rise in juvenile crime in Scotland;

(5) what new proposals are being considered to combat juvenile housebreaking in Scotland;

(6) what new proposals are being considered to combat juvenile vandalism in Scotland;

(7) what new proposals are being considered to combat juvenile drug-related offences in Scotland;

(8) what new proposals are being considered to combat juvenile crimes of violence in Scotland;

(9) what new proposals are being considered to combat juvenile shoplifting in Scotland;

(10) what new proposals are being considered to combat juvenile drunkenness in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The 1987 figures for juvenile crime in Scotland were given in the statistical bulletin, "Children and Crime, Scotland 1987" which was published by the Scottish Home and Health Department on 25 October. These show a slight rise in the total number of police reports on children accused of crimes and offences in Scotland, from 31,900 in 1986 to 32,200 in 1987. Within the total there were welcome decreases in reports for housebreaking, vandalism and drugs offences, but increases in reports for offences of violence, drunkenness, breaches of the peace and shoplifting. All the agencies concerned, including the police and teachers, have an important part to play in reducing the number of criminal offences committed by children. Responsibility also rests with parents to inculcate a proper sense of social responsibility, and to exercise supervision and control.

As to specific initiatives being taken or promoted centrally, a number of crime prevention measures have been or are being taken forward by the Secretary of State for Scotland's Crime Prevention Committee—the membership of which includes representatives of the police, local authorities, commerce, the trade unions and the education services—aimed both at reducing crime among young people and at promoting a positive sense of social responsibility. In the latter context the second phase of the national crime prevention publicity campaign, which will begin in November, will highlight the many practical measures which individuals, commercial organisations and the public services can adopt to reduce the opportunities for crime and to promote a greater sense of neighbourliness. The rapid growth in the number of neighbourhood watch schemes in Scotland during the last 12 months is a clear indication of greater public awareness of the importance of crime prevention.

The Secretary of State's committee has encouraged the participation of young people in the work of crime prevention panels. A special project for young people was a feature of the seminar for representatives of Scottish crime prevention panels which was held at the Scottish Police college in March this year. In addition there are now 11 junior crime prevention panels in Scotland. The Secretary of State's committee has also worked with the Scottish Education Department and with local education authorities in developing teaching packages for use by school children. There have been recent packages at secondary level to encourage a broader view of the individual's role and responsibilities in society and to address the question of drug education. A package discouraging vandalism will shortly be distributed for use in primary schools.

Crossroads Schemes

Mr. Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received on continued funding of the Crossroads (Scotland) care attendant schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: I have received a considerable number of representations from or on behalf of local Crossroads schemes about transition from the community programme to employment training.

Strong representations were expressed about the ability of local schemes to adapt to the conditions of employment training. Eight have however now signed contracts or are expected to do so shortly, demonstrating that there is no insuperable obstacle to continuation of their invaluable activities with support from that source. Others have obtained support from local authorities or health boards.

The Training Agency remains ready to offer advice and guidance to local schemes wishing to continue to resume activity with support under employment training.

British Rail (Fraud Investigation)

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Strathclyde regarding the progress of police inquiries into allegtions of fraud by senior managers involving recently privatised British Rail contracts; and if he will list the contracts involved.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: British Transport police are investigating allegations of criminal conduct by senior officers of British Rail. The procurator fiscal at Glasgow is being kept advised as to the progress of these inquiries. Given that inquiries are still proceeding it would not be appropriate for further details to be given at this stage.

City Centre Crime

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what resources he has allocated in respect of his initiative to cut down on city centre crime in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: As part of the Government's safer cities programme, we are initiating four projects in Scotland, in Edinburgh city centre, Castlemilk and Easterhouse in Glasgow, and at one other location which will be announced later. The aim of these projects is to draw in the local authorities, the local police and those living and working in the area in order to develop a co-ordinated strategy for tackling local crime. The role of the Government is to bring together those concerned and to provide initial funding in order to enable a co-ordinator to be appointed, a crime profile to be drawn up and an action plan to be prepared. Initially a sum of £200,000 has been set aside in the current financial year for these purposes. This is in addition to the £400,000 already allocated to crime prevention publicity measures.

Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received in respect of proposed changes to the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: More than 2,000 representations were received in response to the 1986 consultation paper on the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976. Following analysis of these representations, a statement will be made in due course.

Placement Requests

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the total number of placement requests made by parents in the last academic year in each regional and divisional education authority; and if he will list these as a percentage of the relevant school rolls.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The provisional numbers of placing requests received between August 1987 and July 1988 for education authority primary, secondary and special schools and these numbers expressed as percentages of the school rolls at September 1987 are given in the table below.

	Requests received	Requests as percentage of rolls

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the number of primary and secondary schools in each regional and divisional education authority which were the subject of placing requests in the last academic year.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested is not available centrally.

YTS Guarantee

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he intends to discuss with local authority representatives the details of the YTS guarantee.

Mr. Lang: I have no such intention at present. I am of course always willing to consider representations on this matter.

Young Persons (Benefits)

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many 16 and 17-year-olds who previously received income support were transferred to bridging allowance after new benefit rules were introduced in September for Scotland.

Mr. Lang: On 4 October, the first date for which figures are available for Scotland, the number of young people in receipt of bridging allowance was 8,081. This figure includes young people previously on income support who subsequently applied for a YTS place and young people who have left a job or a YTS place since 12 September and have applied for a YTS place.

YTS

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many approved YTS places are available in Scotland at the latest date for which the information is available;

(2) how many 16 and 17-year-olds were on YTS on the latest date for which the information was available.

Mr. Lang: At 30 September 1988 there were 62,329 agreed YTS places in Scotland, of which 50,273 were filled and 12,056 unfilled.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the total number of approved YTS places for each of the area manpower boards in Scotland at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Lang: The number of agreed YTS places at 30 September 1988 at Training Agency area office level (which replaced the former area manpower boards) is shown in the following table:

	Places
Ayrshire, Dumfries and Galloway	7,255
Central and Fife	9,358
Glasgow City	9,914
Grampian and Tayside	9,447
Highlands and Islands	3,334
Lanarkshire	6,910
Lothian and Borders	7,695
Renfrew, Dunbarton and Argyll	8,416
Scotland	62,329

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the total number of 16 and 17-year-olds eligible for the YTS for each of the area manpower boards in Scotland and at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Lang: While all 16 and 17-year-olds in Scotland are eligible for YTS, a comprehensive analysis is not available on an area basis.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what is the total number of approved YTS places currently available which have never been filled;

(2) what is the total number of authorised YTS places available which have been unoccupied for more than six months.

Mr. Lang: This information is not available.

Royal Ordnance Centre, Clydebank Business Park

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he is considering taking any action to recover money from the royal ordnance centre in Clydebank business park following the statement that the centre is moving to Chorley in January.

Mr. Lang: I have had the position examined. There is no question of recovery of regional development grant in this case.

Enterprise Zones

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what undertakings firms have to give about their continued presence in an enterprise zone before receiving assistance from the Scottish Development Department.

Mr. Lang: None. Enterprise zone benefits involve the removal of certain tax burdens and, as such, relate to a liability already incurred.

Women Workers (Glasgow)

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make an assessment of (a) full-time and (b) part-time job prospects in the Glasgow area for unskilled women aged 40 to 50 years and 50 to 60 years.

Mr. Lang: Over the year to July 1988 the number of women aged 40 to 60 years claiming unemployment benefit in the Glasgow travel-to-work area fell by over 300. Job prospects in Glasgow for all groups of people depend on the continuing recovery of the Scottish economy.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make an assessment of average earnings per hour for unskilled women in the Glasgow area aged (a) 40 to 50 years and (b) 50 to 60 years.

Mr. Lang: Information in the form requested is not available. The Department of Employment's New Earnings Survey provides estimates for full-time female manual employees (skilled and unskilled) for Strathclyde region as a whole.

Gross average hourly earnings (excluding overtime) of female full-time manual employees Strathclyde region April 1987

Aged	£ per hour
40-49	2·95
50-59	2·85

These estimates are based on small samples. Average earnings will vary with occupation, industry and area within Strathclyde.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of all women in Glasgow work (a) full-time and (b) part-time.

Mr. Lang: In 1984, female full-time and part-time employees in employment whose place of work was in Strathclyde region represented roughly 33 per cent. and 20 per cent. respectively of the estimated female population of the region aged 16 to 59. These percentages include employees working in the area who live elsewhere, and count twice those with two jobs; they exclude the self-employed, and residents who work elsewhere.

The most recent information for City of Glasgow residents is given in tables 12 and 14 of "Census 1981 Scotland Report for Strathclyde Region volume 1", available in the Library of the House.

THE ARTS

Museums and Galleries

52. Mr. Meale: To ask the Minister for the Arts what further evidence he has on the effect of admission charges on visits to museums.

Mr. Luce: Those museums and galleries that have introduced charges have experienced a fall in attendances or expect to do so. All however find that the initial fall is soon reversed when visitors see for themselves the benefits and improvements which the revenue from charges brings, including extended opening hours.

63. Mr. Chapman: To ask the Minister for the Arts what steps his Department is taking to encourage national art galleries and museums to stage more special entry charged exhibitions so as to provide additional revenue for those galleries and museums.

Mr. Luce: The exhibition policies of the national museums and galleries are a matter for their trustees.

The Government are committed to maintaining support for museums and galleries in a way that encourages them to develop greater self-reliance in their development and to broaden their financial base. I have renewed for the coming three-year period my undertaking to the national institutions that they may retain any receipts they earn in addition to those which were assumed at the time of their grant-in-aid allocations. In the present year the national museums and galleries that I sponsor expect their income from non-grant sources to exceed £20 million.

67. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Minister for the Arts what is the increase or decrease in Government spending on museums and galleries since 1979.

Mr. Luce: Funding for museums and galleries from the central Government arts programme was £48·202 million in 1979-80 and £153·576 million in 1988-89.

Inner Cities

54. Mr. Jessel: To ask the Minister for the Arts what assessment he has made of the contribution the arts can make to the redevelopment of the inner cities.

Mr. Luce: I have been impressed with the contribution that many arts projects have made in inner city areas which I have visited. Three recent conferences in Glasgow, Halifax and at Leeds castle in Kent have brought out the importance of the arts in increasing the overall attractiveness of an area, which in turn encourages new economic development. I will continue to encourage local business support for such projects in all possible ways.

Bradford

55. Mr. Madden: To ask the Minister for the Arts when he next intends to visit arts projects in Bradford.

Mr. Luce: I last visited Bradford in June this year. I hope to go again, but not immediately.

Arts Council

56. Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Minister for the Arts when he last met the chairman of the Arts Council; and what was discussed.

64. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister for the Arts when he last met the chairman of the Arts Council; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Luce: I last met the chairman of the Arts Council on 11 July. We discussed matters of mutual interest.

Alhambra Theatre, Bradford

57. Mr. Wall: To ask the Minister for the Arts when he last visited the Alhambra theatre in Bradford.

Mr. Luce: I last paid an informal visit to the Alhambra threatre in Bradford on the 30 June 1988.

Libraries

58. Mr. Burns: To ask the Minister for the Arts whether he has drawn any conclusions from his public consultations on the future of the library system.

Mr. Luce: The analysis of the responses is nearly completed. I wish to take full account of the views expressed to me before announcing the action which I propose to take.

Business Sponsors

59. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Minister for the Arts how many new business sponsors have been attracted to the arts in the last 12 months.

Mr. Luce: Figures for all new sponsors are not available. However, latest figures for new sponsorship under the Government's business sponsorship incentive scheme show that 220 businesses all over the country supported the arts for the first time in the last 12 months.

Public Lending Right Scheme

60. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister for the Arts how many authors were registered under the public lending right scheme in the last financial year.

Mr. Luce: The total number of authors registered at February 1988 was 14,635. The number of new registrations in that financial year was 1,687.

Community Photographic Workshops

61. Mr. Boyes: To ask the Minister for the Arts what information he has on the number of community photographic workshops in England and Wales.

Mr. Luce: Information of this kind is not held centrally. It is estimated that there are some 100 community photographic workshops nationally.

Tate Gallery (Liverpool)

62. Mr. Wareing: To ask the Minister for the Arts what information he has on the level of staffing of the Tate gallery in the north.

Mr. Luce: There are 47 staff at the Tate gallery, Liverpool of whom 19 are warders. The gallery also employs 10 casual staff as gallery attendants.

Libraries (Green Paper)

65. Mr. Haynes: To ask the Minister for the Arts when he expects to publish his response to public consultation on his Green Paper on libraries.

Mr. Luce: I shall tell the House what action I propose to take as soon as possible.

Opera Companies

66. Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Minister for the Arts what action he is taking to promote touring by opera companies throughout the United Kingdom.

Mr. Luce: I allocated £1·5 million in extra funds to the Arts Council in 1988-89 to promote touring in all art forms. The results are already evident, and include an extra seven weeks performance by touring opera companies. I expect this level of performances to be maintained.

Government Spending

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Minister for the Arts (1) if he will publish a table showing central Government expenditure on the arts by standard planning region for the years 1980-81 and 1987-88 inclusive on (a) national museums and (b) performing arts, expressed in (i) cash terms and (ii) per capita;

(2) if he will publish a table showing central Government total expenditure for the arts by standard planning region for the years 1980-81 and 1987-88 inclusive (a) in cash terms and (b) per capita.

Mr. Luce: Central Government expenditure on the arts is not planned on a regional basis but on a national one, and is monitored similarly. The information is therefore not available but I would refer the hon. Member to the Chief Secretary's written answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Boothferry (Mr. Davis) at column 120.

Galleries

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Minister for the Arts what evidence he has that the trustees of (a) the National gallery, (b) the Tate gallery and (c) the National Portrait gallery have encountered difficulties, arising out of their status and constitution, in relation to their buildings or to major building and maintenance contracts.

Mr. Luce: Unlike the majority of national museums and galleries, the governing trustees of these three galleries do not have a single corporate identity but are groups of individual trustees. This complicates certain contractual arrangements which the galleries may wish to enter into where it would be more usual to refer to the contracting party as a single corporate body. The trustees of all three galleries have requested that they be granted corporate status and I have indicated my intention to introduce legislation to achieve this.

Collections (Disposal)

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Minister for the Arts whether he will publish a table itemising, for each national museum and gallery, the objects from their collections which have been disposed of, in each of the last five years, by (a) sale, (b) exchange or (c) gift, under the categories of (i) duplication, (ii) unsuitability for retention and disposability without detriment to the interests of students or other members of the public, (iii) transfer to another national museum or gallery and (iv) lack of usefulness by reason of damage, physical deterioration or infestation by destructive organisms.

Mr. Luce: This information is not held centrally and could not be gathered without disproportionate cost.

Incentive Funding

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Minister for the Arts what progress has been made with his incentive funding schemes.

Mr. Luce: I am pleased with progress so far. The Arts Council has received 261 applications for its scheme and has made its first award. I expect a commitment of £12·5 million over the three years 1988-89 to 1990-91. My scheme for public libraries has produced 13 awards, totalling £300,000. Incentive schemes are also under way for the museums, British Film Institute, Crafts Council and National Film and Television School.

EMPLOYMENT

YTS

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish the average amount of compensation paid in 1987 to (a) those young people who have suffered major injuries on YTS and (b) the families of those young people who have had a fatal accident on YTS.

Mr. Cope: I regret that the information is not available in the precise form requested and can only be obtained at a disproportionate cost. The total amount of benefit of £583,393 paid by the Training Agency's industrial injuries scheme from 1 January 1987 to 31 December 1987 includes payments made on minor injuries. Some of this sum shown relates to continuing benefits payable to trainees who were injured in previous years. Assessment of an average amount of benefit by period would therefore be misleading.

In line with the Department of Social Security's statutory industrial injuries scheme regulations, which the Training Agency must mirror, four families claimed and received an industrial death grant of £78 and one family claimed and received an industrial death grant of £52.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he intends to discuss with local authority representatives the details of the YTS guarantee in Wales and each of the standard regions.

Mr. Cope: My right hon. Friend will be meeting the local authority associations later this month to discuss training matters.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many approved YTS places are available in Wales and each of the standard economic regions at the latest date for which the information is available.

Mr. Cope: I regret that the information is not available for the standard regions. However, figures for the number of agreed YTS places for Wales and the Training Agency regions which were unfilled on 30 September 1988, the latest date for which information is available, are provided in the table below:

	Numbers
Wales	3,500
Northern	6,700
North West	13,900
Yorkshire and Humberside	8,200
West Midlands	19,900
East Midlands and Eastern	13,600
South West	10,900
London	11,300
South East	16,800

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many 16 and 17-year-olds are on YTS in Wales in each of the standard economic regions for the latest date for which the information is available.

Mr. Cope: Figures for all trainees on YTS training in Wales and in each of the Training Agency regions on 30 September 1988, the latest date for which information is available, are provided below:

West Midlands	51,700
East Midlands and Eastern	52,300
South West	34,400
London	22,100
South East	45,800

These figures include a small proportion of trainees who have passed their 18th birthday.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the total number of 16 and 17-year-olds on the YTS or equivalent youth programme in each of the years 1979 to 1988 inclusive for Wales and each of the standard English regions.

Mr. Cope: Figures for trainees on YTS training in Wales and in each of the Training Agency regions of England for the financial years 1985-86 to 1987-88 are given in the table below. Figures for earlier years are not readily available.

	1985-86	1986-87	1987-88
Wales	16,000	18,700	22,200
Northern	18,100	22,700	27,900
North West	39,400	46,100	58,900
Yorkshire and Humberside	28,200	31,300	42,100
West Midlands	54,900	39,100	46,900
East Midlands		34,700	45,700
South West	20,800	23,000	30,000
London	15,800	16,500	20,100
South East	41,100	31,800	41,000

Note: The figures include a small proportion of trainees who have passed their 18th birthday.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the total number of 16 and 17-year-olds on the YTS or equivalent youth programmes in each of the years 1979 to 1988, inclusive.

Mr. Cope: Average figures for the number of trainees in training for the financial years 1979-80 to 1987-88 inclusive are given in the table:

Year	Trainees
1979-80	[1]77,300
1980-81	[1]127,500
1981-82	[1]188,400
1982-83	[1]256,800
1983-84	[2]242,300
1984-85	[3]267,000
1985-86	[3]264,000
1986-87	[3,4]296,300
1987-88	[3]376,000

[1] Figures relate to the Youth Opportunities Programme (YOP).
[2] This figure includes 81,300 trainees on YOP and 161,000 on YTS.
[3] Figures relate to YTS.
[4] Two year YTS commenced in April 1986.
Note: The figures include a small proportion of trainees who have passed their 18th birthday.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the total expenditure in YTS in Scotland, Wales and each of the standard regions of England for 1986, 1987 and the estimated expenditure for 1988, 1989 and 1990.

Mr. Cope: A regional breakdown is not available on a consistent basis because so many schemes are national or cross regional boundaries. Figures for Great Britain for financial years published in the 1988 public expenditure White Paper are:

£ (million)	Year
847	1986-87
1,006 (estimated outturn)	1987-88
1,179 (plans)	1988-89
1,189 (plans)	1989-90
1,156 (plans)	1990-91

Public expenditure revised figures will be published in the 1989 public expenditure White Paper.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what is the total number of authorised YTS places available which have been unoccupied for more than six months in Wales and each of the standard regions;

(2) what is the total number of approved YTS places currently available which have never been filled in Wales and each of the standard regions.

Mr. Cope: I regret that this information is not available and could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will outline the methods being used to provide publicly available information on 16 and 17-year-olds who remain unemployed after the ending of the bridging allowance payments or extended child benefit.

Mr. Cope: Young people are not required to report what they are doing once bridging allowance payments or extended child benefit cease. Information on the expected supply and demand for YTS places the number of unfilled YTS places and the numbers of people receiving bridging allowance is publicly available from my Department.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) when the YTS guarantee will be met for every 16 and 17-year-old summer school leaver who did not enter full-time education or permanent employment for Scotland;

(2) when the YTS guarantee will be met for every 16 and 17-year-old summer school leaver who did not enter full-time education, or permanent employment, for Wales and each of the standard regions.

Mr. Cope: The payment of child benefit has been extended to the end of December in respect of young people who left school at the end of the 1988 summer term and who have applied for a YTS place. The Government have guaranteed the offer of a YTS place before the end of the child benefit extension period to all those 16 and 17-year-old who apply for one and who are not in full-time education or employment. This guarantee applies in all parts of Great Britain.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many 16 and 17-year-olds who previously received income support were transferred to bridging allowance after the new benefit rules were introduced in September for Wales and each of the standard regions.

Mr. Cope: On 4 October, the first date for which figures are available, the number of people in receipt of bridging allowance in Wales and each of the standard regions was:

	People
London and South East	4,411
South West	1,452
West Midlands	4,249
East Midlands	2,954
Yorkshire and Humberside	4,300
North West	6,876
Northern	2,861
Total	29,426

These figures relate to young people previously in income support who subsequently applied for a YTS place, and young people who have left a job or a YTS place since 12 September and have applied for a YTS place.

Disabled People

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when his Department intends to publish its review of disabled people's employment services announced in March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: The review is now well advanced and will be completed as quickly as possible although I am unable to give a precise date for its completion.

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will introduce legislation to strengthen the Disabled Persons Employment Act 1944; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: I have no current proposals to introduce legislation to strengthen the Disabled Persons (Employment) Act 1944.

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the consultations he has had with organisations of and for disabled people as part of his review of disabled people's employment services.

Mr. Lee: The review is being undertaken on the basis of information and advice available already to my Department. This includes in particular the study of the Tomlinson principles completed by the National Advisory Council on employment of disabled people; and the conclusions of the Public Accounts Committee in its report on employment assistance to disabled adults published on 14 April 1988; and also views and information derived from the contacts maintained between my Department and those people and organisations with a particular interest in, or responsibility for, the employment of people with disabilities.

Training

Mr. Haynes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he intends to publish his White Paper on training; and whether it will contain any matters which will bring about changes in the criteria and operation of employment training.

Mr. Fowler: I intend to publish my White Paper before the end of the year. I have no current plans to include in it any announcement of changes to the criteria or operation of employment training.

HEALTH

Geriatric Beds

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will state the number of geriatric beds in England in the National Health Service and as a percentage of total beds for 1970, 1979, 1984 and 1988.

Mrs. Currie: The latest information centrally available is given in the table. As from 1 April 1987 the data available centrally on beds are categorised by the type of ward rather than specialty of the consultant. Wards for elderly patients are included. These data for 1987-88 are not yet available.

Average daily number of available Geriatric beds, National Health Service hospitals, England.

Year	Average daily available beds, Geriatric specialty	Average daily available beds, all specialties	Geriatric beds as a percentage of total beds
[1]1970	37,869	423,621	8·94
1979	55,139	361,670	15·25
1984	55,571	334,513	16·61
1986	54,588	315,714	17·29

[1] Prior to 1972, some beds for geriatric patients would have been shown under another specialty, chronic sick.

NHS (Expenditure)

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will state the expenditure on the National Health Service as a percentage of gross domestic product for the years 1960, 1970, 1979, 1983, 1985 and 1988;

(2) if he will state the total National Health Service expenditure for 1960, 1970, 1979, 1983, 1985 and 1988.

Mr. Mellor: The table shows gross expenditure on the NHS in cash terms and as a percentage of GDP for the stated years. Figures for 1960 and 1970 have been taken from the Royal Commission on the National Health Service. Figures for later years are taken from Departmental records which are kept on a financial year basis. Data for 1988-89 are not yet available.

Gross expenditure on the NHS

Year	Expenditure, £ million	Percentage of GDP
1960	861	3·8
1970	2,024	4·7
1979-80	9,501	4·6
1983-84	16,050	5·2
1985-86	18,277	5·1

Doctors (Premature Retirements)

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will state the number of premature retirements of National Health Service doctors for 1960, 1970, 1979, 1984 and 1988.

Mr. Mellor: We hold only central records of National Health Service staff premature retirements from 1984. Records held since that date show premature retirements by staff group rather than grade or title, and hospital doctors' premature retirements are recorded under the heading "medical and dental" without specific identification.

The numbers of premature retirements for medical and dental staff in England for the financial years since 1984 are as follows:

Financial Year	No. of Premature Retirements
1984-85	40
1985-86	34
1986-87	60
1987-88	60
[1]1988-89	38

[1] First 6 months.

NHS (Staff Numbers)

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will state the number of persons directly employed as staff in the National Health Service for the whole of the United Kingdom, at the latest available date.

Mr. Mellor: National Health Service directly employed staff in post in England at 30 September 1987 totalled 798,800 whole-time equivalents. Figures for the rest of the United Kingdom are a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and for Northern Ireland.

Source: DHSS Annual censuses of NHS Medical and Non Medical manpower.

Note:
(2) Nursing and Midwifery agency staff and staff employed by other statutory authorities within the National Health Service.

Operating Department Assistants

Mr. Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received on the pay and career structure of operating department assistants; and what action he intends to take.

Mr. Mellor: The pay and career structure of operating department assistants are for negotiation in the professional and technical staffs B Whitley council. A settlement was reached on 19 October. Before that we had received numerous letters from hon. and right hon. Members and individual operating department assistants. I understand that the management side has set up a working party to consider reports of difficulties within staff groups covered by negotiating committee E which includes operating department assistants.

Aerosols

Mr. Fry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the danger to health of inhaling from aerosols, and what action he proposes to take to deter young people from indulging in this potentially fatal practice.

Mrs. Currie: The Government have commissioned a study at St. George's hospital medical school to investigate the effects of solvent abuse on secondary school children with particular attention to neuro-psychological consequences. A report will be available shortly.

In addition to the range of measures which have been taken directly in line with the Government's policy of education and persuasion we are currently funding drug education co-ordinators in every local education authority, whose work includes activities aimed at preventing solvent misuse.

Consumer Protection (NHS Liability)

Mrs. Rosie Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the liability of the National Health Service under the Consumer Protection Act 1987, as advised to the service by his Department, notice (88)3, will entail significant cost.

Mrs. Currie: The full impact can be assessed only as case law evolves. It is, however, clear that the extent of required change will vary from authority to authority and in some cases may be significant.

Product Licences

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether his Department has ever granted a product licence (parallel import) in respect of a medicine for which a United Kingdom application for a product licence had been refused on the advice of the Committee on Safety of Medicines.

Mr. Mellor: A product licence (parallel import) may be granted only where there is an equivalent product covered by a United Kingdom licence.

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health to what extent batch integrity is preserved for medicines that are the subject of product licences (parallel imports) in order to facilitate a recall in the event of a manufacturing defect being identified by the foreign manufacturer.

Mr. Mellor: Medicine labels must carry a batch reference and all holders of product and wholesale dealers' licences must keep adequate records to facilitate the withdrawal or recall of a product. A further requirement on a parallel import licence holder is that he must ensure that any batch reference shown on the labelling of the product at the time when it came into his possession shall be readily discernible when the product is sold or supplied by him.

Deficiencies in the records or failure to meet these licence requirements could lead to the suspension or revocation of the licence.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will update to September 1987 the information on waiting lists contained in his reply to the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) on 29 February, Official Report,

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is given in the table.

The Eastman Dental Hospital[4]	..	169	n/a	n/a

[1]The waiting list for Milton Keynes was formerly held by Aylesbury Vale Health Authority but was taken over by Milton Keynes Health Authority in 1984 following the development of Milton Keynes General Hospital. The table shows a comparable reduction in the Aylesbury

Vale figures.
[2]The waiting list figures for March 1987 are affected by the transfer of Black Notley Hospital from the North East Essex District to Mid Essex DHA on 1 April 1986.
[3]Five hospitals were transferred from North Birmingham DHA to South East Staffordshire DHA in 1986.
[4]In September 1982 the data for The Eastman Dental Hospital was collected by another unit.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if, in future, he will include national tables in the summary volume of hospital in-patient waiting lists; and if he will place such tables relating to September 1987 in the Library.

Mr. Mellor: National figures are published in statistical bulletins. The bulletin for September 1987 was published on 27 April 1988 and that for March 1988 on 26 October 1988. Copies were placed in the Library.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library the national, regional and district summaries for the hospital in-patient waiting list for March 1988.

Mr. Mellor: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 3 November at column 753.

Griffiths Report

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what consultations he has had with (a) voluntary organisations and (b) local authorities when formulating his Department's response to the Griffiths report.

Mr. Mellor: We have not held any formal consultations, but we are taking careful account of responses to the report from a number of local authorities and voluntary bodies in framing our own proposals.

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received since July on the implementation of the Griffiths report.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 4 November 1988]: We have received a further 40 representations in this period.

Pharmacies

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he has any plans to allow the location of pharmacies to be guided by customer demand; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he has any plans to allow more competition between pharmacies;

(3) if he has any plans to review the operation of the guidelines contained in his Department's circular HC (FP) (87) 2 regarding the location of pharmacies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We have no plans at present to change the arrangements which we introduced last year for controlling the inclusion of pharmacies in National Health Service pharmaceutical lists. These are intended to provide a means of matching the number of NHS pharmacies with local needs. However we are satisfied that it would be helpful to offer some additional advice to family practitioner committees on the way in which the arrangements are intended to operate. Consultations are being held with interested parties and we hope to issue additional guidance before Christmas.

Audiology

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give the most recent figures for vacancy rates by grade and by region in audiology within the National Health Service; what action he proposes to take in the event of a significant shortfall; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: I presume the hon. Member refers to physiological measurement technicians (audiology). Information on vacancy rates is not collected centrally. It is for health authorities to decide what action to take in the event of a shortfall in numbers.

OPCS (Costs)

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has any changes to announce to the running cost limit for the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys for 1988-89.

Mrs. Currie: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the gross running cost limit for OPCS (Class XX Vote 16) will be increased by £44,000 from £38,052,000 to £38,096,000 reflecting increased expenditure by OPCS on services provided to the Department of Economic Development (Northern Ireland) and the Department of Health (Northern Ireland). The Northern Ireland departmental gross running costs limit will be correspondingly reduced by £44,000. There is no overall increase in running costs as a result of these changes. The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland will make an announcement in due course.

NHS Expenditure

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the number of people entitled to help with National Health Service costs nationally; what is the total expenditure on National Health Service benefits nationally; how many qualify for (a) full help, that is free treatment and (b) partial help towards these costs; and of those receiving full help, how many are entitled on low income grounds, other than income support or family credit claimants, rather than on age, illness or pregnancy grounds, giving figures for the latest quarter for which they are available and for the corresponding quarter in 1987.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 3 November 1988]: The information which is available is as follows:

We estimate that over 18 million people in England are automatically entitled to free dental treatment, and around 27 million people to free prescriptions. We are unable to estimate the numbers entitled to claim free dental treatment and prescriptions or some help with the cost of dental treatment because of their low income.

The cost of providing free or reduced cost dental treatment in 1987-88 was £73·5 million. We estimate that the cost of providing free prescriptions in the same year was over £500 million. Of the 13·9 million courses of dental treatment provided free of charge in 1986-87 (the latest year for which figures relating to dental treatment are available) 121,000 were provided to people who claimed help on low-income grounds. A total of 250 million prescriptions were dispensed free of charge by pharmacists over the same period. Of these, 37 million prescriptions were dispensed to people who either claim help on low-income grounds or were receiving supplementary or family income supplement but it is not possible to distinguish between the categories. For 1987-88, the figures are 264 million and 40 million prescriptions respectively.

Benzodiazepines

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking or contemplating to reduce the number of people currently taking benzodiazepines; and what advice is available to doctors about the best methods of withdrawing from them.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 4 November 1988]: It is the responsibility of individual doctors to ensure that they prescribe appropriately for their patients. We welcome the guidance to doctors issued recently by the Royal College of General Practitioners, and the general medical services committee of the British Medical Association. The chief medical officer will shortly meet the leaders of the medical profession to discuss benzodiazepine prescribing and we will consider what further action may be needed after that meeting.

Advice to doctors on the withdrawal of patients from benzodiazepines was included in the Department's "Guidelines of Good Clinical Practice in the Treatment of Drug Misuse" issued to all doctors in 1984. Guidance is also given in the British National Formulary supplied free to all doctors twice yearly by the Department. The Committee on Safety of Medicines reinforced prescribing advice in "Current Problems No. 21" issued in January 1988. This advised that benzodiazepines should be prescribed for short-term use only for anxiety and insomnia and not for depression and also advised about withdrawal symptoms. All doctors should therefore have the basic information they need to help patients withdraw gradually under medical supervision.

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his estimate of the number of people in Great Britain and Northern Ireland currently taking benzodiazepine tranquillisers and sleeping tablets on a daily basis.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 4 November 1988]: We do not collect information centrally about patients and their drugs. I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller) on 31 October at column 487.

Patient Treatment

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will give for each district health authority the number of non-resident, non-emergency patients who have failed to pay for their treatment in each year since 1980, showing the total cost to the National Health Service;

(2) if he will give for each health authority for each year since 1980 (a) the total cost of treating non-resident, non-emergency patients and (b) the amount paid by non-resident, non-emergency patients.

Mr. Mellor: Under the National Health Service (Charges to Overseas Visitors) Regulations, patients not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom have to pay for hospital treatment unless they are specifically exempted. One exemption applies to treatment in a hospital accident and emergency department. We do not collect the precise information requested, but the table sets out such information, for England, as is derivable from the health authority annual accounts about income and bad debts relating to overseas visitors who are liable to pay.

Income from overseas visitors (under section 121 of the NHS Act 1977)

1982-83	381
1983-84	1,598
1984-85	1,810
1985-86	2,2276
1986-87	1,809

Bad debts and claims abandoned (ie amounts written off) section 121 of the NHS Act 1977

	Number of cases	£000
1985-86	445	168
1986-87	607	343

Notes to the table:

1. Charges under section 121 of the Act did not come into force until 1 October 1982 and separate write-off figures were not collected prior to 1985-86.
2. The income figures are shown net of any sums written off in the relevant year (including those due from earlier years).
3. Comparable figures for 1987-88 are not as yet available.
4. The table relates only to NHS charged patients and excludes overseas visitors treated as private patients.

TRANSPORT

Hazardous Material

Dr. Dafydd Elis Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what studies have been undertaken or commissioned by his Department into the development of new transfrontier control mechanisms for dangerous and radioactive materials with the advent of the single European market in 1992.

Mr. Portillo: The aim in 1992 will be to reduce frontier controls, not increase them. The safety regulations which cover the movement of dangerous and radioactive materials do not depend on frontier checks.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to meet the National Farmers Union to discuss the route of a proposed high speed railway line to the Channel tunnel and its implications for agriculture.

Mr. Portillo: No. It is for the British Railways Board, in conjunction with any private sector partners who may put themselves forward, to plan the route of a new high speed railway line, taking account of all relevant factors. I understand, however, that the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is undertaking a broad examination of the effects of BR's proposals on agriculture.

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has any plans to modify the financial constraints on British Rail to take account of the environmental impact of the proposed high speed rail link to the Channel tunnel.

Mr. Portillo: No. I do not expect the British Railways Board to put forward any proposals for a new line which do not earn a commercial return. Nevertheless, I do expect the board to be extremely sensitive to environmental concerns in developing a proposal which meets this criterion.

London Underground (Fires)

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many sites of fires on London Underground escalators have been discovered in investigations following the King's Cross fire.

Mr. Portillo: Since the King's Cross fire, seven fires in escalators of London Underground have been reported. The discovery of the site of a previous fire is not a statutorily reportable incident and none has been discovered during inspections by the Railway Inspectorate.

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many fires on London Underground escalators have been reported in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Portillo: LUL has reported the following numbers of fires during the last 10 years which occurred on escalators below ground and caused an interruption of more than 30 minutes to the service:

Up to 30 September

1978	0

East London River Crossing

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what legal action is being taken against him by the London borough of Greenwich over the east London river crossing; what effect it is likely to have on the timetable of the road scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: An application has been made to the High Court to quash the orders. The effect on the timetable would depend on the outcome of the proceedings.

Air Traffic Control

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to diminish air traffic control delays in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Bottomley: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has asked the Civil Aviation Authority, which is jointly responsible with the Ministry of Defence through the National Air Traffic Services for the provision of en route air traffic control services in United Kingdom, for advice by the end of this month on strategies for making good use of airspace until the full benefits of the authority's reorganisation of the London terminal control area become available in 1995.

The United Kingdom has made a series of proposals for improving the planning, co-ordination and operation of air traffic control services in Europe. These have received wide support from the members of Eurocontrol and at a meeting last month of Transport Ministers from 22 European countries.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the projected manpower needs, and skills shortages, affecting air traffic controllers in the next five years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This is a matter for the Civil Aviation Authority and the management of the National Air Traffic Services.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the average lengths of delays to (a) short-haul and (b) long-haul services caused by air traffic control problems at British airports.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The hon. Member could ask the chairman of the Civil Aviation Authority. The authority has done some analysis of air traffic delays in recent years in collaboration with other European air traffic control authorities.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures he is taking to ensure that problems caused by delays in air traffic control are solved before 1989's peak holiday season.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is today chairing a conference of representatives of the Civil Aviation Authority and the aviation industry to analyse the congestion problems of the summer and to discuss all possible ways of improving matters in 1989 and in the years beyond.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what have been the costs to British air carriers incurred by air traffic control delays in each of the last five years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This information is not readily available.

"Road Safety: The Next Steps"

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if his Department has prepared a schedule for the implementation of the recommendations affecting the national roads programme made in the Government's policy document, "Road Safety: The Next Steps."

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The value attached to human life in the economic assessment of schemes has been increased. The emphasis given to safety audits and assessments is being enhanced.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage increase in resources spent on low-cost schemes arising from accident investigation and prevention work will be necessary to implement more work of this kind on trunk roads, as recommended by the Government's policy document, "Road Safety: The Next Steps."

Mr. Peter Bottomley: "Road Safety: The Next Steps" did not make a specific recommendation on the number of low cost AIP schemes.

Light Dues

Sir David Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has for reforming the system of light dues.

Mr. Channon: I am today publishing the report of a working party which recommends changes in the existing light dues regulations. The report and its recommendations should be seen in the context of the Government's overall policy that, so far as is practicable, the user should meet the costs of the aids to navigation provided by the general lighthouse authorities. I believe that the reform of the light dues system is long overdue.It has remained substantially unaltered since 1898 and inevitably fails to reflect the changes in the patterns of seaborne trade and in ship design in the intervening years. I see the recommendations of the working party as a balanced set of proposals which, after many years of prolonged debate, would remove some of the more obvious anomalies.

The main recommendations in the report are that deck cargo charges should no longer be levied, that a standard single tariff should be adopted for both home and foreign trade ships based on a maximum of nine chargeable voyages a year (in place of the present limits of seven foreign trade voyages and 14 home trade voyages); and that gross tonnage should replace net tonnage as the basis of the charge. I am inviting comments from the industry and others concerned on the recommendations of the working party. My present view, however, is that both the main recommendations and the majority of the recommendations of less significance in the report should be implemented and brought into effect from 1 April 1989. Since the main changes proposed would have widely varying effects on individual ships, I am inviting views on whether there should be a phased transition over a three-year period. In addition, shipowners would have the option to pay light dues on no more than two voyages a month. I also hope to be able to introduce a general reduction in light dues simultaneously with these reforms.

In addition, I am inviting comments on the possibility of increasing the at present limited contribution which Ro-Ro ferries make towards light dues.

Besides these actions flowing from the report of the working party, I am inviting the British Ports Federation to undertake a study on the feasibility of charging light dues to pleasure craft.

Unlicensed Vehicles

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what information he has regarding the number of unlicensed vehicles reported in the London borough of Newham in the past three years; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if, pursuant to his answer of 1 November he will give details of the form in which records are kept of unlicensed vehicles in London; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Reports of vehicle excise duty evasion in London are followed up by the Department's London enforcement office. LEO keeps records of total reports submitted by the Metropolitan police, the City of London police and the London traffic area office. There is no useful VED enforcement purpose served in associating the regular figures of reports with London borough areas. The only figures for boroughs are those arising from the 1988 London campaign. I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 8 July, at column 143.

The only record of unlicensed vehicles is within the DVLC register of vehicles and keepers. Unlicensed vehicles are those off the road permanently or temporarily and those in dealers' hands, as well as those evading VED. Analysis by local government area serves no VED enforcement purpose. No record exists for Newham.

ENVIRONMENT

Waste (Recycling)

Mr. Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Enironment if he will make a statement on the provision of direct financial support to local authorities to set up the efficient collection and recycling of all domestic and industrial waste.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: In cases where the most efficient method of disposal for certain types of refuse is by recycling or reclamation, it is up to local authorities to allocate the appropriate resources and to work with the relevant sectors of industry to ensure suitable uses for recycled and reclaimed material. The Government believe that local authority resources are sufficient to enable them to carry out their statutory duties, inlcluding refuse disposal.

County Councils

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Enironment if he will state the number of persons and whole-time equivalents employed by each county council for March 1979, March 1988 and projected March 1989; and if he will also give the overall totals for the United Kingdom for each of these years.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information is as follows:

Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland.

Global Sustainable Development

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how his Department's policies, programmes and expenditure are being redirected towards global sustainable development.

Mr. Ridley: The Government's response to the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development, issued by my Department in July, explained what we are doing to promote the concept of sustainable development. As the Prime Minister's foreword pointed out, all relevant Departments of State have been invited to examine their policies in the light of the World Commission's recommendations. Global issues require action by the international community as a whole and my Department, in collaboration with others, is taking a leading role in international organisations such as the United Nations and OECD to ensure that sustainable development is integrated into all their activities.

Housing Investment Programmes

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report a list of the housing investment programme allocations for each housing authority in (a) 1979-80 and (b) 1988-89 in constant terms.

Mr. Trippier: Allocations for 1979-80 at 1988-89 prices and the latest allocations for 1988-89 are as follows. The 1988-89 figures are provisional since additional sums—principally for Estate Action schemes—are yet to be allocated.

Since 1981-82, local authorities have been able to supplement their allocations by expenditure financed from capital receipts. Nationally over half of local authorities' capital expenditure in 1988-89 is expected to be financed in this way.

Development Corporations

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he intends to increase the public funds available to the Tyne and Wear development corporation and the Teesside development corporation.

Mr. Trippier: Yes. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State proposes to increase this year's allocations to Tyne and Wear development corporation by £3 million and to Teesside development corporation by £1 million. The Autumn statement indicated that more money would be made available to UDCs over the next three years and both TWDC and TDC will share in this increase.

Mortgage Advances

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, whether, further to his written reply dated 27 July concerning mortgage advances—Official Report, column 757—he will provide separate figures for the banks and insurance companies, respectively, from 1983 together with his estimate of the value of the average mortgage in each case.

Mr. Trippier: The figures requested are shown in the table.

Council House Sales

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many applicants have been waiting for more than two months to exercise their right to buy in each of the London boroughs.

Mr. Trippier: Many tenants exercising the right to buy in London experience considerable delays. The Department does not collect information in the form requested, but the most recent survey of all London boroughs showed that, at the end of March, 19 had over 100 cases where an offer notice had not been served within the statutory time limit, and four had over 1,000 such cases. The Housing Bill gives tenants whose landlords delay sales power to require the rent paid during the delay to be set against the purchase price.

Disabled People

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether work is being carried out to extend part M (Access and facilities for disabled people) of the buildings regulations to extensions and alterations of existing buildings; and if he will make a statement;

(2) when part M of building regulations will be extended to all floors of new buildings used by the public.

Mr. Trippier: The Building (Disabled People) Regulations 1987 require the provision of reasonable access and other facilities for disabled people in certain categories of new buildings. The regulations have been in force for almost 12 months, and we shall now be considering how effectively they are operating in practice. This will provide a firm basis for the development of proposals to extend the requirements to other non-domestic buildings. Officials are also looking into the practical problems involved in applying the requirements to extensions and alterations of existing buildings. I hope that we shall be in a position to consult on detailed proposals during the course of next year.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a list of the listed buildings in Kent which lie within (a) 100, (b) 750 or (c) 1,500 m. of the proposed routes 1 and 2 submitted by British Rail for the high speed rail link to the Channel tunnel.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have no plans to do so. I understand that an environmental assessment of these and other possible routes undertaken by consultants for British Rail will include amongst other things their effect upon listed buildings.

Repossessions

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the total number of repossessions by building societies since May 1979.

Mr. Trippier: Figures are not available precisely for the period requested. There were 104,330 building society repossessions between 1 January 1979 and 30 June 1988.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give his estimate of the likely number of repossessions by building societies during 1988.

Mr. Trippier: I am not in a position to forecast the number of repossessions by building societies during 1988. However, the buoyancy of the economy, the growth in real earnings and the continuing fall in the numbers of people unemployed suggest that there may not be a marked reversal of the current downward trend in the second half of the year.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the latest available figure for the number of repossessions by building societies so far in 1988; and if he will give the comparable figure for 1984.

Mr. Trippier: In the first half of 1988 there were 9,770 repossessions by building societies. In the first half of 1984 there were 5,120 repossessions.

Housing Finance

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing, by standard planning regions, for the years 1980-81 to 1986-87, information on central Government support to the private sector for housing, expressed in (a) cash terms, (b) per capita expenditure and (c) a current and capital split, with a separation by region for the above years, by (i) housing associations new provision for rent, (ii) low cost home ownership and (iii) renovations and clearance by the private sector.

Mr. Trippier: The information requested is as follows.

The table gives figures for entitlement to Exchequer support for local authority grants towards renovation and clearance by the private sector, by DOE housing region. Figures for 1980-81 are not available by region. Figures in respect of housing association new provision for rent and low cost home ownership are not available in the form requested.

Notes:
(1) DOE housing regions are similar to standard regions except that: the northern region excludes Cumbria, which is included in the north-west; Buckinghamshire, Bedfordshire, Hertfordshire and Essex are included in the eastern region (which is otherwise the same as East Anglia); and Greater London is a separate region.
(2) Expenditure figures represent Exchequer contributions paid to local authorities towards the cost of loan charges on borrowing (normally over a 20-year period) undertaken to provide capital grants to the private sector. The expenditure included is: home improvement grants; homes insulation scheme grants; housing defects reinstatement grants; slum clearance subsidy; and expenditure on environmental works in housing action areas and general improvement areas.
(3) Per capita figures are based on the Registrar General's estimates of resident population as at 30 June in each year.

Water Pollution

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the presence of trichloromethane in drinking water sources in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: The Government have established as a national standard a three-monthly average of 100 microgram per litre of trihalomethanes containing chlorine. Trichloromethane is one of the commonest trihalomethanes. Fourteen supplies currently exceed that standard but steps are in hand to achieve compliance with the standard.

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take steps to ensure that drinking water complies with the World Health Organisation 1984 guidelines on permissible nitrate levels.

Mr. Moynihan: The Government's policy is to comply with the nitrate standard in the EC directive relating to the quality of water intended for human consumption, which is broadly comparable with the WHO 1984 guideline.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 31 October, what powers the National Rivers Authority will have to require improvement to surface, underground and coastal waters, once it has sampled effluent and other matters discharged into those waters.

Mr. Moynihan: The consent of the National Rivers Authority will be required for all discharges to surface, underground and coastal waters. The authority will be able to review, and vary or revoke, conditions attached to such consents for the purposes of maintaining or improving water quality and to take appropriate enforcement action where these are not observed. It will also have powers in relation to the establishment and operation of protection zones; for taking precautions for the avoidance of pollution risks; and to undertake emergency works for forestalling or remedying pollution.

Mr. Boyes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he wrote to the 10 water authorities in England and Wales asking for the cost of rectifying the problem of polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons in drinking water supplies; and what response he has had.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 4 November 1988]: The Department wrote to water authorities on 1 November asking them to carry out surveys of polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons in drinking water beyond present monitoring requirements. The information provided by these surveys should enable authorities to cost and develop remedial programmes should these prove necessary.

Rating Reform

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if, further to his answer to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside, Official Report, 13 June, columns 22-24 he will recalculate those taxes taking into account the new benefit levels announced by the Secretary of State for Social Security on 27 October.

Mr. Gummer: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) on 2 November, column 685. The revised estimates will take into account the new benefit levels announced by the Secretary of State for Social Security on 27 October. I shall write to the hon. Member when the information requested is available.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to make the membership of valuation and community charge tribunals representative of the wider community.

Mr. Ridley: Members of valuation and community charge tribunals will be appointed by local authorities, as the members of local valuation panels are now. My officials have recently written to appointing authorities about appointments to the tribunals, stressing the need for tribunal membership to be drawn from people with a wide range of backgrounds.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, what plans he has to provide information on poll tax in ethnic minority languages; and when translations of information, forms, practice notes, and so on, will be made available.

Mr. Ridley: A practice note about canvassing arrangements which contains a model registration form and explanatory notes has been prepared jointly by my Department and local authority associations and will be issued this week.

To assist those authorities with substantial ethnic minority populations, we shall be making available the form and notes in the major ethnic minority languages, in time for the canvasses next year.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report the list of poll tax matters for which the valuation and community charge tribunals will determine appeals.

Mr. Ridley: The grounds for appeal to a valuation and community charge tribunal in relation to the community charge are set out in section 23(2) of the Local Government Finance Act 1988.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report the number of members of (a) each local valuation panel, (b) each proposed valuation and community charge tribunal, and (c) the authority areas served by each local valuation panel and valuation and community charge tribunal.

Mr. Ridley: The information is as follows. Each valuation and community charge tribunal will serve the same area as its predecessor local valuation panel. Except where shown, the panel covers all the district councils within a county. The figures for LVP membership are the present complement; some panels are currently operating below complement.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if, based on the most recent figures, he will show the percentage of people in England and Wales expected to pay, on 1988-89 figures, a personal community charge of up to (a) £200, (b) £246, (c) £250, (d) £258, (e) £300, (f) £350, (g) £400, (h) £450, (i) £500, (j) £506, (k) £550 and (l) £600.

Mr. Gummer [holding answer 3 November 1988]: On 23 June 1988 the Government published community charge figures to illustrate the impact of the new local government finance system had it been in force in 1988-89. They use the current levels of local authority spending, and existing local authority responsibilities. They are not therefore a prediction of what community charges will be in due course. Based on those published figures, however, the percentage of personal community charge payers in England who would pay the amounts specified are as follows:

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether, under the provisions of the Housing Bill, a registered charitable housing association will be entitled to purchase tenanted council properties.

Mr. Trippier: Whether a charitable housing association can acquire tenanted council properties must depend on the terms of its charitable objects and on all the circumstances of the individual case.

Rates

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each year from 1982-83 to 1988-89 (a) the average rates payable per household by standard economic region, (b) the percentage increase in the average rates payable per household by region for each year from 1982-83 and (c) the annual percentage increase in the retail price index since 1982-83; and if he will list for each region the projected community charge per person based on local authority 1988-89 expenditure returns.

Mr. John Gummer: The information requested is as follows:

Grants

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much grant in figures and as a proportion of that made available in 1988-89 he expects to allocate, by region, to local authorities in the years 1990 and 1994.

Mr. Gummer: It is not yet possible to say.

Land Disposal, Bradford

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all applications made by the city of Bradford for consent to the disposal of land under section 123 of the Local Government Act 1972, which have been made during 1988 to the most recent practicable date, stating whether his consent has been given in each case.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: One application has been made, for the disposal of land at Southfield lane, Bradford, to the North British Housing Association. Consent was given in March 1988.

Unlicensed Vehicles

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what resources are made available to local authorities to enable them to remove unlicensed vehicles.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Resources are available to local authorities to carry out their statutory functions and exercise their statutory powers. It is for the authorities to determine priorities in the allocation of these resources.

County Hall, London

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the future of County Hall, London SE1.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I have nothing to add at this stage to earlier statements.

Local Valuation Panels

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he can provide an analysis by age, sex and occupation of the current membership of local valuation panels.

Mr. Ridley: I shall write to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Philip Hammond

Mr. Denis Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of the role being performed in the office of the Minister for Sport by Mr. Philip Hammond; if he will outline his responsibilities and qualifications; how he was selected for these duties; and of what public funds he is in receipt.

Mr. Moynihan: Mr. Hammond is a political assistant to the Minister with responsibility for Sport. In this capacity he is unpaid. He is not in receipt of any public funds.

Otters

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if any otters have been discovered suffering from the canine distemper virus currently prevalent in seals around the coasts of Britain.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The virus affecting seals around parts of the coasts of the United Kingdom has only been identified provisionally as being of the Morbilli family, which includes rinderpest and canine distemper virus. We are not aware of any reports that otters have been found suffering from this disease.

Air Pollution (London)

Mr. Allan Roberts: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many times carbon monoxide levels in London's air have exceeded World Health Organisation guidelines in the last 12 months; what steps he is taking to ensure that guideline breaches will not increase in the next 12 months; and what actions are in process to ensure that London's air does not exceed World Health Organisation guidelines for carbon monoxide or nitrogen dioxide levels during the next four years.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [pursuant to her reply, 31 October 1988, c. 540]: The World Health Organisation Guidelines are intended to provide background information and guidance to Governments in setting standards. They are not intended by WHO as air quality standards or limit values in themselves.

Carbon monoxide measurements made for the Department by the Warren Spring Laboratory in central London have been analysed for the 12-month period October 1987 to September 1988. The measured levels were well below guideline values and it is not expected that the latter will be exceeded in background urban locations in the foreseeable future.

For NO_2 the appropriate air quality standard is contained in the European Community directive 85/203. This standard was not exceeded at the Warren Spring central London monitoring site during the same period. To ensure that this air quality standard is not exceeded in the future, we intend to implement the European Community directive on vehicle exhaust emissions which contain provision for limiting emissions of NOx, of which NO_2 is a principal component.

Council House Sales

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give figures showing the average discount on sales of local authority and new town dwellings in England and Wales for each year since 1980.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 4 November 1988]: Figures for English local authorities and new towns are as follows: For Welsh figures, I refer the hon. Member to the Secretary of State for Wales.

Average discounts

	£ thousands	Percentage of market price
1980-81	6·0	39

[1] Average exclude block sales of dwellings in 1983-84 and 1987-88.

Council Rents

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give figures showing the gross collectable council rent and gross rent arrears for England and Wales for each of the years ending 31 March 1985, 1986, 1987 and 1988.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 4 November 1988]: The estimates derived from the figures reported by English housing authorities on their subsidy claim forms are as follows:

1 April	Rent roll	£ million rent arrears
1985	3,503	199·1
1986	3,699	211·4
1987	3,827	196·0

Comparable estimates for 1988 are not yet available.

For information about Wales I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give figures showing the current average council house rent in England and Wales, the amount by which this lies below estimated market rent and the percentage increase in council house rents since 1979.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 4 November 1988]: The estimated average unrebated weekly rent for local authority dwellings in England was £18·75 in April 1988, 193 per cent. higher than the corresponding average in April 1979. Estimates of potential market rents for local authority dwellings are not available.

For Welsh figures I refer the hon. Member to the Secretary of State for Wales.

Housing Transfers

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy, when deciding whether to approve a proposal for a large-scale voluntary transfer of local authority housing, with regard to the treatment of tenants who do not vote in a ballot as agreeing with the transfer; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 4 November 1988]: My right hon. Friend indicated the criteria he would normally expect to adopt, including those on tenant consultation, in guidelines on "Large Scale Voluntary Transfers of Local Authority Housing to Private Bodies", issued by the Department of the Environment in June 1988. He has said that he will apply the requirements of schedule 3A to the Housing Act 1985, whether or not it applies statutorily to the transfer in question. Beyond this, he will consider each case on its merits.

Land Register Committees

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will review the membership criteria for land register committees, teams of three, so as to disbar nominees from chambers of commerce who may have vested interests in land disposal.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 4 November 1988]: Teams of three consist of an official of my Department, a principal officer of the district council for the area concerned and a nominee of a chamber of commerce. Terms and conditions to prevent any abuse of a position of trust on the part of the last of these were agreed with the Association of British Chambers of Commerce. The teams now operate in a limited number of areas. Their role is to encourage public sector landowners to bring into use or dispose of unused or underused land that is entered on the land registers. Given the safeguard I have outlined, I do not consider it necessary to deprive the teams of three of the benefit of relevant experience.

Bed-and-Breakfast Accommodation

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the number of children currently in bed-and-breakfast accommodation; if he will denote the number eligible to attend school; and if he will classify this latter figure by each local education authority.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 4 November 1988]: This information is not collected centrally.

Silage and Slurry

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will introduce regulations requiring the regular inspection and certification of silage and slurry facilities on a basis similar to the vehicle MOT test;

(2) if he will ensure that the proposed National Rivers Authority has sufficient resources available to advise farmers on how to improve the integrity of silage and slurry facilities as a means of reducing pollution incidents.

Mr. Moynihan: The regulations we propose to introduce under section 31(4) of the Control of Pollution Act 1974—COPA—will require new or extended facilities to meet specified standards of construction and will allow the National Rivers Authority to serve enforcement notices in respect of existing facilities which pose significant pollution risks.

Additionally, water authorities already have powers under COPA to inspect waste facilities and to take any necessary action to prevent water pollution occurring.

Farmers will be able to obtain advice on the avoidance of pollution from silage and slurry installations from either the National Rivers Authority or the agriculture development advisory service.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Snuff

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Lord President of the Council what has been the recent average annual consumption of snuff taken from the Principal Doorkeeper by right hon. and hon. Members expressed in terms of weight and value; how many Members on average regularly take advantage of the service; and what has been the average cost to public funds.

Mr. Wakeham: The average annual consumption of snuff provided by the Principal Doorkeeper is some 1½ oz. I understand that only one hon. Member regularly takes advantage of this service. The average annual cost to public funds is 99p.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Leaflets

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how long the welfare rights team in the London borough of Newham waited for the leaflets about benefits ordered in April.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Approximately 18 weeks. Orders for outlets other than the Department's own local offices, are supplied from the central leaflets unit. There is currently a delay of 19 weeks in dispatch of large orders. I understand the London borough of Newham has also arranged the direct collection of leaflets.

Problems at the leaflets unit arose because of the high demand for new leaflets on the social security changes. Many of these orders were received as early as February. The leaflets themselves were not available until March and April as their production timetable was subject to the progress of legislation. Extra staff have been recruited to help clear the backlog, but this has been exacerbated by the recent local and national postal disruption. Individual copies of leaflets can be obtained from local offices of the Department or by ordering from the free telephone inquiry service, 0800 666 555.

Jobless Offenders (Hostels)

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on his policy towards funding levels for hostels for jobless offenders in light of the Policy Studies Institute's recommendation of such levels, a copy of which has been forwarded to him.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have considered the Policy Studies Institute's favoured recommendation that all hostels be asked to set a flat rate charge which would be met automatically by social security payments. We do not think it practicable to set up such a scheme which would require complex arrangements to ensure an equitable redistribution of funding between hostels following the necessary adjustments to existing charges. Moreover, it would preserve the distortion of special rules for a small sector of the housing market.

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if the formula adopted for the purposes of calculating funding for hostels for jobless offenders includes an element for care and supervision; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Funding hostels for offenders is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. Unemployed people in hostels may receive special rates of income support to help with the accommodation charge, meals and other living expenses. The consultation paper "Help with Hostel Charges", issued in July, invited comments on proposals to pay normal income support and housing benefit to hostel dwellers.

As announced in my hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) on 27 October at column 337, we have deferred change until after April 1989 to allow more time to consider the effect of the proposals on hostels' finances.

Income Support

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what recent representations he has received regarding the effects of the Social Security Act 1986 on the current levels of families estimated living at income support level or below.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: As well as the fourth report from the Select Committee on Social Services, Session 1987-88, we have received representations from the Child Poverty Action Group. The Government's reply to the Select Committee will be published shortly.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many single parents draw income support who (a) have and (b) have not got maintenance orders against the fathers of their children.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Figures for single (that is, unmarried lone) mothers receiving income support are not yet available. The most recent figures for supplementary benefit (May 1987) are (a) 17,084 and (b) 232,255. Orders obtained by the Department are included at (a).

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether the £70 million extra annual spending on income support for disabled people includes transitional additions; whether it takes account of (a) the loss of single payments and (b) the latest available information on the number of claims for income support; and what effect each of these factors has on the total.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The figure of £70 million is an uprated estimate of the extra spending through the disability premium for 1989-90. It derives from the tables published in the revised technical annex to the White Paper "Reform of Social Security" (Cmnd 9691). The figure does not take account of either transitional additions or the loss of single payments. The technical annex has not been updated to take account of the 1987 annual statistical inquiry or subsequent predictions of the number of claims for income support.

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will provide a breakdown between the two benefits of the extra £70 million going to families with children on income support and family credit.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: It is estimated that of the extra £70 million, a total of £43 million will go to income support recipients, £25 million to family credit recipients and £2 million to housing benefit recipients.

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much is allowed for the payment of water rates in the income support personal allowances for 1989-90.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No specific amount is included in the Income Support personal allowances for 1989-90 for the payment of water rates.

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much he expects to spend on income support in 1989-90; and how much of this is attributable to the compensation for 20 per cent. of the community charge.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: A detailed explanation of the changes to the programme will be published in the 1989 public expenditure White Paper in the normal way.

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the average amount of rates that income support claimants would be liable for in 1989-90.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Latest estimates suggest that the average amount of rates that income support recipients in England and Wales will have to pay in 1989-90 will be around £1·50.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many applications for transitional payments in respect of housing benefit have been made; and how many have been approved at the latest available date.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what percentage of people eligible for transitional payments in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) London and (c) Lewisham have applied to date;

(2) how many people have applied for transitional protection payments in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) London and (c) Lewisham; and how many people have been paid so far in each category.

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many applications have now been received by his Department's unit in Glasgow regarding housing benefit transitional payments; how many have been duly processed; and how many actual payments have been made.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The transitional payments unit has received 364,643 applications up to 1 November. Of this total 238,858, or 51 per cent., have been assessed and 108,146 cases have now received their first payments, including arrears from the beginning of April. It is necessary in every case to issue an inquiry form to the applicants local authority to obtain details of the housing benefit position. There are currently just over 95,000 forms with local authorities which have not been returned. The backlog of work which accumulated at the unit before it became operational has now been cleared and as the forms are returned from authorities assessments are made and notifications sent out without delay. I regret that the information is not yet available for either London or Lewisham. It is not possible to quantify the numbers of people with potential eligibility to housing benefit transitional payments.

Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much he expects to save as a result of (a) not uprating the lone parent premium under housing benefit and (b) raising the non-dependant deduction over and above the retail prices index less housing.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No change to the basis for uprating these amounts has been made and we have made no calculations of the costs involved. The housing benefit lone parent premium was introduced in April at a higher level than for income support as a transitional measure to reduce losses for lone parents. The aim is alignment in the two schemes. Since housing benefit was introduced it has been normal practice to uprate the non-dependant deductions in line with the housing element of the retail prices index, rather than any other index, to reflect changes in levels of actual housing costs.

Disabled Adults

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security on what date the Office of Population and Censuses Surveys' second report, "The Financial Circumstances of Disabled Adults" will be published.

Mr. Scott: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) on 4 November at column 814.

Mobility Allowance

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy that mobility allowance will be extended beyond the age of 75 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: My right hon. Friend announced on 27 October that we shall be bringing forward legislation to extend the upper age limit from 75 to 80 as an interim measure pending our consideration of the series of reports on the survey of disabled people undertaken by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys.

Transitional Payments

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what efforts are being made to encourage people eligible for transitional payments who have not yet made a claim.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on 24 October at columns 59-60. As my right hon. Friend has recently announced, applications for transitional payments will be accepted up to 31 March 1989 and all applications received up to that date will be backdated to April 1988 if successful.

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claimants will not have their benefits uprated next April as a result of being in receipt of transitional protection.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Latest estimates suggest that about 500,000 beneficiaries will receive no increase in their benefit next April as a result of transitional protection.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if, pursuant to his reply of 1 November on the subject of housing benefit transitional payments, he will list those local authorities for which adequate information is awaited in more than 25 cases in order for payment to be made.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people he estimates will be receiving transitional protection in 1989-90; and at what cost.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Latest estimates suggest that about 500,000 income support recipients will be receiving transitional protection after next April. Detailed costs will not be available until after the publication of the 1989 public expenditure White Paper.

Family Credit

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his Department's estimate of actual expenditure on family credit in the first quarter of the current financial year;

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate how much of the family credit budget for 1988-89 has so far been spent.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Up to and including 1 July 1988, the latest date for which information is available, actual expenditure on family credit that is amounts of benefit encashed by recipients, was £84·3 million. As this period was at the start of the new scheme, the level of expenditure was not representative, both because of the lower number of awards made at that stage and because the figure relates to actual encashments and not to the total benefit awarded for that period. However, indications are that the total outturn for 1988-89 will be at or slightly above the provision in the 1988 public expenditure White Paper.

Sir Ian Gilmour: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish figures showing the proposed family credit ceilings in 1989-90 for (a) a married couple with one child under five years, (b) a married couple with two children under eleven years, (c) a married couple with two children over eleven years, (d) a married couple with three children under eleven years, (e) a married couple with three children over eleven years and (f) a married couple with two children under eleven years and two children over eleven years.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information requested is a follows:

	Maximum Family Credit (1) at proposed April 1989 rates	Level of Gross earnings (2) at which entitlement to Family Credit runs out
(a) Married couple with one child under 5	£40·90	About £138 a week
(b) Married couple with two children under 11	£48·20	About £154 a week
(c) Married couple with two children between 11-15	£59·40	About £178 a week
(d) Married couple with three children under 11	£55·50	About £170 a week
(e) Married couple with three children between 11 and 15	£72·30	About £206 a week
(f) Married couple with two children under 11 and two aged between 11 and 15	£74·00	About £210 a week

Notes:

(1) Maximum Family Credit would be payable where net income was £54·80 or less.

(2) At the proposed new National Insurance contribution levels and assuming an inflation-related increase in tax thresholds from April 1989.

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (a) pages, (b) sections and (c) questions there are in family credit application form FC1; and if he will simplify it.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The family credit claim form (FC1) has

(a) 16 pages, 13 of which contain questions which may have to be answered by claimants;

(b) 13 Parts, two of which contain only explanatory material and do not require any entries by claimants;

(c) about 100 separate questions.

The form covers a wide range of possible situations so as to obtain all the information required at the outset and avoid having to make further inquiries of the claimant. This means that most claimants will find that whole parts of the form do not apply to them and that they do not need to answer many of the questions in some of the other parts. We are looking at ways to improve the claim form following experience of the form in use.

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many children he estimates are in families (a) entitled to and (b) claiming family credit.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: A precise estimate of the number of families eligible for family credit and the number of children in those families cannot be made until information from the 1988 family expenditure survey is available. Information about the number of children in families actually receiving family credit should be available in the new year.

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much he expects to spend on family credit in 1989-90 in the event of take-up of (a) 30 per cent., (b) 40 per cent., (c) 50 per cent. and (d) 60 per cent.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The latest estimates of family credit expenditure for 1989-90, and the take-up assumptions underlying them, will be published early in the new year in the departmental report.

Programme for Disabled People

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) which organisations in (a) Great Britain and (b) Northern Ireland have been invited to submit nominations to the European Community network of rehabilitation centres;

(2) what action the Minister for the Disabled proposes to take to enable organisations in the voluntary sector to contribute to, and benefit from, the second action programme for disabled people;

(3) what action the Minister for the Disabled has taken following agreement by the Council of the European Community of the second action programme for disabled people in April, to ensure that disability organisations and others have been fully informed of the contents of the programme;

(4) what action the Minister for the Disabled has taken to provide information on the second action programme for disabled people to organisations in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Scott: Following agreement by the Council of the European Community to proceed with a second action programme for disabled people, the Commission invited member states to submit nominations for the network of local pilot projects. Because of the very tight timetable for nominations set by the Commission, it was not possible to advertise publicly. Nominations were invited, therefore, from all relevant Government Departments including the Department of Health and Social Services in Northern Ireland. In addition, invitations to nominate were sent to a wide range of statutory and voluntary organisations. We asked these organisations and government departments to disseminate the invitation to other bodies who might be interested to encourage all those who might wish to apply. It is not possible, therefore, to say how many organisations were eventually invited to make nominations.

We received a large number of nominations that exceeded the number of places allocated to the United Kingdom within each network. The projects have now been selected and are being informed. Within each network they cover a wide range of disabilities and have a good geographical spread including a project from Northern Ireland.

We intend to consider how those organisations who were not successful or who expressed an interest in the programme can be kept informed of the progress of the local projects. In addition we are considering the most appropriate way, within the constraints that apply on public expenditure, to facilitate the involvement of disability organisations in the second action programme.

YTS

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will consider re-introducing income support to 16 and 17-year olds who do not receive an offer of a YTS place at the termination of the period of bridging allowance or extended child benefit.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No. I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Mr. Cope) to the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) on 3 November at column 773.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he is monitoring the impact of the YTS guarantee on those young people who would have been eligible for income support before the introduction of the new benefit rules in September.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Government are monitoring the changed social security benefit arrangements for young people seeking a YTS place.

Child Benefit

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many 16 and 17-year old summer school leavers who would have been eligible for income support are now on extended child benefit following the new benefit rules introduced from September for Scotland.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information requested is available only for Great Britain as a whole. As at 31 October 1988 there were 17,448 16 and 17-year-old summer school leavers whose parents were receiving extended child benefit in respect of them. It is likely that most of these young people would previously have been eligible for income support.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what is the total number of 16 and 17-year olds who will be exempt from the withdrawal of entitlement to benefit covering lone parents, registered blind, incapable of work by reason of disease or mental or physical disability, pregnancy or couples married with a child for Scotland;

(2) what is the total number of 16 and 17-year-olds who will be exempt from the withdrawal of entitlement to benefit covering lone parents, registered blind, incapable of work by reason of disease or mental or physical disability, pregnancy or couples married with a child, for Wales and each of the standard regions.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Such estimates as are available are given in the table:

	Estimated number of 16 and 17-year-olds entitled to Income Support without a direction from the Secretary of State under the "severe hardship" provision —September 1988
England	15,000
Scotland	2,000
Wales	2,000
Great Britain	19,000

Notes:

(1) Based on a sample of 1 in 50 cases in receipt of Supplementary Allowance on a day in May 1987.

(2) Figures rounded to the nearest thousand.

(3) Information is not available according to "standard regions."

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many additional (a) families and (b) children will be eligible for income-related benefits as a result of the freeze in child benefit.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: In broad terms, the claimant caseload of the main income-related benefits is expected to increase by around 30,000 from April 1989 because child benefit will stay at its present level. These families include about 60,000 children.

Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will update the answer to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) 29 July, Official Report, column 832, relating to child benefit;

(2) if he will update the answer to the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) of 17 June, Official Report, column 371-72, relating to child benefit.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No later figures are available.

Social Fund (Software)

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether software programmes used to process information on the social fund are now providing accurate data.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Various software errors have been corrected in successive releases. After the release of the version which is currently being tested, it is expected that in general statistical reports will accurately record the present month's figures. However, cumulative year to date figures will continue to be unreliable because of problems in earlier months.

Rating Reform

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimates he has made regarding the community charge liabilities of income support claimants based on (a) 1988-89 local authority expenditure, (b) projected local authority expenditure in 1989-90 and (c) projected local authority expenditure in 1990-91.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The relevant issue when setting the income support rates for 1989-90 was the level of community charge that would have been payable had it been introduced nationally in that year. It took account of existing local authority expenditure. The compensation was a once and for all adjustment to the income support rates and will, in future, be uprated in the normal manner.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list in the Official Report, those local authorities which do not operate a local scheme for housing benefit covering war widows and pensioners.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Local schemes for disregarding war widow and war pensioner benefits in excess of the £5 statutory disregard are entirely at the discretion of the local authority. The list has been compiled from the best information available to the Department.

Source: Based on 1988 returns provided by 447 of the 483 local authorities in Great Britain (93 per cent.).

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will extend transitional payments to cover losses incurred by war widows and pensioners as a result of changes to local option schemes for housing benefit, resulting from the 1988 housing benefit regulations.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No. The new housing benefit scheme which was introduced in April 1988 did not make any changes to the rules that related to the local authority discretionary schemes for war widows and war pensioners. Furthermore, the statutory income disregard was increased by 25 per cent. Prior to this date, local authorities were able to disregard the whole or part of any war disablement pension or war widow's pension that was in payment and this was carried forward unaltered into the reformed housing benefit scheme. Where losses have occurred, this is because some local authorities have voluntarily amended their local schemes and thereby reduced the amount of housing benefit in payment.

Freeline Social Security Service

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many inquiries have been received by the Freeline social security service in each of the past 12 months; and what information is available about the subject matter of those inquiries.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information for the 12 months to August 1988, the latest figures available is as follows:

Four weeks ending	Freeline inquiries
22 September 1987	55,940
20 October 1987	59,742
17 November 1987	58,216
15 December 1987	58,012
12 January 1988	42,318
9 February 1988	75,095
8 March 1988	64,809
5 April 1988	53,375
3 May 1988	54,665
31 May 1988	55,755
30 June 1988[1]*	65,661
31 July 1988	65,806
31 August 1988	77,403

[1] Statistics have been kept on a calendar month basis since June 1988.

A study of freeline caller-traffic conducted in February 1988 reported that approximately 50 per cent. of calls were about supplementary benefit (now replaced by income support, and the social fund); approximately 25 per cent. were about contributory benefit matters such as retirement pensions and contributions; and the remainder concerned a wide range of other non means-tested benefit such as attendance allowance and mobility allowance.

Community Care Grants

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security which local offices of his Department had spent less than 10 per cent. of their community care grants budget for 1988-89 by the end of September.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The 1988-89 social fund budget allocations for each of the Department's local offices, together with records of expenditure to the end of September 1988 are available in the Library. Details of the national profile of anticipated expenditure were given in my predecessor's reply to the hon. Member on 11 July 1988 at column 61.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate what proportion of families with children claimed supplementary benefit at the latest available date.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: It is estimated that in May 1987, the latest date for which information is available, about 17 per cent. of families with a dependent child or young person aged under 19 were receiving supplementary benefit.

Spending Power

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will update the reply he gave to the then hon. Member for Kensington, of 4 February, Official Report, columns 737-42, on spending power.

Mr. Scott: No. There was no prescribed procedure for uprating supplementary benefit, housing benefit or FIS —different elements of these schemes were uprated in different ways and by different indices at different times. It is, therefore, impossible to say what the rates of these benefits would have been in April 1989 if the reforms had not been introduced. A simple mechanistic uprating in line with the retail price indices would be unrealistic. The tax benefit model tables for April 1988 will be published shortly.

Widows

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will introduce legislation to make entitlement to widows' pension have regard to job prospects or real earnings rather than chronological age.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have no plans to do so.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of widows (a) aged under 60 years (b) aged 45 to 54 years and (c) aged under 45 years have paid employment in Glasgow (i) full time and (ii) part time.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of widows receive help from an occupational pension relating to their late husband's employment.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I regret that the information is not available in the form requested.

TRANSPORT

Channel Tunnel (Hazardous Waste)

Dr. Dafydd Elis Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if his Department has undertaken any studies, or commissioned studies by consultants, on the potential safety and risk of the use of the Channel tunnel for the transport of spent nuclear fuel or other radioactive materials.

Mr. Portillo: When Eurotunnel put forward proposals covering the movement of dangerous goods and radioactive materials they will be considered by the intergovernmental commission established by the Channel tunnel treaty to oversee safety, and any necessary advice sought.

Vehicle Excise Duty (Refunds)

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list for each of the last 12 months the number of car road licences refunded by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre, the value of those refunds in each month and the average refund in each month.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The numbers and amounts of refunds of vehicle excise duty paid in respect of vehicles in the private and light goods tax class within Great Britain during the most recent 12 months for which figures are available, are as follows:

Month	Total number refunds	Total value of refunds £	Average refund value £
September 1987	227,553	8,912,076	39·16
October 1987	234,943	9,110,219	38·78
November 1987	204,732	7,914,452	38·66
December 1987	165,201	6,363,237	38·52
January 1988	169,149	6,157,484	36·40
February 1988	199,080	7,452,494	37·43
March 1988	210,759	8,047,349	38·18
April 1988	202,120	7,743,124	38·31
May 1988	199,059	7,538,781	37·87
June 1988	214,232	8,071,372	37·68
July 1988	204,511	7,568,206	37·01
August 1988	176,594	6,872,642	38·92

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the number of car road licences that have been refunded in each of the last three years, showing the total value of refunds in each of those years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The total number and value of refunds of vehicle excise duty paid in respect of vehicles in the private and light goods tax class within Great Britain in each of the last three complete financial years, are as follows:

Financial year	Number of refunds	Total value of refunds
1985-86	2,050,029	75,686,700
1986-87	2,220,244	84,996,987
1987-88	2,340,614	89,511,278

Approved Road Schemes

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will state the procedure he uses to re-assess the calculated yield of approved road schemes when tenders exceed the estimated figure used to justify the initial decision to construct the road; and what steps he takes when lowest tenders, if accepted in the contract, decrease the consequential yield to below the original qualifying figure.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Decisions to proceed with schemes are based on successive appraisals of their economics and other factors. Cost estimates are monitored and, when appropriate, the implications of changes for decisions are reviewed. When the lowest tender price significantly exceeds the Department's latest estimate, the situation is reviewed taking into account the relevant factors including the economic appraisal.

London Underground Ltd.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether London Underground Ltd. is required to submit to his Department plans for platforms, stairs, lifts, escalators and moving pavements.

Mr. Portillo: Yes, where they are part of a new station or where they significantly alter existing arrangements.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy to require investment submissions passed to his Department by London Underground Ltd. for financial approval to include a sentence drawing attention to any significant safety issues.

Mr. Portillo: London Regional Transport and its subsidiaries are already under a statutory obligation to have due regard to safety in all that they do. All investment appraisals submitted to the Department for approval which may have safety implications are reviewed by the railway inspectorate.

Railway Inspectorate

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what effect the level of resources of the railway inspectorate has on the level of inspections by it.

Mr. Portillo: The current indications are that the latest recruitment campaign will be successful in bringing the railway inspectorate up to established complement. The adequacy of this complement will be kept under review.

London Regional Transport

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what objectives or principles have been set for London Regional Transport by him, or his predecessors.

Mr. Portillo: London Regional Transport was set objectives on 20 July 1984. These were reproduced in a reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman) on that day at columns 373-74.

London Underground (Ticketing)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration has been given by the railway inspectorate or any other part of his Department to the safety aspects of the underground ticketing system being installed on London Underground.

Mr. Portillo: The railway inspectorate has been in close touch with London Underground Ltd. about safety aspects of the new ticketing system.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what advice has been given to London Underground Ltd. by the railway inspectorate in the last five years about the need for contractors works (a) to be safe from fire and (b) not to obstruct fire hydrants and other safety features.

Mr. Portillo: The safety rules and contract procedures of London Underground Ltd. provide instructions for contractors on these matters. If in the course of an inspection work is seen to be causing a hazard, the inspector will take appropriate action.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the professional establishment of the railway inspectorate; and how many posts were vacant in (a) November 1987 and (b) October 1988.

Mr. Portillo: The professional establishment of the railway inspectorate is 24. There were five vacancies in November 1987 and seven in October 1988. A recent recruitment exercise has resulted in enough successful candidates declared to fill the vacancies.

Tyne and Wear Metro

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what aspect of the railway inspectorate's knowledge and experience of the modern fire protection arrangements on the Tyne and Wear metro had been applied to London Underground between the opening of the metro and the King's Cross fire.

Mr. Portillo: Aspects of the railway inspectorate's knowledge and experience of modern fire protection arrangements on home and overseas metros applied to London Underground included, among others, the need to involve the fire authority in new construction from the early design stage, the use of tunnel fans to control smoke, the use of dry mains through tunnels and the specification of materials used in new construction.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether the railway inspectorate was consulted by London Underground Ltd. about the flammability of materials used in booking halls.

Mr. Portillo: The use of materials throughout the Underground is regulated by reference to London Underground's own code of practice. From time to time the railway inspectorate has been consulted about specific materials or applications.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport why the objectives and targets set for British Rail and London Underground Ltd. have not to date included the reduction of accidents.

Mr. Portillo: Safety is a prime objective for British Rail and London Regional Transport. It is then for the railway operators to decide whether specific targets in terms of accident reduction are a useful means to that objective.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport further to the answer of 8 December 1987 to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras, Official Report, column 121, how much time the railway inspectorate devotes to judging the standards of safety which should be incorporated in investment in London Underground Ltd.

Mr. Portillo: Where an investment proposal for London Underground Ltd. involves matters which have safety implications the railway inspectorate is consulted. It is impossible to say precisely how much time is devoted to this work.

Safety Inspections (Railways)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he had made as to the reasons why the level of safety inspections on the railways under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act is lower than safety policing in other industries.

Mr. Portillo: The report on the departmental review of the railway inspectorate, in April 1987, noted some evidence to suggest that the number of inspections on the railways is low in comparison with some other industries. Such comparisons may be misleading but the report recommended a further review of the level of inspections and this is receiving careful consideration along with the other recommendations in the report.

Highway Engineering Schemes

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to increase the rate of implementation of those low cost highway engineering schemes which have been identified for implementation on trunk roads which form part of the backlog of 3,900 low cost schemes identified by the National Audit Office in June.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The 3,900 backlog mentioned by the National Audit Office was on local not trunk roads. As far as trunk roads are concerned, in rephasing new construction schemes this year, we have given priority to low-cost accident prevention schemes. The basis for the National Audit Office figure is not clear from its report. We are seeking more details of the scale and nature of the problem.

Highway Construction

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the average casualty reduction benefit for (a) highway construction schemes and (b) low-cost AIP schemes.

Mr. Peter Bottomley:

(a) The proportion of scheme benefits accounted for by accident savings in the average highway scheme appraised by the Department's COBA method is 17 per cent.

(b) Individual AIP schemes offer casualty savings of between 15 per cent. and 80 per cent. with an average of 33 per cent. Most schemes pay for themselves in less than two years. Many do so within 12 months, giving a rate of return of 200 per cent. or more.

AIP techniques are the most cost-effective proven way of saving casualties and are economically highly efficient. We estimate that if AIP schemes were implemented vigorously by all local authorities, 200-300 lives and about 15,000 injuries a year might be saved.

Contraflows (Cones)

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made as to whether the current design of cones used in contraflow areas of motorways maximises road safety; and if any alternative designs have been used or considered.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The transport and road research laboratory studied the safety performance of traffic management at major roadworks on motorways in 1982. The results are published in research report 42. TRRL subsequently concluded that more detailed assessments of the kind referred to would not be cost-effective. One alternative design, the flat traffic delineator, has been proposed, considered and used.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Taxation and Social Security

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the percentage of gross national product at factor cost taken by total taxes and social security contributions, respectively, in the current financial year and in 1973.

Mr. Major: Total taxes and social security contributions were 33·2 per cent. of gross domestic product at market prices in the financial year 1973-74. The equivalent percentage for 1988-89 implied by the economic forecast published by the Treasury on 1 November is 37·4 per cent.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will bring up to date the figures for output per head of the working population given in his answer dated 2 March 1987, Official Report, column 521, including an estimate for the current year; and if he will add broadly comparable figures for 1958, 1963 and 1968 together with the average annual increase between 1958 and 1973, 1973 and 1988, and 1979 and 1988.

Mr. Major: The information requested is given in the table:

2. 1959 is given as the first year because consistent figures on employees are not available earlier.
3. Figures on output for 1988 are not yet available.
4. Figures refer to United Kingdom.

EC (Funding)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, pursuant to the statement of the Paymaster General, Official Report, 24 October, column 122, he will list in the Official Report the names of the current or forthcoming Government publications, notices or statements that will publish information concerning the operation of the new funding mechanisms of the European Economic Communities, as set out in the Official Report, 24 October, column 75.

Mr. Brooke: Information on the Community budget is published in the annual statements on the Community budget, the public expenditure White Paper, the autumn statement and the six-monthly White Papers on developments in the Community, as well as being provided from time to time in statements to Parliament following relevant meetings of the Council of Ministers and in reply to specific questions from hon. and right hon. Members. Information on the budget is also published by the European Commission, for example in its recent publications "Financial Report: 1987" and "The Community Budget: The Facts in Figures".

Any proposals for Community legislation will continue to be deposited in Parliament with explanatory memoranda, and once adopted such proposals are published in the official journal of the European Communities which is made available to Parliament. I have already written to the hon. Member, following the debate on 24 October, to explain the position in rather more detail.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the gross payment made to the European Economic Community by the United Kingdom in 1987-88; what sums were received from the European Economic Community; and under what categories the European Economic Community receipts can be classified.

Mr. Brooke: The information requested is set out in the table:

		1987-88 Outturn (£ million)
Gross Payments		4,906
VAT abatement		−1,137
		3,769
Public Sector Receipts:
Agriculture Guidance and Guarantee Fund	1,054
Social Fund	384
Regional Development Fund	365
Own Resources Collection Costs	135
Other Receipts	19	−1,957
Net contribution to European Community budget		1,812
Receipts from ECSC		−57
Contributions to the EIB		10
Payments to the EC budget attributed to the aid programme		−101
Net payments to EC institutions		1,664

Local Authorities (Cash Limits)

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has for cash limits on local authority capital spending.

Mr. Major: As already announced, the Government plan to introduce with effect from 1990-91 the new public expenditure planning total set out in Command 441 and, subject to the approval of Parliament, a new system to regulate the capital finance of local authorities in England and Wales about which my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for the Environment and for Wales have consulted local government. The Government's broad intention is that, with effect from 1990-91, cash limits should be applied to the sources of finance for local authority capital expenditure which fall within the new planning total. The main existing cash limits on local authority capital spending in England and Wales (DOE/LA1 and WO/LA1) apply to expenditure net of receipts. With the recent surge in receipts, and given the difficulties of predicting future levels of receipts, these cash limits are no longer appropriate as instruments of financial management and control. Subject to consultation with the local authority associations, therefore, the Government propose that these cash limits, and the associated end-year flexibility and penalty arrangements, should be discontinued with effect from the current financial year.

Personal Equity Plans

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many personal equity plans have been taken out in 1988 to date; what was the comparable figure in 1987; what was the total figure for 1987; and what was the original Treasury forecast of take-up for 1987.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 2 November 1988]: About 100,000 personal equity plans have been started so far in 1988. The comparable figure for 1987 was about twice that, and the full-year total was over 250,000.

When personal equity plans were announced in the 1986 Budget it was recognised that take-up would be heavily influenced by external factors. The estimated cost of the scheme assumed that take-up could reach 500,000 in the first year.

Child Benefit

Sir Ian Gilmour: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much of the expenditure on child benefit goes to families who pay (i) more and (ii) less in income tax than they receive in child benefit.

Mr. Lawson [holding answer 1 November 1988]: In 1988-89, child benefit payments are estimated to be about £4·7 billion. Of this, about 70 per cent. will be paid to families whose income tax liability exceeds their child benefit and 30 per cent. will be paid to non-taxpayers and those whose income tax is less than their child benefit.

WALES

Water Industry Privatisation

Mr. Ray Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what instructions have been given to the chairman of the Welsh water authority in respect of setting up shadow organisations to implement plans for privatising the water industry in Wales; who will be responsible for the costs related to this; and on what authority such costs will be incurred.

Mr. Grist: The Public Utility Transfers and Water Charges Act 1988 gave the Welsh water authority the power to act in relation to proposals for privatisation. The costs incurred are a matter for the authority. I wrote to the chairman of the Welsh water authority on 11 May 1988 inviting him to submit, on behalf of the authority, in accordance with guidelines issued with my letter, a scheme to provide for the separation of the utility functions from those to be transferred to the National Rivers Authority. Copies of the guidelines were laid in the Libraries of both Houses.

Speech Therapists

170. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he has taken to ensure proper training and recruitment of speech therapists in each area health authority in Wales.

Mr. Grist: Training in speech therapy is provided in Wales at the South Glamorgan institute of higher education and in England at a number of higher education institutions in the public sector. As with other courses of higher education, students are recruited on a national basis. The South Glamorgan institute trains students from all parts of Wales, but many Welsh students train in England.

The recruitment of speech therapists locally is essentially a matter for the district health authority concerned, but my Department does have a strategic role at the all-Wales level in ensuring as far as possible that the identified staffing requirements of the NHS in Wales are met. Speech therapists are among those groups which have been the subject of detailed scrutiny in the first round of the manpower resource planning exercise undertaken by the Health Service in Wales this year. As part of the exercise, initiated by the manpower steering group established by the Department in 1986, health authorities were requested to make projections of future manpower requirements, including demand and supply estimates, over the next decade. A report on the outcome of that first planning round is being finalised, following which consideration will be given to its findings to determine the need and scope for action at the all-Wales and district levels to forestall any projected manpower difficulties.

Cardigan Hospital

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any further plans to improve health care facilities for the elderly at Cardigan hospital; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: The facilities at Cardigan hospital are a matter for East Dyfed health authority in the first instance. That authority's strategic plan includes a scheme to improve and co-ordinate services for the elderly in the Cardigan area by, inter alia, providing consultant geriatrician beds and a day hospital at Cardigan hospital. Timing of the implementation of the scheme is a matter for the authority to determine in the light of competing demands and available resources.

Lithotripsy Machines

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if, in the light of the additional moneys made available to the National Health Service in Wales, he will enable the joint purchase by the Welsh health authorities of two advanced lithotripsy machines to enable Welsh people to undergo treatment in Wales both north and south.

Mr. Grist: Lithotripsy is a developing technology which is being monitored by the Department. Consideration is presently being given to proposals for the provision of a service in Wales.

ENERGY

CEGB (Emissions)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what steps he will take to ensure that the Central Electricity Generating Board complies with the European Community directive on sulphur dioxide and nitrogen oxide emissions.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution will continue to be responsible for ensuring that emissions standards are complied with.

Electricity Privatisation

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if, under the proposals for privatisation of the electricity industry, he will introduce a legal requirement to decommission nuclear power plant and clear the site as soon as practicable.

Mr. Michael Spicer: No. The timing of decommissioning operations is a matter for the nuclear power station operator to consider within the guidelines on safety and environmental protection set by the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate and Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution.

Advance Gas-cooled Reactors

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will procure for his Department's library a copy of the analysis, by physicist Richard Webb, concerning the circulation of the cooling gas in advanced gas reactors.

Mr. Parkinson: Consideration will be given to procuring, for my Department's library, a copy of the analysis once it has been published.

Euratom (Safeguards)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he intends to discuss any security implications with the European Commission following the announcement by Commissioner Mosar to the European Parliament on 26 October that Euratom will publish henceforth an annual safeguards report for public distribution; and how publication of this report will effect confidentiality agreements contained in current Euratom United Kingdom safeguard treaties.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Commission has made it clear that it will respect the need to protect confidential information when producing any such report.

Power Stations

Mr. Leadbitter: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if his proposals for the privatisation of the electricity industry will include any policy on a power station construction programme responding to environmental needs; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will make a statement on the power station construction requirement over the next 20 years; what numbers are expected to be nuclear, gas, oil and coal fuelled; how he expects these to be determined under privatisation; and how he expects environmental considerations and the greenhouse effect to play a part in the programme.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The CEGB envisages that 15·5 GW of new generating capacity will be required in England and Wales by the end of the century. The demand for new plant is expected to increase early in the next century as existing power stations reach the end of their operational lives. Following privatisation, the size and type of new power stations required to meet demand will be a matter for the privatised industry. The CEGB's present plans include the commissioning of four PWRs by the year 2000. Nuclear stations do not contribute to acid rain and have the potential to make an important contribution to containing the United Kingdom's carbon dioxide emissions. However, the impact of the United Kingdom's power stations alone on the worldwide greenhouse effect is small. Any new coal-fired power stations would need to be fitted with modern emission control equipment to the requirements of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution.

Plutonium Exports

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has given any approvals for the export of plutonium to (a) the United States of America, (b) Japan, (c) European Community Council members states and (d) other European states since May 1979; and if he will list details in the Official Report.

Mr. Michael Spicer [holding answer 26 October 1988]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury (Mr. Goodlad) on 18 February 1987 at column 635. This covered all exports of plutonium other than in gram quantities to the destinations mentioned by the hon. Member. The total amount of such exports between May 1979 and March 1988 was 2,960 kg.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Environmental Research

7. Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has instructed the Natural Environment Research Council to increase its planned future expenditure on environmental research since 27 September.

Mr. Jackson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross).

60. Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to increase spending in higher education on research into environmental issues; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The main elements of public funding for higher education institutions' research on environmental issues are general grants from the University Grants Committee (shortly to be succeeded by the Universities Funding Council) and grants for specific research projects from the Natural Environment Research Council. My right hon. Friend is seeking advice from the Advisory Board for the Research Councils on the distribution between scientific fields of the substantial extra funds for science he announced on 1 November at column 605.

National Curriculum

14. Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he is in a position to make a statement on the progress of the working parties on the national curriculum.

Mrs. Rumbold: The three subject working groups which my right hon. Friend has set up have reported in good time to enable us to press ahead with our national curriculum objectives.

27. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what further progress he has made on the introduction of the national curriculum.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham).

40. Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what response he has received to the publication of the national curriculum working party report on mathematics.

54. Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what responses he has had thus far to the report of the national curriculum working party on science.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend is awaiting advice on his proposals for mathematics and for science from the National Curriculum Council which has statutory responsibility for consultation. The proposals were based on the recommendations of the mathematics and science working groups. The NCC's advice is due by the end of November.

43. Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the suitability of school teachers' qualifications and training in relation to the implementation of the national curriculum from September 1989.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) on 4 November at column 783.

45. Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether his Department has made any estimate of the number and type of teachers required to teach the national curriculum; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether his Department has made any estimates of the number and type of teachers required to teach the national curriculum; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: The national curriculum will change the pattern of demand for teachers. At secondary level, there will be additional demand for teachers in some subjects and a reduction in others. Work on estimating future demand continues all the time, but firm estimates cannot be made until we have a clear picture of national curriculum requirements subject by subject.

School Management

15. Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what assessment he has made of progress towards local management of schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: I am pleased to say that bids under the education support grant programme show that all local education authorities are working constructively to prepare schemes of local management, for submission to my right hon. Friend by 30 September 1989 for those authorities outside inner London. We are thus on target for approved schemes to start in April 1990 with full implementation from April 1993.

Truancy

16. Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list for each local education authority the figures for truancy for children in secondary schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: This information is not available centrally. Under the Education Acts, responsibility for taking action on truancy rests with local education authorities.

City Technology Colleges

17. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the total amount of funding for city technology colleges committed thus far by sponsors.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the latest progress of his proposals for city technology colleges.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer my hon. Friend and the hon. Gentleman to the answer which my right hon. Friend gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell).

Universities Funding Council

18. Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the chairman-designate of the Universities Funding Council to discuss financial arrangements for higher educaton.

24. Mr. Lofthouse: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the chairman-designate of the Universities Funding Council to discuss university funding.

72. Mr. Stott: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he proposes next to meet the chairman and chief executive designates of the Universities Funding Council to discuss the funding of higher education.

Mr. Jackson: We have had discussions on a range of issues with the chairman of the Universities Funding Council, Lord Chilver. These will continue. In addition, my right hon. Friend wrote to him on 31 October to give some general guidance to the council on its funding responsibilities.

Teacher Training

19. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give figures for the number of teachers who will receive training during 1988-89.

Mrs. Rumbold: An estimated 35,000 students will be undertaking initial teacher training courses of between one and four years duration in universities, polytechnics and colleges in England. All the approximately 400,000 serving teachers in maintained schools in England will have the opportunity of some in-service training.

Teachers (Pay and Conditions)

20. Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received seeking improvements in the pay and conditions of teachers.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Department has received approximately 600 letters since last April about the pay and conditions of school teachers.

Parent Governors (ILEA)

21. Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to how many parent governors have been appointed in the Inner London education authority.

Mrs. Rumbold: There were just under 2,000 parent governor seats to be filled in county and maintained special schools in the Inner London education authority. I understand that virtually all these places have been filled.

Assisted Places Scheme

22. Mr. Flannery: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the cost of the assisted places scheme for each year since its inception; and what is the total cost since the scheme began.

Mr. Butcher: The information requested is as follows:

Financial year	Expenditure £ million
1981-82	3·0
1982-83	8·7
1983-84	15·0
1984-85	22·2
1985-86	29·6
1986-87	37·9
1987-88	46·0
Total	162·4

GCSE

23. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received concerning the recently published results for the new GCSE examination.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations about GCSE examination results. I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh).

26. Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his Department's assessment of the first year results of the GCSE examination.

35. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a further statement on the progress of the introduction of the GCSE examinations.

68. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the way in which the GCSE exams have proceeded.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer my hon. Friends to the reply I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh).

46. Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he is taking to assess the performance of students within Devon education authority at general certificate of secondary education level; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: It is for the Devon education authority and individual schools to assess the implications of the GCSE achievements of their pupils for school and local authority policies and practices. I hope that they will have particular regard to the recently published national report on the introduction of the GCSE from Her Majesty's inspectorate, as well as their own monitoring, and consider ways in which they can contribute to improving the GCSE.

50. Mr. Ken Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what response he has received from teachers' organisations concerning the GCSE examinations; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: Ministers and officials have had discussions with teacher organisations on the introduction of the GCSE on a number of occasions. I welcome their continuing contribution to improving the GCSE.

61. Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to discuss with local education authorities the provision of resources for the GCSE examination; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has discussed the resource implications of the introduction of the GCSE with representatives of the local authorities on a number of occasions. The Government's expenditure plans for 1987-88 and 1988-89 allowed in full for what the local authorities themselves said would be needed. The expenditure plans for 1989-90 announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his autumn statement take account of the continuing needs of schools now that the GCSE has been successfully introduced.

77. Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he plans to make any alterations in 1989 in the arrangements for the publication of GCSE results.

Mrs. Rumbold: The issuing of GCSE results is the responsibility of the independent GCSE examining groups. My right hon. Friend has made clear to them that late results cannot be tolerated. The groups have undertaken to improve their administrative arrangements for next year.

Schools (Opting Out)

28. Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what advice he gives to local education authorities which are in the process of reorganising secondary education about opting out by secondary schools.

Mr. Butcher: My right hon. Friend has made it clear that local education authorities remain responsible for the organisation of educational provision within their areas and should continue to take steps to rationalise provision where appropriate in accordance with the guidance in the Department's circular 3/87. If a school does not have a viable future as a local authority-maintained school its governors are unlikely to be able to convince my right hon. Friend that it would become viable as a grant-maintained school.

64. Mr. John L. Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the current number of schools showing an interest in the opting-out provisions of the Education Act 1988.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer my right hon. Friend gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham).

Special Educational Needs

29. Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how he proposes to ensure that the interests of children with special educational needs are represented on school governing bodies.

Mrs. Rumbold: Governors have a specific responsibility under the 1981 Education Act to ensure that appropriate provision is made for children with special educational needs.

Polytechnic Students

25. Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many students are currently enrolled in polytechnics in the United Kingdom; and what are his projections for the numbers for the next five years.

Mr. Jackson: Information for higher education student numbers at polytechnics and colleges in Great Britain is shown in the table.

Thousands

	Academic year beginning in 1987 provisional	1988	1989	1990 projected	1991	1992
Full-time and part-time students	330	338	351	356	356	352

Salaries

30. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on his future plans for the salaries of heads, deputy heads and other teachers.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend gave the interim advisory committee on school teachers' pay and conditions its remit for 1989-90 in September. The remit specifically asked the committee to give advice on what modifications should be made to the pay of heads and deputies, taking into account in particular the introduction of local management schemes for schools. The remit also asked the committee to give advice on what the general pay increase to all teachers should be and what modifications should be made to the system of selective payments. The committee is due to report to my right hon. Friend by mid-February at the latest.

Students (Higher Education)

31. Mr. Franks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the current numbers of students entering universities and polytechnics in the current year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The numbers of home initial entrants to universities and other higher education institutions in Great Britain in 1987, the latest year for which figures are available, are provisionally estimated at 72,000 and 98,000 respectively. The total is the highest ever, and the Government remain committed to the further widening of access to higher education.

Grammar Schools (Admission Policy)

32. Mr. Barry Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what guidance he has given to local education authorities regarding priority admission for local pupils to grammar schools which have set an entry standard and are now subject to more open enrolment as a result of the Education Act 1988.

Mr. Butcher: The Department's circular No. 11/88, offering guidance on the admission of pupils to county and voluntary schools, issued to all local education authorities and others concerned on 20 October. Under the provisions of the Education Reform Act, local education authorities and school governors will still be able to operate whatever selection arrangements seem appropriate for deciding which pupils are suitable for a grammar school education, but they will not be able to set an admissions limit for those pupils which is below a school's assessed capacity. If the school does not have the capacity to admit all the eligible applicants, priority may be decided in accordance with any reasonable criteria, published beforehand. Such criteria might, for example, give priority to applicants living nearest to the school.

School Playgrounds

33. Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to seek to improve the standards of safety provision in school playgrounds.

Mr. Butcher: Safety standards are primarily the responsibility of the local education authority concerned. My Department has sought information from authorities about safety in school playgrounds; it is not yet clear whether guidance on achieving higher standards of safety is required. The situation is under review in consultation with the Health and Safety Executive.

School Governing Bodies

34. Dr. Twinn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has on the appointment of governing bodies for schools under the terms of the Education Act 1986.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst).

Senior Civil Servants

36. Mr. Greenit: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to seek to increase the numbers of his senior civil servants who were educated at state schools.

Mrs. Rumbold: Senior civil servants reach their rank on the basis of their performance. This will continue to be the case.

School Closures

37. Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will review the procedures for school closures; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Bristol, South (Ms. Primarolo).

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Blackburn, on 20 October, Official Report, column 1000, he will place in the Library a copy of his letter of reply and enclosures relating to school closures and reorganisations.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I am arranging for a copy of my reply and enclosures to be placed in the Library.

Student Finance

38. Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to publish his report on student finance; and if he will make a statement.

49. Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he intends to publish his White Paper concerning student loans; and if he will make a statement.

73. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to publish his report on student finance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on his Department's plans with regard to financial support for students in higher and further education.

Mr. Jackson: I refer the hon. Members to the answer my right hon. Friend gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith).

Teachers (Recruitment)

39. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to increase recruitment to the teaching profession; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to increase recruitment to the teaching profession; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: The Government already have an energetic campaign, focused on the secondary shortage subjects, to increase recruitment to teaching. The campaign includes a special bursary of £1,300 for trainee teachers of mathematics, physics, CDT and technology, and vigorous publicity and recruitment activities. The latter are directed by our teaching as a career unit (TASC) which is actively promoting teaching as a career to undergraduates, to school pupils and to older people contemplating a career change.

52. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to meet representatives of local education authorities to discuss the recruitment of teachers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: My right hon. Friend has no such plans at present, but officials hold such meetings from time to time to discuss these matters. Our teacher recruitment activities are spearheaded by the teaching as a career unit (TASC) which operates in conjunction with the local authority associations and whose members work very closely with individual education authorities. The unit has recently completed a series of regional seminars to discuss recruitment policies with authorities.

16-Year-Olds (Further Education)

41. Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to seek to increase the staying-on rate at the age of 16 years; and if he will make a statement.

71. Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to seek to increase the staying-on rate at the age of 16-years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: I refer the hon. Members to the reply which my hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold) gave to the hon. Members for Burnley (Mr. Pike) and for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) on 21 June at column 530.

Research

42. Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the expenditure on research commissioned by Government Departments, other than through the science budget of the Natural Environment Research Council in 1986-87, 1987-88 and planned for 1988-89, all in 1988-89 prices.

Mr. Jackson: The figures at 1988-89 prices are as follows:

	£ million
1986-87	25·9
1987-88	22·9
1988-89	20·1

Foreign Language Teaching

44. Mr. Holt: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science in how many (a) primary, (b) secondary and (c) higher schools/colleges/universities (i) Japanese, (ii) Chinese, (iii) Arabic and (iv) Korean will be taught during the current academic year.

Mr. Jackson: The available information is given in the table. It relates to universities, and to polytechnics and other colleges of further and higher education. Comparable information in not available centrally in respect of schools.

Natural Environment Research Council

47. Dr. Reid: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the expenditure in the science budget of the Natural Environment Research Council in 1986-87, 1987-88, and planned for 1988-89 in 1988-89 prices, other than on the British Antarctic Survey.

Mr. Jackson: The science budget spend and planning figures at 1988-89 prices, excluding BAS are as follows:

	£ million
1986-87	65·2
1987-88	62·7
1988-89	67·0

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the Natural Environment Research Council; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. Friend last met members of the council when he visited the royal research vessel Challenger in the pool of London in May. A range of matters concerning the council's activities was discussed. I also refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace).

Scientific Research

48. Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a further statement on future policy on the funding of scientific research.

Mr. Jackson: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply which my right hon. Friend gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) on 1 November at columns 605-10.

Student Loans

51. Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will indicate what representations he has received in respect of student loans; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: Since 1 July, about 80. The Government's proposals for the future of student support will be published shortly.

School Transport

53. Mr. Nicholas Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will bring forward proposals to review the present law relating to school transport.

Mr. Butcher: My right hon. Friend has no such plans at present.

Parent Governors

55. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of places on school governing bodies in secondary schools in England and Wales reserved for parents have been filled; and what training is available to such governors.

Mrs. Rumbold: The information available so far from local authorities suggests that most schools are successfully filling the places on their governing bodies reserved for parents.

The provision of training for governors is the responsibility of local education authorities. The Government will be supporting nearly £5 million of local authority expenditure on governor training through education support grant in the financial year 1989-90. It is also sponsoring specific initiatives to provide training materials and information for governors.

"The New Teacher in School"

56. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to respond to Her Majesty's inspectors' report, "The New Teacher in School," published on 24 October.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has already commented in a press release at the time of publication of the report. It is not the practice for him to respond formally to such reports.

Student Unions

57. Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the progress of his review of financing of student unions.

Mr. Jackson: I refer to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Mr. Amess) on 26 October at column 213.

Industry-funded Scholarships

58. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of undergraduates in England and Wales in 1987-88 were funded wholly or partially by industry-funded scholarships; and what plans he has to encourage a greater number of such scholarships.

Mr. Jackson: Information about the proportion of students in receipt of industrial scholarships is not available. Students in receipt of mandatory awards may receive sponsorship or scholarship income up to a specified limit without any corresponding reduction in their grant. In keeping with the Government's policy of encouraging links between industry and higher education, the amount of scholarship income which is disregarded in assessing entitlement to grant has been substantially increased in recent years.

Surplus Places

59. Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether his Department has produced any estimate of the cost of surplus places in primary and secondary education; and if he will make a statement.

74. Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether his Department has produced any estimate of the cost of surplus places in (a) primary and (b) secondary education; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: The premises-related costs of retaining a surplus primary and secondary place are estimated at £120 and £200 a year, respectively. There are additional but unquantified teaching costs.

Academics (Research)

62. Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will issue guidelines to universities relating to the temporary release of academics to assist in the exploitation of their research.

Mr. Jackson: No. Such release is a management matter for individual universities.

City Technology College, Brent

63. Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on plans to establish a city technology college in the London borough of Brent.

Mrs. Rumbold: The London borough of Brent is one of a number of London boroughs being considered with sponsors as a suitable area for the establishment of a city technology college.

Inner London Education Authority

65. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make available to inner London boroughs sufficient grant to enable the Inner London education authority voluntary sector funding to continue after April 1990.

Mrs. Rumbold: It will in general be for the inner London councils to consider what support they will give to the work of education voluntary organisations in inner London after April 1990. The Government are however making available grant of £500,000 a year for three years to the headquarters bodies of voluntary organisations to support their co-ordinating role in inner London.

Inner London Boroughs (Education Functions)

66. Ms. Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make available sufficient capital grant to allow inner London boroughs to acquire and equip new administrative buildings for their new education functions.

Mrs. Rumbold: To the extent that their existing accommodation or capital resources are insufficient for the proper housing of their education departments, it will be open to inner London councils to apply to my right hon. Friend for the transfer of suitable ILEA property from April 1990. The Department is arranging discussions with councils to assess their accommodation requirements and the ways in which these might be met; any request for other forms of assistance could be considered only in the light of those assessments.

Carbon Dioxide Absorption (Oceans)

67. Mr. Frank Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the value of those research proposals graded A by the biochemical ocean flux study of the Natural Environment Research Council which are currently unfunded, which are directly relevant to the absorption of carbon dioxide in the oceans, and to the carbon cycle generally.

Mr. Jackson: I am informed that the cost of unfunded research within phase 1 of the NERC biogeochemical ocean flux study, lasting until March 1992, is £2·7 million. The NERC is committing £6·97 million to the programme and £0·37 million has been obtained externally. All of this work is directly relevant to furthering our understanding of the global carbon cycle and the absorption of carbon dioxide in the oceans.

Student Fees

69. Mr. Buckley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to change the method of setting student fees in higher education; and if he will make a statement.

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has received any representations concerning the payment of tuition fees in higher education; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The Government have no proposal to require students in receipt of mandatory awards to meet part of their tuition fees. However, my right hon. Friend is considering the possibility of some shift from block grant to tuition fees in the public funding of higher education institutions.

Neutron and Proton Therapy

70. Dr. Bray: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what advice has been given by the Medical Research Council on the effectiveness and cost of neutron and proton therapy by comparison with conventional x-ray therapy in the treatment of cancer.

76. Mr. Harry Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what advice the Medical Research Council gave on the use of a cyclotron to be used in the treatment of cancer by neutron and proton therapy.

Mr. Jackson: The Medical Research Council is currently undertaking full-scale clinical trials, using neutrons generated from a cyclotron, of the efficacy of neutron therapy in the treatment of cancers. The council will publish substantive conclusions in the early 1990s when the trials have been completed. The council is planning to begin clinical trials of proton therapy, using protons generated from a cyclotron, in 1989.

Leicester University and Polytechnic

75. Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to take steps to increase the level of funding for Leicester university and polytechnic; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: From 1989-90 onwards, the public funding of these institutions will be the resposibility of the Universities Funding Council and the Polytechnics and Colleges Funding Council under the Education Reform Act 1988. That Act specifically precludes my right hon. Friend from influencing the funding of named institutions without parliamentary authority.

School-Commerce-Industry (Links)

78. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a further statement on the part which education authorities are playing in the promotion of links between schools and commerce and industry.

Mr. Butcher: Local education authorities are playing an active part in encouraging and facilitating the development of links between schools and businesses. The recent report of the CBI business-education task force suggested that industry should now do more to foster such links, particularly in the light of the forthcoming reduction in school leavers entering the job market.

Expenditure (Staffordshire)

79. Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much was spent per pupil in primary schools in Staffordshire in the most recent year for which figures are available; and how this compares with the figure in 1978-79, at constant prices.

Mr. Butcher: Staffordshire spent an average of £717 per primary pupil in 1978-79 and £880 per primary pupil in 1986-87. The figure for the earlier year has been repriced to 1986-87 prices using the gross domestic product (market prices) deflator.

Qualified Teacher Status

80. Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what responses he has had to the consultation document on qualified teacher status.

Mrs. Rumbold: Responses to the consultation document on qualified teacher status were requested by 14 October. Over 200 have been received. My right hon. Friend will now give careful consideration to the points raised.

Brent

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many schoolchildren resident in the London borough of Brent were being educated in September 1988 in (a) the London borough of Barnet, (b) the London borough of Harrow, (c) the London borough of Brent and (d) elsewhere.

Mr. Butcher: Information about the numbers of school pupils in maintained schools in each local education authority derives from a pupil census carried out in January of each year. As of January 1988, the totals requested were as follows:

The number of school children resident in the London borough of Brent and being educated in

	Number
(a) London Borough of Barnet	1,381
(b) London Borough of Harrow	1,183
(c) London Borough of Brent	28,225
(d) Elsewhere	2,966

Daresbury Laboratory

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much of the increase in the grant for science research will be allocated to the Daresbury laboratory near Warrington.

Mr. Jackson: As my right hon. Friend said in his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. James Pawsey) on 1 November at columns 605-10, he will be inviting the Advisory Board for the Research Councils to advise him on the allocation of the money now available. It is of course for the councils themselves to decide the level of funding for their own establishments, including the Daresbury laboratory.

Museum Education Services

Mr. Faulds: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has reconsidered the proposals that schools should pay for museum education services in place of the previous arrangements whereby local education authorities funded such services.

Mr. Butcher: Circular 7/88, issued on 6 September, makes it clear that local education authorities will be free to except from delegation the school-related costs of museum education services under schemes for local management of schools. Where authorities exercise this discretion, they will continue to fund the museum services directly. Where authorities choose to delegate the costs to schools, the schools themselves will decide whether they wish to continue to support the services.

Teacher Shortages (London)

Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he intends to introduce any new initiative to reduce teacher shortages in Greater London.

Mr. Butcher: Our teacher recruitment campaign continues to focus on the areas where shortages are most marked, including London and the south-east. The programme includes advertising, conferences and exhibitions designed to promote the attractions of teaching and improve recruitment to initial teacher training. Officials of my Department and the teaching as a career unit continue to be in close contact with the LEAs and institutions involved in teacher recruitment and training in Greater London.

Sports

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he plans to take to monitor the standards of sports tuition in schools.

Mrs. Rumbold: Physical education, of which sport is a component, is a foundation subject in the national curriculum. Programmes of study, attainment targets or guidelines and assessment arrangements will be established as appropriate for PE in due course. The National Curriculum Council and the School Examinations and Assessment Council will respectively advise my right hon. Friend on all aspects of the school curriculum and on examinations, assessment and testing in schools. Her Majesty's inspectorate will also continue to monitor standards as part of its programme of visits to and inspections of schools.

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he plans to take to encourage teachers to take advantage of the training schemes offered by the various national sporting bodies for teachers and supervisors.

Mrs. Rumbold: It is for LEAs and schools to consider the in-service training needs of their staff, in relation to their resources. The LEA training grant scheme provides specific grant support for a range of national priority areas and for locally determined priorities.

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what estimate he has made of the number of school teachers undertaking the teaching of sports for which they have no specialist qualification.

Mrs. Rumbold: In January 1984, the latest date for which figures are available for maintained secondary schools in England, there were an estimated 40,500 full and part-time teachers who taught physical education (including sport). Of these teachers, 42 per cent. did not hold a post A-level qualification in the subject, and they were responsible for 12 per cent. of the tuition in physical education.

Rural Primary Schools

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received about small rural primary schools.

Mr. Butcher: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer which my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) gave to him on 21 June at column 522.

Intelligence Testing

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement concerning the educational objectives of his announced programme of intelligence testing; and what evidence he has in his possession that suggests that such tests are a reliable guide to (a) future performance in any skill, (b) general ability in any branch of knowledge or (c) effective discharge of occupational responsibility.

Mrs. Rumbold: The national assessment arrangements are not a programme of intelligence testing. They will assess by reference to clear attainment targets what pupils know, understand and can do in a range of subjects. There is widespread evidence that the setting of clear objectives accompanied by rigorous assessment and reporting can make a significant contribution to improving pupils' motivation and performance.

Rating Reform

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if the Government will meet any costs incurred by Scottish universities in subsidising the payment of community charge by overseas students in the year 1989-90.

Mr. Jackson: No. It is for individual universities to determine the terms on which they recruit overseas students.

Student Shortages

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what evidence his Department has collected, on data available to it on teacher shortages; and if he will place this in the Library.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: "Action on Teacher Supply in Mathematics, Physics and Technology", issued in July 1986, analysed the position in those subjects in some detail. A copy is in the Library. On more recent data, I have arranged for tables showing primary and secondary vacant posts analysed by region and by subject, as at January 1988, to be placed in the Library. Further data including tables drawn from the 1987 primary school staffing survey, and on the current match between teachers' qualifications and what they teach drawn from the results of the 1988 secondary school staffing survey, will be available in due course.

Education and Industry

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what measures his Department intends taking to improve the link between education and industry in rural areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: My Department encourages the development of links between education and industry in all areas. In rural areas, links with farms and local shops and enterprises may be appropriate; but there will often also be opportunities for establishing links with industry in nearby towns.

Antarctic Survey

Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the Government's plans for the Natural Environment Research Council's British Antarctic survey; whether any part of the additional monies that he has made available to the science budget will be allocated to the survey; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The Government's aim is to sustain the outstanding scientific research carried out by NERC's British Antarctic survey, as part of the United Kingdom's due contribution to a better understanding of the natural environment and man's impact on it. Thus part of the additional expenditure over the three years will be used to enhance the survey's air facility at the Rothera station, the main base for geophysics work. The present ice skiway will be replaced by a gravel airstrip. This will increase the range of weather conditions within which the present Twin Otter aircraft can safely operate and the size of aircraft that can use the runway. An additional, larger aircraft will be purchased, greatly extending the range of the survey's geological field survey parties within the British Antarctic territory.

There will also be additional expenditure for the rebuilding of the Halley station which is the main centre for continuing the survey's important study of the ozone hole that develops over Antarctica during the Austral spring. The weight of compacted ice has greatly reduced the safe life of the existing buildings; and rebuilding is proving more difficult than expected because of the deterioration of the ice shelf near the base. It is important that the new accommodation should be completed as quickly as possible to ensure that there is no break in the continuous monitoring of the weather and of the ionospheric conditions.

I have accordingly allocated an additional £10 million in 1989-90 with planning additions for a further £8 million in 1990-91 and £5 million in 1991-92. These sums will be made available for the survey through the Natural Environment Research Council.

PRIME MINISTER

Iwerne Minster

Q19. Mr. Nicholas Baker: To ask the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to Iwerne Minster.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

President-elect (USA)

Q46. Mr. Latham: To ask the Prime Minister when she first expects to meet the President-elect of the United States of America.

The Prime Minister: I expect to meet the President-elect during my visit to the United States from 16-17 November.

Child Benefit

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Prime Minister how many letters she has received (a) supporting and (b) opposing the Government's intentions not to increase child benefit.

The Prime Minister: I have received a number of representations both supporting and opposing the Government's intentions not to increase child benefit.

Engagements

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 November.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 November.

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 November.

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 November.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. I was present at Victoria station to mark the arrival of the President of Senegal. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

DEFENCE

Tornado

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to place orders for further Tornado aircraft for the Royal Air Force.

Mr. Sainsbury: I am pleased to announce that, subject to the satisfactory resolution of contractual and other issues, we intend to order a further 26 Tornado GR1 and 15 Tornado F3 aircraft. These aircraft will sustain the RAF's Tornado force into the next century.

Nuclear Weapons Convoys

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will now make it his policy to answer questions relating to the frequency, timing and content of nuclear weapons convoys.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No. I intend to maintain the policy of successive Governments of not commenting, for obvious security reasons, on the movement of nuclear weapons.

Salisbury Plain (Incident)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the incident on 30 October on the Salisbury plain training area in which a smoke grenade was discharged on a road by United States Air Force personnel at a time when the ranges were open to members of the public.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The incident is being investigated. If disciplinary action is necessary it will be taken by the appropriate authorities. At this stage it appears that USAF personnel were not involved.

Reach (Incident)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he will take to protect members of the public from debris falling from aircraft, following the recent fall of a piece from a United States Air Force F-111 near Reach; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: During a routine USAF F-111 training flight on 26 October, the flap guide vane of one of the wings, comprising a small strip of light aluminium, became detached and fell to the ground near Reach, Cambridgeshire. No injury or property damage has been reported. All possible steps are taken to minimise the risk associated with military aircraft training of this kind, which is essential to NATO's policy of deterrence. These arrangements are kept under constant review.

VME Computers (Security)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information is held or processed by the VME computers at his Department's Bureau West at Devizes; if any of this information is subject to security classifications; and if any security measures are taken to prevent unauthorised access to the system while it is left unattended.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Bureau West provides computer support to a large number of areas within MoD. As a result, the bureau holds a great diversity of information, both classified and unclassified, in its computer systems. It would be neither practicable nor in the interests of security to list it. Security measures are taken to prevent unauthorised access to these systems both while they are attended and while they are unattended.

AWRE Aldermaston (Alert)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the alert at the atomic weapons research establishment, Aldermaston on the afternoon of 28 October; what information he has regarding the cause of this alert; at what point the alert state ended; how many similar alerts there have been in the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) on 3 November at column 740. In addition, I can now confirm that the cause of the alarm was an electrical short circuit. The work force was able to re-enter the building at 4·22 pm. There have been five similar alarms in the past five years. All have been false alarms.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether local emergency services are involved in contingency plans in case of accident at the atomic weapons research establishment, Aldermaston.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The atomic weapons establishment at Aldermaston maintains close liaison with local authorities, the police, fire and other emergency services. This includes arrangements for the use of local and service hospitals.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how long after the alarm system at the atomic weapons research establishment, Aldermaston had indicated an emergency situation on 28 October the local fire and police were informed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) on 3 November at column 740.

Combat Body Armour Vests

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if there has been any change in his Department's previously announced plans to procure 15,000 combat body armour vests in the financial year 1989-90; and when he plans to meet the services' total requirement.

Mr. Sainsbury: The answer to the first part of the question is no. However, our procurement plans for new equipment are subject to the annual review of the defence programme as a whole and combat body armour is no exception. On current plans the present procurement programme is expected to take about six years to complete.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Equal Opportunities

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any decisions have been made regarding the legislation covered by the Equal Opportunities Commission's formal proposals: "Equal Treatment for Men and Women—Strengthening the Acts", which were sent to the Government in March.

Mr. John Patten: Not yet.

Foreign Nationals (Military Training)

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what controls are operated over foreign nationals coming to Britain to receive military or military-related training from private companies; what records are kept of such applications; and on what occasions since 1980 visas for such persons have been refused.

Mr. Renton: The general position is that, under the immigration rules, any overseas national who can satisfy the immigration officer that he is genuinely seeking entry for only a limited period, and that he can maintain and accommodate himself during his stay, may be admitted for a temporary period unless in the circumstances of a particular case there are grounds for his exclusion. In addition certain overseas military personnel may be exempt from immigration control under the provisions of the 1971 Act relating to members of visiting forces. No separate records are kept of numbers of individuals seeking admission for the purposes described.

Destination Docklands Concerts

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the approximate cost to the Metropolitan police of (a) their preparations for the Destination Docklands concerts on 8 and 9 October and (b) related operations on those days.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 19 October 1988]: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the estimated additional cost of preparatory work for these concerts was £11,000. This cost comprises overtime worked by officers posted to the concert office. The additional policing costs on the days of the concerts were given in my reply to a question from the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on 19 October at column 884.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Postal Disputes

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what information he has as to how many industrial disputes have disrupted postal services in London during the past year.

Mr. Forth: Industrial action by postal workers is an operational matter for the Post Office Board. However, it has informed me that, during the period November 1987 to October 1988, there have been a total of 55 industrial disputes within the letters business, four within the parcels business and eight within the counters business which affected postal services in the numbered London postal districts.

Post Office Counters Ltd. (Property)

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is his estimate of the value of the freehold and long leasehold sites occupied by Post Office Counters Ltd.; when this estimate was made and on whose advice; and what information he has as to estimates which have been made of the redevelopment value of these properties, the dates on which they were made and by whom.

Mr. Forth: I refer my hon. Friend to page 79 of the Post Office annual report and accounts 1987-88 for the information he has requested on the values of freehold and long leasehold sites occupied by Post Office Counters Ltd., together with the dates on which these valuations were made and on whose advice. No general information is available on the redevelopment value of property owned or leased by Post Office Counters Ltd. This is considered on an individual basis when appropriate.

Disabled People

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many applications he has received in each year since 1984, for grants to promote the interests of disabled people under the terms of section 93 of the Telecommunications Act 1984; by whom the applications were submitted; in each case, what was the size of the grant requested and the purpose for which it was required; and which of the applications were successful.

Mr. Atkins: One application has been received. This was made in 1986 under the "private branch exchange for visually handicapped operators scheme", a scheme set up under the terms of section 93 of the Act. The applicant was Norton Telecommunications Ltd. The grant requested was for £25,000 to support the adaptation of the console of Norton's MCX exchange for use by visually handicapped operators. The application was successful.

Rolls-Royce plc

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has received from the Commission of the European Economic Community concerning the proportion of golden shares held by Her Majesty's Government in Rolls-Royce plc.

Mr. Atkins: The European Commission has raised with my Department the compatibility with the treaty of Rome of the 15 per cent. limit on foreign shareholdings which is imposed by Rolls-Royce's articles of association and is protected by the special share that the Government holds in the company. The Government are convinced that this provision is justified by article 223 of the treaty, which allows any member state to take such measures as it considers necessary to protect its national security interests. Discussions are continuing between my Department and the Commission on this issue.

Manufactured Goods (Trade Deficit)

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what was the trade deficit in manufactured goods over the most recent 12 months for which figures are available; and what part of this was in respect of trade with the European Economic Community.

Mr. Alan Clark: Figures for United Kingdom trade in manufactures with the EC and with the world are in the table:

British Steel

Ms. Lestor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give figures for money budgeted and spent to date on the floation and privatisation of British Steel, including separate figures for (a) advertising, (b) underwriting, (c) marketing and (d) any other fees.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 31 October 1988]: I have been asked to reply.

A token estimate of £1,000 (class V, vote 8) makes provision for Her Majesty's Government expenses in connection with the privatisation of British Steel. Expenses will be met from receipts from the sale, appropriated in aid of the vote. A spring supplementary estimate will be presented later in the year to provide details of the final costs.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Social Security (Decisions)

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Attorney-General when the bound volume of decisions of the social security commissioners for 1985, 1986 and 1987, respectively, will be available.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I have been asked to reply.

The office of the chief adjudication officer is responsible for organising the printing of bound volumes of commissioners' reported decisions, and I understand that the set for 1985-86 is expected to be available in January 1989. It is expected that the set for 1987-88 will be issued in about two years' time.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Land Registration

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the current fees for land registration for the following price ranges: £30,000, £40,000, £50,000, and £60,000.

Mr. Needham: The information requested is contained in the Land Registry (Fees) Order (Northern Ireland) 1982 (SR 1982 No. 2), a copy of which is available in the Library.

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applications for land registration were made in each of the years 1980 to 1987, inclusive.

Mr. Needham: Statistics showing the exact number of applications received in the Land Registry during the financial years 1980-81 to 1983-84 inclusive are not available. The figures for these years have been calculated based on statistics showing the average daily intake in each of the years multiplied by the number of working days in the year.

The following table sets out the applications received:

Financial year	Applications received
1980-81	10,750
1981-82	15,250
1982-83	19,250
1983-84	21,000
1984-85	25,708
1985-86	27,124
1986-87	28,070
1987-88	29,005

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applications for land registrations were made in 1988 to date; how many have been processed; and how many have still to be processed.

Mr. Needham: A total of 24,909 applications were received in the Land Registry during the period 4 January 1988 to 29 October 1988—13,758 of these have been completed leaving 11,151 still awaiting completion.

Autistic Children

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what budgetary provision has been made for autistic children within the south eastern education and library board in each of the years 1980-81 to 1988-89, inclusive;

(2) what budgetary provision has been made for autistic children within the southern education and library board in each of the years 1980-81 to 1988-89, inclusive.

Dr. Mawhinney: Autistic children are placed at one of the special schools or special units at primary or secondary schools which can cater for pupils with a wide range of special educational needs. It is not possible to identify separately the relevant expenditure.

Special Educational Needs

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what percentage of the educational budget has been allocated to children with special educational needs in each of the years 1980-81 to 1988-89, inclusive;

(2) what percentage of the educational budget has been allocated to children with special educational needs in each of the years 1980-81 to 1987-88, inclusive.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information in the form requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what schools within the southern education and library board cater for children with special educational needs;

(2) what schools within the south eastern education and library board cater for children with special educational needs.

MV Portaferry

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the present weight restriction on the MV Portaferry at Strangford Lough ferry crossing; what are the implications for transport of commercial goods; and if he will make a statement on the future development of the Strangford Lough ferry.

Mr. Needham: The MV Portaferry, which is operating the Strangford Lough ferry service while the main vessel is undergoing its annual overhaul, is restricted to carrying a total weight of 22 tonnes with no vehicle exceeding a gross vehicle weight of 8 tonnes. The vehicle weight restriction, which is being applied for safety reasons, means that operators and drivers of heavy commercial vehicles have to make alternative travel arrangements for a period.

The Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland plans to continue to run as reliable a ferry service as is reasonably possible.

Local Government Services (Competitive Tendering)

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to introduce competitive tendering for local government services in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 7 November 1988]: Many of the 26 district councils in Northern Ireland do not employ professional staff or sizeable direct labour forces; therefore capital works and building repairs are already usually contracted out. I am considering what measures may be appropriate to further promote competitive tendering for local government services in Northern Ireland.

Benefits

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give, for the constituency of Newry and Armagh (a) the numbers of unemployed claimants claiming unemployment benefit only, (b) the numbers claiming unemployment benefit and income support and (c) the numbers claiming only income support, for the latest available date.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 1 November 1988]: The information can be provided only in relation to the catchment areas of the Newry and Armagh social security offices and is as follows:

Position at 27 October 1988

Numbers of unemployed claimants claiming	Newry social security offices	Armagh social security offices
Unemployment Benefit only	661	428
Unemployment Benefit and Income Support	201	100
Income Support only	4,297	2,063

TRANSPORT

Driving Tests, Portsmouth

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the average waiting time for a driving test in Portsmouth.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The current waiting time for a test at Portsmouth driving test centre is 15 weeks. This is too long. We cannot accommodate any more examiners at the centre (there are currently seven there). We are looking for other premises to meet demand. Earlier tests are available at Gosport.

Drivers (Insurance Statistics)

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has on discrimination against older drivers by motor insurance companies.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It is for individual insurers to decide whether to insure a particular driver, and if so on what terms. Insurance companies often offer older drivers more favourable terms because of their greater experience and relatively low exposure to risk.

Veteran and Vintage Cars

Mr. Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the effect of harmonisation with EEC legislation on the right to drive veteran and vintage cars on British roads.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There is no EEC legislation, nor are there any proposals to restrict the use of historic vehicles on British roads.

Utilities (Road Repairs)

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he proposes to introduce a Bill to implement the proposals contained in the Horne report; and if he will make it his policy to include a penalty clause to ensure that public utilities complete work to a set standard or otherwise meet the cost of remedial work.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It is proposed that utilities should be made entirely responsible for reinstating the highway following their excavation work. They would have to comply with new national specifications for reinstatement and meet objective standards of performance for the repaired road surface. Utilities would be required to make good, at their expense, any reinstatements which fall outside these standards during a warranty period.

Highway authorities would have certain powers in the event of default to ensure that defective reinstatements are corrected at the utilities' expense, and promptly where the defect is a hazard to road users.

Legislation will be introduced as soon as a suitable opportunity can be found.

Airport Delays

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has on delays to passengers using (i) Heathrow airport, (ii) Gatwick and (iii) Luton.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information sought by my hon. Friend is not held centrally; I suggest that he approaches the airports concerned.

Motorways

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the cost of the construction of the length of the M5 between junctions 18 and 19.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The final account for the construction work was settled in 1979 at a total cost of £11·9 million.

Driver Licensing (EC Directive)

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what will be the effect of the second directive on driver licensing on voluntary and community service operations involving the transport of blind or handicapped persons by volunteers; when the directive will come before the Council of Ministers; if it will be determined by majority vote; and what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government on this aspect of the directive;

(2) what representations he has had from charitable and voluntary bodies on the impact on their work of the second directive on driver licensing;

(3) if he will invite the European Economic Community Commission to make plain the manner in which the proposed controls on minibus drivers in so far as they affect voluntary and charitable bodies in the United Kingdom will play a part in the promotion of the internal market; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I wrote to my hon. Friend on 7 October.

The United Kingdom is committed to bringing its driver licensing system into line with other EC member states in accordance with the terms of the first EC directive on driver licensing (EC/1263/80). A second directive to complete the process is expected shortly. This is likely to require the introduction of common categories of driving entitlement on the lines formulated in the Vienna convention on road traffic in 1968.

The Vienna categories reduce the thresholds for vocational entitlement to include vehicles with more than eight passenger seats and light goods vehicles above 3·5 tonnes. Although existing drivers would not be affected, the introduction of these thresholds would mean that new drivers of minibuses and light goods vehicles would have to take a second test and meet higher standards of fitness.

Responses to the Department's consultation issued earlier this year indicated widespread concern among voluntary and community service organisations who depend on volunteer drivers. The operations of many such organisations would be severely curtailed because of the difficulty in getting volunteers with the required entitlement or the cost of training drivers to the higher standard. Since April, the Department has received over 600 letters on this subject with some 75 letters from MPs and MEPs.

The Government have made it clear to the European Commission that the proposed thresholds would create serious difficulties. The Commission has been formally advised of the need to preserve the existing arrangements for minibus drivers in the United Kingdom. Interested bodies are alerting their opposite numbers in other countries and pointing out the advantages of the United Kingdom arrangements for voluntary and community operations. A demonstration and a cavalcade of minibuses to Brussels is being planned by the various organisations for December.

The second directive is expected to come before the Council of Ministers very shortly. It is not expected that any single Member will be able to block the proposals.

Railway Line Closures

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what approaches, and with respect to which rural lines in Lancashire and Yorkshire, British Rail has approached him with regard to their potential closure; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: British Rail has not made any proposals to close rural lines in Lancashire and Yorkshire other than the Settle-Carlisle line.

M65-M6/61 Link

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the current position with regard to the building of the M65 to M6/61 link; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We intend to publish statutory orders early next year. Construction could start in 1992.

Buses (Door Accidents)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 28 October 1987, Official Report, column 215, if he will make a statement about progress towards eliminating bus door accidents; and what are the latest figures for accidents involving people trapped in the centre doors of driver-only buses.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding reply 2 November 1988]: We shall shortly be consulting on draft regulations to consolidate and simplify the present bus regulations. We propose to include provisions to reduce the risk of people getting trapped in power-operated doors.

The national figures asked for are not available. I understand that last year LRT was notified of some 300 incidents involving people trapped in the centre doors of one-person-operated buses, not all involving injury. The total number of boarding or alighting accidents for LRT's one-person-operated buses was 801 last year, compared with 922 on crew-operated buses. The number of accidents per million passenger miles as 0·85 on one-person-operated buses and 4·78 on crew-operated buses.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Authorities (Inaccurate Information)

Mr. Heddle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to monitor the publicity being sent by local authorities to their tenants regarding the provisions of the Housing Bill; and what action he is taking to counteract misleading and inaccurate information.

Mr. Trippier: I am grateful to hon. Members and members of the public who bring examples of misleading information about the Housing Bill to our attention. Prior to Royal Assent, we have made available copies of factual leaflets on the main provisions in the Bill; and I and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State have written to all tenants in the six proposed housing action trust areas to explain the Government's proposals. We intend to issue a considerable amount of explanatory information about the provisions in the Housing Bill in the months following Royal Assent, and we are making grants to the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux and to the Federation of Independent Advice Centres to train advice workers about the Bill. It is for local authorities to take equal responsibility for what they publish. Parliament has now approved the code of recommended practice on local authority publicity which established a benchmark against which local authorities are required to judge their proposed publicity.

Lead Water Pipes

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many (a) homes and (b) other buildings in London still have water supplied through lead pipes.

Mr. Moynihan: This information is not available. However, approximately 1·0 million of the homes in the Greater London area were constructed before 1945 and would therefore have contained lead pipes. A good number of these pipes will have been replaced by now.

Rating Reform

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of (a) the average community charge payment in 1988-89, and (b) the average community charge for income support claimants in 1989-90.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The community charge will not be introduced in England until 1990-91.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to publish regulations regarding the community charge in England.

Mr. Gummer: Draft regulations on information for the purposes of compiling the register, inspection of the register, and the billing arrangements for community charges were sent to a number of bodies on 28 October for comment. I am arranging for copies of the draft regulations to be placed in the Library of the House. Regulations on a number of other topics will be circulated for comment shortly.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the anticipated community charge payable by Liverpool city council on properties which have been vacant for more than the statutory period over the course of the first 12 months following the introduction of the community charge.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 7 November 1988]: Domestic property which is not used as a sole or main residence will give rise to a standard community charge, calculated as a multiple of the personal community charge for the area. The multiplier for properties which are vacant for up to three months will be set at zero. Charging authorities will have the discretion to set a multiplier of 0, $\frac{1}{2}$, 1, $1\frac{1}{2}$ or 2 for properties which are vacant for more than three months. The total amount payable in standard community charges by Liverpool city council on such properties will therefore depend on the use it makes of this discretion, the number of such properties and the length of time each property is vacant.

Sport (South Africa)

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the Gleneagles agreement affects the rights of individual British professional sportsmen to practice their profession in South Africa.

Mr. Moynihan: In accordance with the Gleneagles agreement, the Government seek to discourage sporting contact with South Africa. The Government have no powers to prevent professional sportsmen from competing in South Africa.

Housing Action Trusts

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what fee he is paying to the consultants for work on advising on housing action trusts in Lambeth.

Mr. Trippier: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 2 November to the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon), at column 685.

Multiple Occupation

Mr. Donald Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give his assessment as to whether each of the following local housing authorities manages within the existing legislative framework successfully to control the numbers and conditions of houses in multiple occupation in its area (1) Kensington and Chelsea, (2) Lewisham, (3) Haringey, (4) Leeds, (5) Calderdale, (6) Lambeth, (7) Bristol, (8) Enfield, (9) Brent, (10) Camden, (11) Islington, (12) Plymouth, (13) Hackney, (14) Westminster, (15) Wirral, (16) Wandsworth, (17) Kingston upon Hull, (18) Merton, (19) Newham, (20) Ealing, (21) Harrow, (22) Hounslow, (23) Southwark, (24) Blackpool, (25) Liverpool, (26) Torbay, (27) Worthing, (28) Hove, (29) Redbridge, (30) Birmingham, (31) Bath, (32) Bradford, (33) Newcastle upon Tyne, (34) Oxford and (35) Manchester.

Mr. Trippier: The Department's environmental health adviser visited 16 of these authorities to discuss their problems and methods of tackling houses in multiple occupation. Views expressed to him on those visits, and his reports, were made in confidence.

Green Belt

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will include York, Chester, Bath, Oxford and Cambridge on a list of towns and cities whose green belts fulfil the purpose of preserving the special character of historic towns as laid down in planning policy guidance note 2.

Mr. Chope: Of all the green belt purposes listed in planning policy guidance note 2, that of "preserving the special character of historic towns" is especially relevant to the green belts referred to by the hon. Member.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his Department's estimate of the quantity of high, intermediate and low-level nuclear waste waiting to be (a) reprocessed and (b) dumped in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The latest available estimates of the stocks of radioactive wastes in the United Kingdom awaiting disposal (in conditioned waste volume equivalents) are as follows:

	cubic metres
High level waste	517
Intermediate level waste	59,400
Low level waste	2,300

Nuclear waste is not reprocessed.

Right to Buy

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many appeals under the right-to-buy scheme have been made by Camden council tenants in each year since the scheme began; and in how many cases the valuation was reduced on appeal.

Mr. Trippier: The table gives, for each year since 1980, the number of applications by tenants of the London borough of Camden for determination of the value of their homes by the district valuer under what is now section 128 of the Housing Act 1985, and the number of these cases in which the council's valuation was reduced:

Year	Number of applications for determination	Number of valuations reduced
1981	134	99
1982	68	47
1983	35	25
1984	35	27
1985	75	58
1986	100	87
1987	26	24
[1]1988	195	182

[1] To 4 November.

Sewage

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his time scale for the long-term improvement of sewage treatment works.

Mr. Moynihan: As my right hon. Friend recently announced, we are close to confirming with water authorities an accelerated programme of capital improvements—involving expenditure of about £1 billion over the next four years—to bring all those works currently in breach of their numerical consent conditions into full compliance by March 1992. We expect to make a more detailed statement on our proposals shortly.

Water

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the process of consultations with water authorities to review the existing classification schemes for rivers and estuaries began; and which environmental and consumer interests have been consulted.

Mr. Moynihan: The Department has already held informal and preliminary discussions within the water industry concerning the classification schemes for rivers and estuaries. These have resulted in a number of proposals for improvement and clarification, on which we hope to consult shortly. In finalising our proposals, we will of course take account of comments from interested parties.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of the length of English and Welsh rivers have not been routinely monitored for chemical parameters in each of the last five years.

Mr. Moynihan: All main rivers are routinely monitored by water authorities for a variety of parameters. The extent to which minor rivers are individually monitored is a matter for the discretion of the water authorities in local circumstances. The information requested is therefore not available centrally.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment why the 1985 report on river quality in England and Wales for 1980-85 contains no biological monitoring results.

Mr. Moynihan: As we indicated in the Government's response to the Environment Select Committee's report on pollution of rivers and estuaries, published in June, biological testing has an important and growing role in monitoring water quality. However, it is not at present undertaken consistently by all authorities and tends to be site specific. The 1985 river quality survey was therefore compiled on the basis of the chemical criteria on which present river and estuary classifications are based. It will be for the NRA to consider in due course what role biological testing should play in future surveys.

Zoological Society of London

Mr. Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether, pursuant to his reply of 11 May to the hon. Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) Official Report, columns 130-32, he will make a statement concerning payment of the £10 million endowment to the Zoological Society of London.

Mr. Ridley: Subject to approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, I have arranged immediate payment on account of £9·27 million to the society, being the balance out of £10 million after deducting an amount already paid for the current financial year.

The society has shown its determination to put its affairs in order by proceeding rapidly with the creation of a new subsidiary operating company, with a strong management team, to run London zoo and Whipsnade park. The company has now drawn up a development strategy, which draws on the earlier consultants' report but also reflects much innovative and imaginative thinking by the new team.

Strengthened by their expert new management, and with this support from Government, the society and its operating company are now in a position to harness public enthusiasm and secure, once and for all, a successful future for these world-famous zoos, without further public subsidy. The Government's financial commitment to the zoos is therefore at an end.

Government Car Service

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the current number of vehicles in the secure car service pool; how many are of (a) British manufacture and (b) foreign manufacture; how many of the vehicles are able to use unleaded petrol; and what was the total cost of the secure car service in the financial year 1987-88.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 3 November 1988]: It is not the practice to give information about matters of security in the Government car service. As regards the Government car service generally, there are 174 vehicles, all of which are British badged. Twenty-five of the 79 allocated to Ministers can run on unleaded fuel. Vehicles capable of running on unleaded fuel are purchased as replacements become due for existing vehicles.

The total cost of operating the secure car service to Ministers and heads of Departments during 1987-88 was provided in a written reply on 15 April 1988 at column 232.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list by Department the number of parking tickets received and the total amount paid in respect of Government car service vehicles in 1987 and 1988 to date.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 3 November 1988]: The number of parking fines incurred by Government car service vehicles in 1987 and the total sum of fines paid were provided in a written reply on 15 April 1988, at column 233.

There have been 207 fines incurred during 1988 to date, at a total cost of £2,534. The details by Department are as follows:

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

EC Food Surpluses

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he proposes to take in light of the European Court of Auditors report on the serious allegations of inadequate financial control over EEC food surpluses.

Mr. Ryder: I intend to ask for a discussion of this report at the next Agriculture Council on 14-15 November. The European Commission have announced that a working group will shortly be considering the report, and I wish to ensure that its findings are acted on speedily.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures he is taking to ensure that the present reductions in food surpluses are not reversed at a later date.

Mr. Ryder: The measures agreed at the European Council in February on budget discipline and the reform of the CAP have greatly reduced the incentive to surplus production. Downward pressure has been exerted for a number of years on support levels, and this is now significantly augmented by stabilisers. With the reduced availability of intervention (which the Commission proposes should be taken further in the beef sector as part of the current review of the regime) the prospects for bringing Community supply and demand into better balance have been greatly improved. I shall continue to press for further action, and the current GATT round offers the opportunity to make reductions in support and protection in liaison with our trading partners.

Smallholdings

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will set out the costs for the management of smallholdings in each of the county authorities for the last three years.

Mr. Ryder: The administrative costs to county authorities of managing their smallholding's estates in the financial years 1984-85, 1985-86 and 1986-87 were as follows:

County Council	Financial Year 1984-85 £	1985-86 £	1986-87 £

Apples

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what restrictions are applied at present to the import of apples; which foreign countries are affected; who imposed the restrictions; and for what reasons.

Mr. Ryder: The import licensing arrangements and quantitative restrictions imposed by the European Commission earlier this year on apples from third countries lapsed on 31 August; consequently, no such restrictions are currently applicable.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food by which European Community organisation restrictions on apple imports are determined.

Mr. Ryder: I refer my hon. Friend to his answer of 17 May and those given earlier.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the annual production of apples in the European Community in each of the most recent five years for which figures or estimates are available; and what is the level of European Community demand for apples.

Mr. Ryder: Production of apples in the Community over the last five years for which figures are available was as follows:

	'000 tonnes
1983	6,612
1984	8,340
1985	6,903
1986	9,168
1987	[1]7,969

[1] Provisional.

The figures for 1986 and 1987 include production in Spain and Portugal. Consumption of unprocessed apples in the Community in 1986 was of the order of 6 million tonnes.

Fruit and Vegetables

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the proposals under consideration for the destruction or disposal of fruit and vegetables by the European Community; and what quantity of each fruit or vegetable is affected.

Mr. Ryder: I know of no new proposals under consideration for the destruction or disposal of fruit and vegetables by the European Community. Under the current intervention system, the provisional figures for quantities withdrawn from the market in 1987-88 are as follows:

	Tonnes
Cauliflowers	120,000
Apricots	2,000
Peaches	527,000
Lemons	5,000
Tomatoes	43,000
Aubergines	300
Pears	89,000
Apples	591,000
Mandarins	6,000
Clementines	80

Figures for oranges, satsumas and nectarines are not yet available.

Common Agricultural Policy (Special Sales)

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the special sales authorised by the management committee of the common agricultural policy over the past 12 months; and if he will detail the amount of each special sale and the sale price in terms of pence per pound.

Mr. MacGregor: At any one time, CAP arrangements provide for a number of sales schemes from intervention and from the open market. These tend to follow established patterns, but the following sales to non-EC countries, agreed over the last 12 months, have distinguishing features:

Commodity	Date	Quantity (tonnes)	Destination	Sale price (p/lb)
Butter	November 1987	200,100	USSR	[4]6·17
SMP	November 1987	2,000	Peru	[4]23·3

Wheat	September 1988	2,510,000	USSR/Other destinations[5]	[1]3·9
Beef	October 1988	100,000	Eastern Europe	[3]17·3

[1] Price is calculated from the dollar equivalent of the price actually paid by the purchaser (including MCAs) converted into sterling at spot rates at time of sale.
[2] The price is the sale price (including MCAs where applicable) that would have been obtained if the beef had been exported from the United Kingdom, which it was not.
[3] The price is the actual sale price (exclusive of MCAs), converted into sterling at the green rate. None of the butter was exported from the United Kingdom.
[4] Some of the grain exported was of United Kingdom origin.
[5] The quantities destined for the USSR (which it is not possible separately to identify) benefited from an additional subsidy of 0·13p/lb.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Legislation (Sovereignty)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those areas of legislative initiative that remain freely available to Her Majesty's Government and which do not lie within the originating competence of the Commission of the European Economic Communities.

Mr. Waldegrave: The member states retain national legislative competence in those areas where the Community does not have exclusive competence under the EEC treaty or instruments adopted under it, for example, in areas such as criminal law, family law, rules on the ownership of property. It would not be practicable to compile an exhaustive list in the form required.

Leonid Luboman

Mr. Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, in the light of the proposed release of all political prisoners in the Soviet Union, he will make representations on behalf of Leonid Luboman, now in 12th year of imprisonment.

Mr. Waldegrave: We regularly make representations to the Soviet authorities on behalf of prisoners of conscience such as Leonid Luboman. We raised his case most recently at the official bilateral talks on human rights in Moscow on 23 June and we will continue to raise it at every appropriate opportunity until Mr. Luboman is released.

European Parliament

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, following the recent European Court decision, Her Majesty's Government propose to make an estimate of the additional cost of locating the activities of the European Parliament in three centres at Luxembourg, Brussels and Strasbourg, as against Brussels only.

Mr. Waldegrave: No. Any change to existing arrangements would, under the EC treaties, require the unanimous agreement of the Governments of the member states. Such unanimity appears unlikely in the foreseeable future.

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, following the recent European Court decision, the Government intends to raise at an early Council meeting the subject of the seat of the European Parliament.

Mr. Waldegrave: No. The recent European Court of Justice ruling does not alter the fact that under the EC treaty the permanent seats of the institutions are to be determined by common accord of the Governments of the member states—that is, unanimity. Such unanimity is unlikely in the foreseeable future.

Israel

Mr. Faulds: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government has made to the Israeli Government following its recent decision to suspend payment of port and transportation costs of commodities for the United Nations Relief and Work Agency's use in the west bank and Gaza strip.

Mr. Waldegrave: None.

Anglo-Irish Relations

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent factors and events have influenced Anglo-Irish relations.

Sir Geoffrey Howe [pursuant to his reply, 8 June 1988, c. 608]: I signed an agreement with the Republic of Ireland on the delimitation of the continental shelf in Dublin on 7 November. Copies of the agreement have been placed in the Library of the House.

The agreement lays down boundaries of the continental shelf in the Irish and Celtic seas and the south-west approaches as well as to the west of Scotland, taking full account of the current rules of international law. It removes altogether the need for the arbitration previously announced.

The agreement will bring advantages to both sides, in particular in opening up new areas for the off-shore industries where, in the absence of such an agreement in the past, exploitation was prevented.

I regard this agreement as a very positive outcome of lengthy negotiations, and an equitable solution to a dispute which began nearly 25 years ago.

SCOTLAND

Ambulance Service

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give for each of the past 10 years (a) the total man hours of the Scottish ambulance service and (b) the number of man hours spent on emergencies.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The total man hours worked are as follows:—

Year ending 31 March	Man Hours
1979	3,240,640
1980	3,382,080
1981	3,425,760
1982	3,463,200
1983	3,531,840
1984	3,527,680
1985	3,577,600
1986	3,627,520
1987	3,642,080
1988	3,721,120

The information about emergencies is not available in the form requested. The latest available information shows that the accident and emergency element of the Scottish ambulance service carried 15 per cent. of the patients (7 per cent. 999 cases and 8 per cent. urgent hospital admissions and urgent inter-hospital transfers) and accounted for about 70 per cent. of the approved manpower establishment of the Scottish ambulance service.

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many ambulances in Scotland are crewed by (a) one person and (b) two persons in respect of each Scottish ambulance service area.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: All Scottish ambulance service ambulances are capable of being crewed by one or two members of staff depending on operational circumstances and the mobility and physical condition of the expected patients. It is therefore not possible to provide the information in the form requested.

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to give approval for the relocation and improvement of the Scottish ambulance service control room in Edinburgh.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The relocation and improvement of the control room in Edinburgh is being considered by the Scottish ambulance service as part of a wider rationalisation of all the service's control centres in Scotland. I expect proposals to be submitted to the Scottish Home and Health Department shortly.

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any proposals to computerise the control facilities of the Scottish ambulance service in each area.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The computerisation of control facilities is an operational matter for the Scottish ambulance service. I understand that proposals for computerisation are shortly to be submitted to the Scottish Home and Health Department.

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each Scottish ambulance service area the percentage of emergency calls answered within (a) eight minutes and (b) 20 minutes and; in respect of Glasgow only (i) seven minutes and (ii) 14 minutes.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: In 1987-88, the response times for accident and 999 calls were as follows:

Area	8 minutes per cent.	14 minutes per cent.	20 minutes per cent.
Highland and Western Isles	62·5	—	89·3
Grampian, Orkney and Shetland	68·2	—	94·6
Tayside	69·6	—	96·7
Fife, Lothian and Borders	60·5	—	97·0
Glasgow	47·4	83·5	94·9
Forth Valley and Lanarkshire	66·8	—	98·3
Argyll and Clyde	62·6	—	95·8
Ayrshire, Dumfries and Galloway	69·8	—	96·9

Emergency calls answered within seven minutes are not recorded separately.

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each Scottish ambulance service area the percentage of patients who are uplifted from home at the request of a general practitioner within the time requested by the general practitioner or within five minutes of that time.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested is not available but a sample survey in September 1988 showed that 71 per cent. of patients, whose transfer to hospital was classed as urgent by the requesting general practitioner, arrived at the receiving hospital no later than five minutes after the time stipulated by the general practitioner.

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each Scottish ambulance service area (a) the ambulance crew establishment (b) the actual number in post and (c) the number on duty and available for work as on 1 October.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested, relating to 1 October 1988, is as follows:

	Approved Establishment			Number of staff in post			Number of staff on duty and available[1]
	(1)	(2)	(3)	(1)	(2)	(3)	(1)	(2)	(3)
Argyll and Clyde	11	122	49	10	122	48	5	61	—
Ayrshire and Arran and Dumfries and Galloway	12	177	54	12	177	53	4	91	—
Fife, Lothians and Borders	12	303	133	12	302	119	7	152	1
Forth Valley and Lanarkshire	8	190	83	8	190	79	5	101	1
Grampian, Orkney and Shetland	14	105	28	14	102	25	6	41	—
Greater Glasgow	7	120	164	7	120	164	4	64	10
Highland and Western Isles	16	85	3	16	85	2	9	42	—
Tayside	8	98	38	8	98	33	3	41	—
Total	88	1,200	552	87	1,196	523	43	593	12

Notes:
(1) Leading Ambulance Man
(2) Qualified Ambulance Man
(3) Ambulance Man
[1] Numbers on duty are net of those off duty, on leave, sick or training.

It should be noted that 1 October was a Saturday and therefore very few non-emergency ambulance staff were on duty.

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each Scottish ambulance service area (a) the number of staff in post and (b) the number required to meet current Scottish Office guidelines.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The number of staff in post is as follows:

Number in post

	Leading Ambulanceman	Qualified Ambulanceman	Ambulanceman	Total
Argyll and Clyde	10	122	47	179
Ayrshire and Arran and Dumfries and Galloway	12	177	54	243
Fife, Lothians and Borders	12	302	127	441
Forth Valley and Lanarkshire	8	190	76	274
Grampian, Orkney and Shetland	14	103	25	142
Greater Glasgow	7	120	163	290
Highland and Western Isles	16	85	2	103
Tayside	8	93	37	138
TOTAL	87	1,192	531	1,810

The Scottish Home and Health Department does not set staffing levels. This is an operational matter for the Scottish ambulance service to decide in the light of anticipated demand.

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the additional sums required to fund the Scottish ambulance service as identified by his Department's most recent survey.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: As part of the current public expenditure survey, an estimate is being made of the funding requirements for the Scottish ambulance service. The results will be published in the public expenditure White Paper in due course.

Chambers of Commerce

Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the chairman of the chambers of commerce in Scotland; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Lang: I met the chairman of the Association of Scottish Chambers of Commerce on 19 October when I discussed matters pertaining to business rates with the Scottish business rates committee.

Alcohol Licences

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has as to the number of licences granted to sell alcohol after (a) 11 pm, (b) 12 pm, (c) 1 am, (d) 2 am, (e) 3 am and (f) 4 am in respect of each licensing board area in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 7 November 1988]: None. The central collection of liquor licensing statistics ceased in 1981; before then the only figures collected related to the numbers and types of licenses issued, not to regular or occasional extensions.

EMPLOYMENT

Community Programme

Mr. Ray Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people employed under the previous community programme are still with their old employers under their old contracts.

Mr. Nicholls: At 30 September 1988 there were 9,984 filled community programme places with agents and sponsors that had not moved forward into employment training. It is not possible to say how many other people remaining on community programme terms and conditions, but receiving training and work experience with ET training managers, are still with their old employers under their old contracts.

Job Clubs

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the latest figures available for the number of people who have found jobs through using the services of the job clubs at Lake road jobcentre, Portsmouth.

Mr. Lee: From when the job club opened in January 1987 up to the end of September 1988, a total of 159 members have found jobs. This means that 81 per cent. of people leaving went into jobs and a further 8 per cent. left for other positive outcomes such as training or a place on the enterprise allowance scheme. This 90 per cent. success rate is a very commendable achievement by the Lake road job club.

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many job clubs have been opened and closed since the start of the programme; how many of those are run directly by jobcentres or other sponsors; what future developments are likely in the job club programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: The numbers of job clubs opened and closed since the start of the programme are not readily available and it would be costly to get this information. There are currently 1,221 job clubs open. Of these 539 are run by employment service staff, mainly based in jobcentres, with 682 run by other organisations working to an annual contract. Future developments include forming close links with employment training, giving extra help to job club members in inner city areas and providing help for people in more remote rural areas who cannot readily attend a job club regularly. The shape of the programme for 1989-90 is currently under consideration as part of the annual planning round.

Employment Training

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how much is to be spent on employment training within Greater London.

Mr. Lee: On Wednesday 2 November, my right hon. Friend issued the results of a survey into unemployment in the London area. At the same time, my right hon. Friend announced a package of measures designed to redress the imbalance which the survey revealed between the number of people claiming unemployment benefit and the number of unfilled vacancies. These measures include the creation of a new team of investigators to work exclusively in inner London.

Benefit Fraud

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what inquiries have been made into fraudulent claims within Greater London by individuals at unemployment benefit offices in the last two years; and what has been the net saving to the Exchequer.

Mr. Lee: Records of the number and nature of inquiries into possibly fraudulent claims to benefit of people claiming unemployment at local offices within Greater London are not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the parliamentary constituencies on which the number of people out of work and claiming benefit declined by 20 per cent. and over between August 1984 and August 1988 including in the data for each constituency the total for (a) August 1984, (b) August 1988 and (c) the percentage reductions.

Mr. Lee: The following information is in the Library. The table shows the parliamentary constituencies in Great Britain where the number of unemployed claimants has fallen by 20 per cent. or more between August 1984 and August 1988 together with the number of unemployed in each constituency at the requested dates. The figures are affected by the change in compilation of the count in March 1986 to reduce over-recording.

Mr. Fry: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give current figures for the number of unemployed persons aged between 50 and 59 years old inclusive; (a) in absolute figures and (b) as percentage of the total of that age group; and if he will break this figure down by length of unemployment of: (i) six to 12 months, (ii) 12 to 18 months, (iii) 18 to 24 months, (iv) 24 to 36 months, (v) 36 months to 48 months, (vi) 48 to 60 months, and (vii) over five years.

Mr. Lee: The table shows the number of unemployed claimants aged between 50 and 59 years inclusive, in the United Kingdom in July 1988, the latest available date, for the durations requested.

An unemployment rate expressed as a percentage of the work force aged 50 to 59 inclusive is not readily available, but I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible with the information. The latest published unemployment rates for July 1988 for the closest age groups were 6·9 per cent. of the work force among those aged 45 to 54 inclusive, and 11·7 per cent. among those aged 55 to 59.

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people claimed unemployment benefit; and what number and proportion had been on unemployment benefit for over six months in each year since 1979.

Mr. Lee: The following information is available in the Library. Table A shows the numbers of registrants at jobcentres unemployed for six months or more expressed as a percentage of all registrants as well as in absolute figures for July of each year from 1979 to 1982.

Table B shows the number of claimants at unemployment benefit offices unemployed for six months or more expressed as a percentage of all claimants for July of each year from 1983 to 1988.

School Leavers (Bradford)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people aged 16 and 17 years who left school in Bradford in the summer have been told they are ineligible to claim unemployment benefit as from 12 September.

Mr. Cope: None. Unemployment benefit is a contributory benefit, entitlement to which was not affected by the changes which came into effect on 12 September.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people, aged 16 and 17 years, left Bradford schools in the summer; what written and other information they were given about the YTS and obtaining employment; and what information was distributed through schools to parents about YTS employment opportunities and the need for parents to apply for extension of payment of child benefit to the end of December.

Mr. Cope: Local education authorities have a statutory duty to provide information, advice and guidance to young people in and leaving schools and colleges to help them find employment and training. Detailed local arrangements to fulfil this duty, and to collect information about client numbers, are matters for the appropriate local education authority. Information on the arrangements is not available centrally.

Information on the extension of child benefit for 16 and 17-year-old school leavers and the need for parents to apply for extended payment was sent direct to parents by the child benefit centre at Washington. The child benefit centre wrote to over 300,000 parents whose children were assumed to be leaving school in the summer.

Information (Languages)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment in what languages information to pupils and parents, about YTS, jobs and child benefit, was distributed in Bradford upper schools prior to the end of the summer term.

Mr. Cope: Local education authorities have a statutory duty to provide information, advice and guidance to young people in and leaving schools and colleges to help them find employment and training. Detailed local arrangements to fulfil this duty and to promote equal opportunities are a matter for the appropriate local education authority. Information on the arrangements is not available centrally.

Information on the extension of child benefit for 16 and 17-year-old school leavers was contained in leaflet CH7 which is printed in English. In addition the child benefit centre at Washington wrote direct to over 300,000 parents whose children were assumed to be leaving school in the summer.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Disabled Children

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what conclusions his Department has reached on improving the assistance for disabled children from the United Kingdom to visit the Peto Institute in Budapest following the recent visit there by the Minister for Social Security, the hon. Member for Chelsea (Mr. Scott); and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) on 19 October at columns 893-894.

Benefits

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many benefits are available from his Department; how many application forms and guidance notes are available; and how much of this material is available in Asian languages.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: There are 28 social security benefits available from the Department; and 26 major claim forms and supporting guidance notes. All application forms and guidance notes are in English only. Any member of the public who has difficulty in understanding the forms can seek help in making a claim from his local social security office.

By the end of this year it is hoped to publish a new translation of leaflet, FB22, entitled "Which Benefit", which gives details of all available social security benefits, in five main Asian languages, as well as Chinese and Turkish.

Housing Benefit

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been the estimated cost of administering housing benefit transitional payments, in pound sterling and as a percentage of the amount of payments made, up to the latest date for which information is available.

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the estimated administrative cost per successful application for housing benefit transitional payments made by the Glasgow unit of his Department.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answers 27 October and 7 November 1988]: Administrative expenditure on housing benefit transitional payments, excluding capital costs, totalled £3,802,991 up to 31 October. This cannot be sensibly expressed as a proportion of payments made as these vary from week to week and new payments include backdated awards to 1 April this year. A comparison between administration costs and benefit expenditure can sensibly be made only when the full year costs of both are known.

HEALTH

Child Abuse

Mr. Holt: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many children were recorded as under protection orders, on a month-by-month basis, in Cleveland for each of the past 36 months, consequent upon diagnosis of sexual abuse.

Mr. Mellor: The Department does not collect figures in the form requested. The number of place of safety orders is collected annually and the return does not identify separately children removed to a place of safety because of sexual abuse. However in this particular case I have asked the county council to provide the detailed information. I will write to my hon. Friend when it has been received.

Nurses (Grading)

Mrs. Rosie Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when, with regard to the nurses' grading review, he will assess the additional costs of successful appeals; and if all successful appeals will be fully funded.

Mr. Mellor: The funds allocated to health authorities are intended to cover all pay costs arising in the current financial year, including any cases arising from successful appeals about pay or grading. No information is collected centrally on the cost of successful appeals.

Private Medicine

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will state the number of persons who have joined private medical organisations for 1979, 1984 and 1988, respectively.

Mr. Mellor: We understand from the providers that the total number of subscribers to private medical insurance in the United Kingdom was:

Year	Subscribers (millions)
1979	1·30
1984	3·28
[1]1987	2·54

[1] Latest available.

Data for 1979 are available only for the major insurers.

Nurses

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those persons who are described as employers in relation to the negotiations which are currently being held between employers and the National Health Service nurses.

Mr. Mellor: National Health Service employers are represented by the management side of the nursing and midwifery staff's negotiating council. The current membership of the management side is as follows:

Mr. N. B. J. Gurney (Chairman)—Under Secretary, Department of Health.
Mr. R. M. Orton—Assistant Secretary, Department of Health.
Mr. M. J. Hill—Nursing Officer, Department of Health.
Mr. D. M. Baxter—Assistant Secretary, Scottish Home and Health Department.
Mr. G. Padmore—Assistant Secretary, Welsh Office.
Mr. G. C. Elliot—Director of Finance, West Suffolk Health Authority.
Mr. W. S. Fyfe—Chairman, Ayrshire and Arran Health Board.
Mrs. F. Heidensohn—Member, North East Thames Regional Health Authority.
Mr. R. Mitchell—Member, Mid Glamorgan Health Authority.
Mr. F. Richards—Chairman, Stockport Health Authority.
Mr. J. Smith—General Manager, Hounslow and Spelthorne Health Authority.
Mr. P. Garland (Secretary)—Principal, Department of Health.

Myalgic Encephalomyelitis Association

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give details on when the Myalgic Encephalomyelitis Association applied for section 64 funding from the DHSS; how much the association applied for; whether payment was in full or in part; and if he will make a statement on his Department's future plans to fund the Myalgic Encephalomyelitis Association from section 64 funding.

Mrs. Currie: The Myalgic Encephalomyelitis Association applied for section 64 funding of £63,000 on 9 September 1987; a grant of £5,000 was made for the 1988-89 financial year. The association has recently submitted a further grant application for subsequent years which we are now considering.

AIDS and Drug Misuse (Report)

Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he intends to respond in detail to the first report on AIDS and drug misuse by the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Earlier this week I wrote to the chairman of the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs to give the Government's detailed response to the council's first report on AIDS and drug misuse. I have arranged for copies of the response to be placed in the Library.

Benzodiazepines

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what funds are currently being made available to assist people in Great Britain and Northern Ireland to withdraw from benzodiazepines; and whether these funds will be increased in the future.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 4 November 1988]: The provision and funding of services in England for those dependent on benzodiazepines is primarily the responsibility of health and local authorities. The Government have since 1986 allocated additional funds direct to regional health authorities specifically for the development of services for drug misusers. £5·47 million was allocated for this purpose in 1988-89. In addition, we set up the central funding initiative in 1983 to pump-prime local services for drug misusers. Under this scheme 188 local statutory and voluntary sector projects received a total of £17·5 million, of which £339,000 has been allocated to projects catering specifically for benzodiazepine dependants. In addition many of the remaining 184 projects also include a service for this client group.

Services in the rest of the United Kingdom are matters for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and Northern Ireland.

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he will consider banning the prescription of benzodiazepines to new patients.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 4 November 1988]: There is no case for doing so at present. We have received the advice of the Committee on Safety of Medicines that benzodiazepines are clinically useful if prescribed within their licensed indications such as short-term use for severe anxiety or severe insomnia and for pre-anaesthesia. It is the responsibility of individual doctors to decide on the best treatment for their patients. This will include deciding whether to prescribe a drug at all, to offer the patient a psychological form of treatment such as counselling or to refer the patient to a hospital consultant or other specialist help.

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what funds are currently being made available to assist people in the Bristol area to withdraw from benzodiazepines; what organisations are benefiting; and to what extent in each case.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 4 November 1988]: South Western regional health authority is primarily responsible for services for those dependent on benzodiazepines in the Bristol area. The Government have allocated over £355,000 in 1988-89 to the region specifically for the development of drug misuse services, including services for those dependent on benzodiazepines. For further information the hon. Member may like to consult the South Western regional health authority. In addition, under the central funding initiative set up to pump-prime local drug misuse services, we have allocated £226,070 over a three-year period beginning 1985-86 to the Bristol drugs project, which also provides services for those dependent on benzodiazepines.

AWRE, Aldermaston

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether local hospitals and ambulance services are involved in contingency plans in case of accident at the atomic weapons research establishment, Aldermaston.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have been asked to reply.

The atomic weapons establishment at Aldermaston maintains close liaison with local authorities, the police, fire and other emergency services. This includes arrangements for the use of local and service hospitals.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how long after the alarm system at the atomic weapons research establishment, Aldermaston, had indicated an emergency situation on 28 October the local hospitals and ambulance services were informed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) on 3 November, at column 740.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Select Committees

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will publish the guidelines governing the payment of fares for Opposition spokesmen and women and Select Committee chairmen who attend meetings on the subjects for which they have special responsibility.

Mr. Waldegrave: The guidelines governing the payment of fares by the House to Opposition spokesmen and women are the same as those for all right hon. and hon. Members. These guidelines are set out in the Fees Office publication "Parliamentary Salaries, Allowances and Pensions," copies of which have already been placed in the Library and issued to right hon. and hon. Members, on an individual basis, for retention. In so far as the purposes of journeys made by Opposition spokesmen and women fall within the terms of the appropriate resolution of the House, the cost to the party concerned may be reimbursed under the scheme for financial assistance to Opposition parties ("Short money").

In accordance with the aforementioned guidelines, Select Committee Chairmen may, with the authorisation of their Committee, undertake visits within the United Kingdom for purposes related wholly and necessarily to the work of the Select Committee at public expense. Additionally, Select Committee Chairmen may also travel overseas on official visits, subject to prior approval by the Liaison Committee. The criteria by which the Liaison Committee judges applications for such expenditure are the responsibility of that Committee. However, in accordance with the guidelines laid down by the House of Commons Commission, Members travelling outside Europe use club class air fares only, whilst those travelling within Europe use club or economy class, as appropriate.

Mr. Freeman: Consistent and reliable information on numbers of children for whom boarding school allowance has been paid is only readily available since 1983-84. The information requested since then is:

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cost of Her Majesty's forces boarding school allowance scheme in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Freeman: Consistent and reliable information on the cost of the forces boarding school allowance scheme is only readily available since 1983-84. The costs for each year since then are:

1987-88	106·588

US Air Force Medical Storage Facility

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence why the proposed United States air force medical storage facility that was to be built at RAF Wethersfield is now proposed to be built at Boscombe Down.

Mr. Freeman: Planning clearance for the proposed medical storage facility at Ridgewell, near RAF Wethersfield was refused by the local planning authority.

Recruiting

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what measures he intends to take to encourage recruiting in the Army.

Mr. Freeman: Recruiting to the Army is becoming more difficult as a result of demographic trends. A range of additional measures are therefore being considered to increase public awareness of the career opportunities which the Army has to offer.

Officers

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what measures he intends to take to help to retain married officers and non-commissioned officers in the Army.

Mr. Freeman: The changes to servicemen's allowances announced earlier this year were designed to ensure that they would be up to date, and appropriate to the requirements of modern service life, to support accompanied service and compensate for family mobility. Retention rates are kept continuously under review, and we are examining a variety of ways in which they might be improved further.

Ethnic Monitoring

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will now consider introducing ethnic monitoring into all regiments of the British Army.

Mr. Freeman: No. I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's evidence to the Defence Committee as set out in the Committee's report (HC 391) published on 25 April and to the Government's response to the report published on 6 July (HC 584).

EH101 Helicopters

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will report on progress made by his Department in defining requirements for the EH101 helicopters which he announced he intended to order in April 1987.

Mr. Sainsbury: My right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Defence, announced to the House last year the MOD's intention to order, subject to the satisfactory resolution of contractual and other issues, a utility variant of the Anglo/Italian EH101 helicopter for the RAF to meet the requirement for additional support helicopters in the central region.

Following that announcement, work was set in hand to define more precisely the RAF performance requirements. This work has been carried out in close consultation with EH Industries Limited, the main contractor for the EH101 project, and its parent companies, Westland and Agusta. We will now start the formal project definition stage which will examine in detail the RAF's foreseen requirement against a range of options and establish more firmly the costs and risks involved.

NATO (Weapons Deployment)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on representations made by the Belgian Defence Minister on future North Atlantic Treaty Organisation deployments of nuclear weapons at the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation nuclear planning group meeting in Scheveningen on 27 October.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: At the nuclear planning group meeting on 27-28 October, Ministers reaffirmed the essential contribution made by nuclear weapons to NATO's strategy of deterrence and underlined their determination to take those actions required to keep the Alliance's forces, nuclear and conventional, up to date where necessary. While no decisions were taken or required at the meeting, Ministers noted the progress being made and agreed to continue a step by step approach to the work in hand. A copy of the communiqué issued after the meeting, and agreed by all Ministers, has been placed in the Library of the House.

Chemical Weapons (Libya)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he possesses on the construction of a chemical weapons production facility by Libya.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is not the policy of the Government to comment on such information.

Soviet Union

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether there have been any significant changes in the military capability of the Soviet Union over the past two years.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: An assessment of the significant changes in Soviet military capability was published in annex A of volume 1 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1987" (Cm. 101-I) and chapter 6 of volume 1 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1988" (Cm. 344-I).

Nuclear Testing

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has discussed with his North Atlantic Treaty Organisation colleagues any new proposals to limit nuclear testing.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The United States and the Soviet Union are currently engaged in talks and joint verification experiments with the aim of ratifying the threshold test ban treaty and the peaceful nuclear explosions treaty. United Kingdom and NATO Ministers have been kept informed of the current state of negotiations.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Birth and Marriage Certificates (Passport Applications)

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions in each of the past five years passport department officers have had to make applications for duplicated (a) birth and (b) marriage certificates as a result of these being lost (i) within the departmental offices or (ii) in the post.

Mr. Renton: I regret that the information requested is not available. In the comparatively rare instances when personal documents submitted in support of passport applications go astray within the passport offices, or are subsequently lost in the post, replacements are provided at no cost to the applicant.

ENVIRONMENT

Mineral and Coal Extraction

Mr. Ashby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what tonnage rate was paid by operators in (a) Leicestershire and (b) Leicestershire, North-West, for each year since 1983 in respect of (i) mineral extraction, including clay, and (ii) coal extraction.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The royalty per tonne of mineral extracted used in the calculation of the rateable value of mineral hereditaments varies according to the type of mineral and the conditions under which it is extracted. The average royalty in Leicestershire for all years since 1983 has been 25p per tonne for coal (excluding extraction by the British Coal Corporation) and 7·89p per tonne for other minerals, including clay. In all cases the royalty is reduced by 50 per cent. under the provisions of the Mines and Quarries (Valuation) Order 1983 to arrive at the rateable value of the hereditament.

The rateable value of British Coal Corporation hereditaments is assessed by a statutory formula which is not directly royalty based.

Football (Arrests)

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to how many matches took place in each of the first, second, third and fourth divisions of the Football League in the 1987-88 season; and at how many of these, by division, individuals were arrested.

Mr. Moynihan: The number of matches which took place in the Football League during the 1987-88 season and the number of arrests were as follows:

	Matches played	Arrests
Division 1	420	2,216
Division 2	506	2,136
Division 3	552	866
Division 4	552	929

Arrests figures for individual matches are not held centrally.

Waste Disposal

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report those waste disposal authorities whose performance is considered poor by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution, in the disposal of hazardous and toxic waste.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: In response to a request from the Select Committee on the Environment Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution is considering whether it has adequate information to justify publishing a classification of the performance of named waste disposal authorities.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the occasions when waste disposal authorities permitted the disposal of poly-chlorinated materials other than by high temperature incineration during each of the last five years.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not collected centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

However, Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution is unaware of any authorities permitting the disposal, by methods other than high temperature incineration, of material significantly contaminated with polychlorinated organic compounds.

Planning

Mr. Adley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if, following the judgment of Lord Justice Kerr in R. v. Westminster City Council ex parte Monahan and another on the role of financial constraints on the economic viability of a desirable planning development in determining planning applications, he has any plans to introduce legislation to amend planning law in this respect.

Mr. Chope: No.

Housing

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many former Greater London council homes, recently transferred to North British housing association, there are in (a) Somerset and (b) the south-west.

Mr. Trippier: There are 692 homes in the south-west owned by the North British Housing Association, of which 198 are in Somerset.

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many tenants of formerly Greater London council-owned homes outside the former Greater London council area have acquired their homes through the right-to-buy legislation; and how many of these were in (a) Somerset and (b) the south-west.

Mr. Trippier: A total of 99 sales of the seaside and country dwellings have been completed under the right-to-buy legislation. Figures by county are not immediately available for the 97 sales completed during the period when the GLC and LRB owned the portfolio. Of the two sales completed by the North British Housing Association, and the 28 applications it is progressing, none are in the south-west.

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received from tenants with special needs living in formerly Greater London council-owned properties outside the former Greater London council area; and what steps are taken to ensure that the interests of such tenants are protected.

Mr. Trippier: No specific representations regarding special needs have been received from tenants of the former GLC seaside and country dwellings. Periodically, the North British Housing Association receives requests from tenants for special adaptations. These are considered by the association in consultation with the local social services department and the occupational therapist to determine the appropriate action.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report those local authorities which have over 24 per cent. of their total housing stock indicated in form HIP1 as being non sub-standard dwellings in need of renovation; and if he will give the percentage in each case.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 8 November 1988]: The following 50 English housing authorities have reported in their 1988 housing investment programme returns that 24 per cent. or more of the total housing stock in their area at 1 April 1988 was non-substandard but in need of renovation.

basic amenities is over 6 per cent. of their total housing stock as recorded on form HIP 1; and if he will give the percentage in each case.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 8 November 1988]: The following 77 English housing authorities have reported in their 1988 housing investment programme returns that 6 per cent. or more of the total housing stock in their area at 1 April 1988 was either unfit, or fit but lacking in basic amenities:

Valuation Panels

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if the management consultants' study referred to in "Appeals and Valuation and Community Charge Tribunals," published by his Department in November 1987, into the increased work load and staffing of local valuation panels and valuation and community charge tribunals has now been produced.

Mr. Ridley: Yes. A summary of the consultants' recommendations and the Government's proposals for action on them was placed in the Library of the House on 15 April 1988.

Football Supporters (National Membership Scheme)

Mr. John Carlisle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the report of the Minister for Sport's working party on the national membership scheme for football supporters will be published.

Mr. Moynihan: The report of the working party on a national membership scheme for football supporters, which I chaired, is published today. The working party was set up following the meeting on 6 July between the Prime Minister and the president of the Football League and the chairman of the Football Association, to review the main principles of a national membership scheme for football. The working party included representatives of the Government, the police and the football authorities. All the members of the working party have co-operated in preparing this report and it has been agreed between them. I pay full tribute to the co-operative approach which the football representatives on the working party have adopted throughout many hours of discussions.

The report addresses the specific issue of when the scheme should be implemented. It refers to the work that has to be done on the technology of the scheme and its installation at 92 league clubs. Our target will be to achieve implementation throughout the Football League by spring 1990—subject to Parliament's approval of our legislative proposals and the installation of appropriate technology.

There were 6,147 arrests at Football League matches last season and violent incidents have continued this season, both inside and outside grounds. They cannot be allowed to continue. The national membership scheme offers the prospect of breaking the link, of ending the role of football as a focus for hooliganism and violence.

Copies of the report are being placed in the Library today.

Radioactive Waste Disposal

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Pollution expects to complete the review of approvals for the Ministry of Defence establishments at Aldermaston and Burghfield to dispose of radioactive wastes.

Mr. Ridley [holding answer 2 November 1988]: The review of the approvals for Aldermaston and Burghfield is expected to be completed by July 1989.

WALES

National Curriculum

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he is in a position to publish the interim report of the national curriculum Welsh working group.

Mr. Peter Walker: I received copies of the interim report recently and have published it today. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Ian Fraser (JMB)

Mr. Sedgemore: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the decision not to prosecute Ian Fraser, the former loan manager of Johnson Matthey bank.

The Attorney-General: On 7 September 1988 the Solicitor-General, concurring with the advice of the director of the serious fraud office and leading counsel, decided that there was insufficient evidence to justify the institution of criminal proceedings against Ian Fraser for alleged offences of corruption arising out of his employment with Johnson Matthey Bankers Limited.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Truancy

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will set out in the Official Report the truancy rates for each local education authority for each of the past five years.

Mr. Butcher: This information is not available centrally. Under the Education Acts, the responsibility for taking action on truancy rests with local education authorities. They are not required to submit information about truancy to my right hon. Friend, but they should ensure that attendance levels in their schools are monitored and that action is taken to keep them under control.

Language Teaching

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has, following his recent visit to the Soviet Union, concerning the teaching of Russian in particular and modern languages in general in secondary schools.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Government's policy on modern foreign languages in the school curriculum was set out in the January 1988 policy statement, a copy of which I am sending to the hon. Member. The national curriculum will include a modern foreign language as a foundation subject at secondary level to be studied by each pupil between the ages of 11 and 16. Within this framework, my right hon. Friend is encouraging a greater diversity of languages offered in the school curriculum, and would like to see Russian taught more widely among them.

Geological Surveying

Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) whether he has any further statement to make pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) on 28 January, Official Report, column 310, relating to geological surveying;

(2) whether he intends to implement the main recommendations of the Sir Clifford Butler report on geological surveying;

(3) whether the British Geological Survey is to receive corporate status independently of the Natural Environment Research Council.

Mr. Jackson: I refer my hon. Friend to my right hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) on Monday 7 November at columns 2-3.

Science (Funding)

Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects the advisory board for the research councils to allocate the additional funds for British science referred to recently by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Autumn Statement, Official Report, 1 November, column 825.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State expects to receive the advice of the advisory board for the research councils (ABRC) on the allocation of the additional funds for science early next month. He will announce his decision on allocations as soon as possible thereafter.

AIDS

Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much of the total funds allocated to the Medical Research Council for research is scheduled for AIDS research.

Mr. Jackson: In the current financial year, £7·7 million.

Schools (Discipline)

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he now expects the findings of the Elton committee on discipline in schools to be published.

Mr. Butcher: Early next year.

Students (Covenants)

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his estimate of the number of students following the Finance Act 1988 (a) for whom it is impracticable to continue payments under an existing covenant or (b) who are unable to covenant the full amount of their new contribution, and who are unable to benefit from the new parental contribution scale; and whether he has any proposals to tackle this situation.

Mr. Jackson: We do not have estimates of the number of students in either category. There are no plans to revise the arrangements whereby parental contributions to the maintenance of students beginning their courses in the current academic year are assessed in accordance with a reduced scale.

ERA Bulletin

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many copies of the new Department of Education and Science factual news bulletin "ERA" have been distributed to maintained schools in the United Kingdom; and at what cost.

Mrs. Rumbold: A total of 750,000 copies of the factual news bulletin "ERA" have been distributed to maintained schools in England. Each primary and special school received 20 copies and each secondary school 60 copies. The total cost of producing and distributing the bulletin was £56,000 of which £31,000 was for distribution and postage.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether additional funding has been provided to finance the costs of the "ERA" bulletin currently being sent to schools in the United Kingdom; and whether he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: The costs of the factual news bulletin "ERA" are being accommodated within the Department's existing financial provision for publicity.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether it is intended that the information contained in the Department of Education and Science factual bulletin "ERA" can be taken as an authentic legal definition of the terms of the Education Reform Act covered in the factual content of that bulletin.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Department of Education and Science factual bulletin "ERA" is intended to keep school teachers and governors informed about the changes to be implemented in schools following the Education Reform Act. It is concerned with the practical implementation of provisions of the Education Reform Act and does not set out to provide a legal definition of the terms of that Act. Only the courts can provide authoritative legal interpretation of an enactment.

Admissions Classes

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what information is available to his Department regarding the number of children below the statutory age of education likely to be present in the admissions classes of maintained primary schools in September 1989; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what information is available to his Department regarding the number and proportion of admissions classes in maintained primary schools that contained one or more children below the statutory age of education in September 1987, or the last year for which records are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: This information is not currently available.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement regarding the proposed implementation of national curriculum programmes of study in the admissions classes of primary schools in September 1989, and the proposed treatment of children below the statutory age of education.

Mrs. Rumbold: The requirement to teach all foundation subjects for a reasonable time will apply to all children as they reach compulsory school age. However, my right hon. Friend intends to make transitional arrangements for the school year 1989-90 to assist the introduction of the national curriculum's attainment targets and programmes of study in primary schools. Those in place at the beginning of that year will apply to all pupils who have reached statutory school age by the start of the autumn term 1989. For pupils reaching statutory school age during 1989-90, however, attainment targets and programmes of study will not apply until the following year.

Further information about these arrangements is given in paragraph 35 in the Department's draft circular "The Education Reform Act 1988: The School Curriculum and Assessment", published on 17 October 1988, a copy of which has been placed in the Library.

Science Budget

Dr. Bray: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) how much of the increase of £95 million in the science budget in 1989-90 announced on 1 November, Official Report, column 605, is accounted for by those increases in earmarked programmes on the British Geological Survey, AIDS, the British Antarctic Survey and CERN, referred to by the Advisory Board for the Research Councils in its advice to him on 12 May as being decided by Government taking into account broader considerations than those of purely scientific priorities;

(2) what is the real increase in the planned expenditure in 1989-90 on the science budget over that previously planned for 1989-90 after allowing for the higher than previously assumed level of the gross domestic product deflator, and after excluding the £47 million increase in the earmarked programmes in the British Geological Survey, AIDS, the British Antarctic Survey and CERN, referred to in the Advisory Board for the Research Councils advice to him on 12 May as being decided by Government taking into account broader considerations than those of purely scientific priorities;

(3) how much of the increase of £95 million in the science budget, in 1989-90, announced on 1 November, Official Report, column 605, is accounted for by the effect of the higher than assumed increase in prices on the provision of £730 million made in 1987.

Mr. Jackson: In respect of the British Geological Survey I refer the hon. Member to the reply of my right hon. Friend to my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) on 7 November at columns 2-3. In respect of the British Antarctic Survey, I refer the hon. Member to the reply of my right hon. Friend to my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. McLoughlin) on Tuesday 8 November. My right hon. Friend expects to make a statement on the AIDS programme shortly. The Government has yet to take a decision on the United Kingdom's future membership of CERN.

The Government's public expenditure plans are cash plans. The central presumption of cash planning is that cash plans will not be altered to accommodate changes in relative prices or prices generally. The cash provision for the science budget in 1988-89 is £708 million, including the £9 million addition for equipment announced by my right hon. Friend on 1 November. Cash provision planned for 1989-90 is £825 million. That is a cash increase of 16 per cent., or 11 per cent. in real terms.

CERN

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will now announce the Government's intentions regarding the United Kingdom's future membership of CERN.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Following concern within the United Kingdom about the membership cost of CERN and its perceived organisational shortcomings, the United Kingdom took the lead in promoting a review of CERN's management led by Professor Abragam. Since that report was completed, the United Kingdom has worked actively with other member countries and the CERN management to carry forward to implementation the many changes and improvements recommended in the report.

In a statement to the CERN council last June, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science noted the continuing scientific excellence of CERN; welcomed the council's decision to streamline its staff complement through a new early departure scheme; and particularly welcomed the development of new contribution arrangements that would spread the cost of CERN more equitably among participating member countries. However, the council has yet to reach agreement on when these new and fairer arrangements should commence. Resolving this is a matter to which the United Kingdom attaches priority and, in the circumstances, no decision will be announced on the United Kingdom's longer-term intentions for membership until further progress has been achieved. It is, however, expected that a further statement will be made before the end of 1988.

Under-fives

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish in the Official Report the figures for the number of pre-school places per 1,000 of the under-five population in education authorities grouped by political control on the classification used in his reply to the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) on 8 July 1986, Official Report, column 149.

Mr. Butcher [holding answer 3 November 1988]: Information on pre-school places is not collected centrally. The number of pupils under five in maintained nursery and primary schools per 1,000 of the estimated three and four-year-old population in each local education authority in England in January 1988 is given in the table. The political grouping is the same as that given in the reply of my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) on 8 July 1986 at columns 149-52.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Pesticides

Mr. Hood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the maximum level of residue content from pesticides in each vegetable that is permitted by his Department to be sold for consumption; and what are the levels permitted by all other European Community countries.

Mr. Ryder: Maximum residue levels for 53 pesticides in the more important vegetables in the United Kingdom diet were laid down in schedule 2 of the Pesticides (Maximum Residue Levels in Food) Regulations 1988, approved by Parliament in July. The MRLs will come into force on 31 December 1988.

There is an EC directive (76/895 and amendments:) listing MRLs for fruit and vegetables. Member states must accept produce which complies with these MRLs but are free either to set higher limits or to set no limits at all. There is therefore a wide variety of MRLs across Community member states which are subject to frequent change. We are not aware of any complete and up to date list. The EC Commission will shortly propose a further fruit and vegetable directive and MRLs listed in that directive may, once adopted be mandatory throughout the Community.

Silo Effluent (Pollution)

Mr. Hood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the reduction of pollution from silo effluent; and what his Department is doing to minimise such pollution.

Mr. Ryder: My Department is very concerned about the number of farm pollution incidents and is taking steps to curb them. We are giving free general advice on pollution avoidance. High rates of grant are available for silage effluent facilities and our expenditure on these grants has increased sharply. We are assisting in the preparation of regulations to cover the construction of new silage facilities. I have emphasised on several occasions the need for realistic fines for those found guilty of causing farm pollution.

Research Establishments

Mr. Hood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list each agricultural research establishment and give details of the type of research at each establishment.

Mr. Ryder: My own Department carries out research and development at a number of establishments within the agricultural development and advisory service (ADAS). The work which is relevant to the industries in England and Wales is concerned with practical aspects of farming and growing, including their interaction with the environment and their effect on animal welfare. A good deal of the programme is now concerned with the development of alternative crops and enterprises to meet emerging requirements. The main ADAS research establishments and experimental centres are shown in the list.

The Agricultural and Food Research Council has eight institutes, seven of which are concerned with agriculture.

Details of these and the research that they carry out are given in the council's annual report. agricultural research is also carried out at commercial establishments and by universities and colleges.

Mr. Hood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he last visited an agricultural research centre; and what matters he discussed.

Mr. MacGregor: I visited the Norfolk agricultural station at Morley on 28 October. Amongst matters discussed were diagnostic and advisory services for farmers and the funding of near market research.

Research

Mr. Hood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement listing the reasons for the latest cuts in agricultural research; and what is the most recent figure for the level of the cuts.

Mr. Ryder: My Department's examination of its research and development programme took place against the objectives outlined in the July 1987 White Paper on civil research and development (Cm. 185) and the Government's view that research which offers the prospect of commercial application or exploitation within a reasonable timescale is appropriate for funding by the industry. As announced in the Autumn Statement, funding for near market R & D has been reduced by £5 million for 1990-91 and £14 million for 1991-92. Together with the reduction announced last year, this is equivalent to a reduction in 1991-92 of £30 million at full economic cost. Final decisions on the future level of Government funding will not be made until after consultations with industry have been completed.

Mr. Hood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list and give details of the cuts in research funding at each of the agricultural institutes and research centres; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder: The full implications of the reductions in public support for near market research and development on individual sectors and programmes will not be known until the extent of industry funding has been established. It is not therefore possible at present to say what the effects will be for any individual research establishment.

Mr. Hood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has had discussions with the food industry about the future of research and development; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder: My right hon. Friend the Minister met representatives of the food industry to discuss future funding of research and development on 24 and 25 February and my noble Friend Baroness Trumpington held further discussions with them on 7 and 12 October. Industry organisations were asked to let us have their considered response by the end of October and we are now examining their submissions.

Fishing Vessels

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to introduce a decommissioning system for fishing vessels.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The reintroduction of a decommissioning scheme was one of several ideas recently put forward by fishing industry organisations in response to our consultation paper on possible measures to contain capacity. Officials will be having discussions with the industry organisations about this and other ideas, but I would not favour such a scheme unless I was satisfied that it would achieve proper value for the public money involved.

Sea Fish Industry Authority

Mr. Darling: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to visit the Sea Fish Industry Authority in Edinburgh in the near future.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I have not yet had the opportunity to visit the authority in Edinburgh but hope to do so soon.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Staff (Access)

Mr. Amess: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will list those sections of the Palace of Westminster where access is prohibited to staff of hon. Members; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wakeham: This information is contained in the leaflet, "Information for Members' Private Secretaries and Research Assistants" which is issued by the Serjeant at Arms. I will arrange for my hon. Friend to receive a copy.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Regional Development Fund

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many people since 1975 have been directly employed on schemes receiving European regional development fund support in each standard planning region.

Mr. Atkins: Since its inception in 1975 the fund has contributed to a wide variety of infrastructure investments throughout the assisted areas, and to the cost of regional industrial assistance for many productive investments. These investments have created or maintained employment in the projects in question as well as providing construction work at the outset.

The European Commission has published, in its 12th annual report (1986) on the fund, an estimate that it has directly helped to create or safeguard 221,604 jobs in the United Kingdom.

Military Goods and Services

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list in the Official Report the five United Kingdom-based companies which exported the largest amount of military goods and services in the year ended 31 March 1987, according to export licences granted by his Department.

Mr. Alan Clark: It is not appropriate to disclose information of a commercially confidential nature in relation to the granting of export licences.

Trade Descriptions Act

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement setting out the alternative arrangements to replace the safeguards of the Trade Descriptions Act 1972 referred to in the speech of the then Under-Secretary of State, Official Report, 27 April 1987, column 92.

Mr. Forth: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) on 20 October, Official Report, Column 981.

Misleading Price Markings

Mr. Neil Hamilton: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether he has reached a decision on the code of practice and proposed regulations under part III of the Consumer Protection Act 1987 to control certain misleading price indications.

Mr. Forth: I have given very careful consideration to all the representations put to me on the need for regulations to support the general offence of giving consumers a misleading price indication, laid down by part III of the Consumer Protection Act 1987. Public consultations did not reveal a consensus either on the need for regulations or on the form any regulations should take. There is no clear evidence at this stage of a need for regulations in addition to the general offence and the code of practice. Moreover, there is a risk that regulations could undermine the effectiveness of the general offence. I have therefore concluded that it would not be right to introduce regulations at this stage.

Taken together, I believe that the general offence and the code of practice will prove adequate to control misleading price indications and will do so in a way which is easier for all to understand and put into practice than regulations would be. Nonetheless, I intend that the operation of the new regime should be reviewed two or three years after coming into force (or earlier if the need arises), to ensure that if any difficulties emerge, they can be dealt with.

The code of practice will be revised to take account of comments received during consultations on it and the decision not to make regulations. We expect to publish the final version of the code at the end of this month, with the aim of bringing part III of the Consumer Protection Act 1987 into force on 1 March 1989. I believe that the lengthy consultations that we have carried out on this issue have been both valuable and necessary. As a result, we have now arrived at a regime which reflects a proper balance and will benefit both consumers and traders.

Medicine Imports

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what indication he can give of the detrimental effect on the balance of trade that is directly attributable to parallel imports of pharmaceutical products; and to what extent they have damaged investment in production in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Mellor: I have been asked to reply. We are aware that there is some general feeling in the research-based pharmaceutical industry that parallel imports could be harmful to the industry in various ways. We have not, however, seen any specific evidence of detrimental effects of the kind to which my hon. Friend refers.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Afghanistan

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan.

Mr. Eggar: We believe that the Soviet Union has withdrawn about half its troops from Afghanistan since the Geneva agreement. But Soviet forces are still taking aggressive military action there and have recently introduced more advanced weaponry. We look forward to the complete and prompt withdrawal of the remaining Soviet troops.

European Community (Foreign Policy)

Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the extent to which Britain's foreign policy remains independent of the other member states of the European Community.

Mr. Eggar: Britain's foreign policy remains British. Within the framework of European political co-operation we have an obligation to inform and consult our European partners on matters of general interest. The ability of the Twelve to speak and act together is a significant help in achieving British objectives.

Brazil

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the current state of Anglo-Brazilian relations.

Mr. Eggar: As I said in my reply of 19 October to a question by my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples), the United Kingdom enjoys traditionally good relations with Brazil, which we are seeking to develop. We welcome her return to democracy. Brazil is by far our largest export market in Latin America.

I have just returned from a most useful visit to Brazil during which I discussed a number of issues with the Brazilian authorities. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Energy visited Brazil in October.

GCHQ

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received regarding the cases of the sacked trade unionists at Government communications headquarters.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have received representations from hon. Members and from some trade unions. I have also received a number of letters from members of the public and a petition from the remaining GCHQ trade union members.

Central America

Mr. Flannery: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to visit any of the countries of central America in the near future.

Mr. Eggar: [illegible] my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of [illegible] will attend the San Jose V conference due to be held in San Pedro Sula, Honduras in February 1989. I also hope to be able to visit the region during 1989.

Turks and Caicos Islands (Attorney-General)

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action has been taken in the Turks and Caicos islands to prosecute the former Attorney-General, Terence Donegan, and to recover from him Crown lands appropriated to him and persons under his control.

Mr. Eggar: Mr. Terence Donegan has not been prosecuted by the Turks and Caicos Islands Government. Following a commission of inquiry, he was served with a deportation order in July 1987 and will not be allowed to re-enter the territory.

The question of restitution of alienated Crown lands is a matter for consideration by the Turks and Caicos Islands Government.

Chemical and Biological Weapons

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what is his policy towards proposals for a verifiable international treaty to ban all deployment of chemical and biological weapons;

(2) what consideration his Department has given to proposals for a complete and total international ban on chemical weapons.

Mr. Waldegrave: We participate actively in the negotiations currently taking place at the conference on disarmament in Geneva for a comprehensive and effectively verifiable prohibition of the development, production and stockpiling of chemical weapons and of their destruction. Such a ban is a major United Kingdom and NATO arms control priority. We are party to both the 1925 Geneva protocol which prohibits the use in war of chemical and biological weapons, and the 1972 biological weapons convention which prohibits the development, production and stockpiling of biological and toxin weapons.

Continental Shelf (Delimitation)

Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement about the agreement with the Republic of Ireland on the delimitation of the continental shelf signed in Dublin on 7 November.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave yesterday to my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth).

ENERGY

Energy Audits

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will seek powers to require the owner of any domestic or commercial property to include in the sale or rental particulars an energy rating; and if he will make a statement on energy audits.

Mr. Peter Morrison: No. This is a matter for the seller and the buyer of any domestic or commercial property and it would not be either desirable or appropriate for the Government to interfere.

Greenhouse Effect

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what assessment Her Majesty's Government have made of the number of additional nuclear power stations which will be required to have an impact on the greenhouse effect.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Man-made climate change (the greenhouse effect) is a complex subject involving many contributory factors and interrelationships. Carbon dioxide from biological and fossil fuel combustion sources is one such factor, but other trace gases in the atmosphere also contribute to the phenomenon.

There are still many uncertainties, but in the Government's view it will be necessary for the developed world to reach a common view on the effect of greenhouse gases when assessing the long-term implications for power generation.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what proposals his Department has to promote energy conservation as a way of alleviating the greenhouse effect.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I recognise that all forms of energy production have environmental consequences and that greater efficiency in energy use can help minimise these. That is one good reason, among many, for promoting energy efficiency. Earlier this year I announced a new phase in the work of the energy efficiency office in which it would run more specific and targeted services, building on its past successes.

Power Stations

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the total estimated cost of removing 60 per cent. of sulphur dioxide from coal-burning power station emissions; and what is the current level of spending on the programme.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The CEGB is evaluating the implications of meeting a reduction of 60 per cent. in emissions from its existing plant as required by the EC large combustion plant directive. Preliminary estimates suggest that the equivalent of an extra 6GW of plant, in addition to the existing 6GW voluntary retrofit programme, might need to be fitted with flue gas desulphurisation (FGD) equipment. The board is currently assessing tenders for the FGD equipment to be fitted to Drax, which will be the first station to be fitted under the existing programme. At present price levels the full programme could involve a capital cost of £1·6 billion and could also lead to additional operating costs.

Alternative Energy

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing, for the last five years, the amount of Governmental spending on research into energy from wind, solar, tidal and nuclear sources.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Expenditure under my Department's Vote has been as follows:

	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86	1986-87	1987-88
Wind	2·5	4·8	5·4	3·7	4·0
Solar	0·9	0·5	0·7	0·8	1·1
Tidal	0·9	0·3	0·1	0·1	1·4
Nuclear	203·8	186·0	189·6	183·9	172·5

Electricity

Sir Ian Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects to publish his Department's response to the third report of the Select Committee on Energy entitled "The Structure Regulation and Economic Consequences of Electricity Supply in the Private Sector."

Mr. Parkinson: The Government's reply was sent to the Committee on Friday 4 November. I understand that the Committee has today agreed a special report, which includes the reply as an appendix, and that copies of this special report are available in typescript in the Vote Office.

TRANSPORT

Road Accidents (Driver Statistics)

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what evidence he has on the relative probability of older drivers causing or being involved in road accidents.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: A detailed analysis of car driver accident involvement rates by age is given in TRRL research report 135, "The variation of car drivers' accident risk with age", which is available in the House of Commons Library. Updated figures, based on this report, will be given in "Road Accidents Great Britain 1987" which is expected to be published at the end of November.

No data are available on the probability of an older driver causing an accident as such information is not recorded on the accident report form.

The following table shows the number of car drivers involved in accidents, in 1987, for three approximately equal age bands of driver. However, as probability of being involved in an accident depends on the distance driven, and as older drivers do not drive as far, in general, as younger ones, the figures do not give a complete picture. This can be obtained from the TRRL report.

Age of driver	Number involved	Percentage of total
Under 35	146,276	51
35-54	86,447	30
55 and over	34,729	12
Not reported	20,184	7
All ages	287,636	100

Orange Badge Scheme

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if, on completion of his review of the orange badge scheme and publication of his revised leaflet on the subject, he will make a statement on new measures which he proposes to improve provisions for the disabled.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department of Transport has a strong and continuing commitment to improve transport facilities for people with disabilities. The review of the orange badge scheme is part of this process.

West Wellow (Accidents)

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the figure for personal injury accidents per million vehicle kilometres for the A36 trunk road through West Wellow, and give the comparable figure for the national average accident rate for this type of road, for the period 1 August 1985 to 31 July 1988; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The personal injury accident rate per million vehicle kilometres for the A36 through West Wellow is 0·7 for the period 1 August 1985 to 31 July 1988. National average accident rates are calculated annually for broad categories of roads. The 1987 rates for A class roads (both single and dual carriageway) were:

	Accident rate
Built-up with 40 mph speed limit	1·16
Non-built-up	0·34
All types	0·69

The A36 at West Wellow is a single carriageway with a 50 mph speed limit. National average accident rates for this type of road have not been calculated. Our agent authority consider that a rate of 0·62 would be appropriate in this case.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Hoddle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give details of the studies currently being undertaken by his Department to assess the likely impact on the motorway network in general and the M1 and M6 in particular of the increased volume of commercial traffic following the opening of the Channel tunnel.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department keeps the current and future operation of the motorway and trunk road networks under continuous review. The impact of the Channel tunnel is one of the many factors taken into account.

Motorways

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the role of his Department in proposals for the construction of an extension of the M11 through to Lincolnshire, Yorkshire and the north-east.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department is not involved in the proposals for extending the M11.

City Airport (Road Link)

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what options he is considering for building a fast new road link from Tower Hill to the Isle of Dogs and the City airport; and what is his objective for the completion of such a project.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: A number of junction improvements on the existing A13 have been included in the trunk road programme. There are no plans for a new trunk road link. The London Docklands development corporation (LDDC) has a programme of road schemes designed to improve access into and within docklands.

The consultants for the Department's east London assessment study are considering options to alleviate the transport related problems in a wide area of east London. The report giving their recommendations is due in the summer of 1989.

Eye Bypass

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if there has been a delay in the proposed start of the A47 Eye bypass in Cambridgeshire; when is the anticipated start date; and when is the expected completion date.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We should complete the formal statutory procedures to make the line, side road and compulsory purchase orders for the bypass by the end of November 1988. We have then to arrange some advance statutory undertakers works. We hope to start the main works on the bypass next summer. They will take about 18 months to complete.

Heavy Goods Vehicles (Spray)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the new EEC regulations for splash-spray containers on heavy goods vehicles will be implemented on an EEC-wide basis.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The United Kingdom is in favour of greater spray protection on lorries. Unfortunately there has been opposition to the proposed directive by a significant number of other member states. This has limited progress so far. It is impossible to say when the Commission draft directive will be accepted in the EC.

Roads (Open Draining Asphalt Systems)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what discussions he has had with representatives of transport trade associations on the use of open draining asphalt systems for British roads;

(2) what will be the cost of installing open draining asphalt systems as an alternative road surfacing on 10 per cent. of British motorways;

(3) what plans there are to use open draining asphalt systems for road surfacing in the United Kingdom;

(4) what is the approximate cost of open draining asphalt systems for road services compared with conventional surfaces used on Britain's roads.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Officials have met representatives of transport trade associations about the use of open draining asphalt materials. The Department is currently carrying out research into the properties of these materials. We expect the results to be available in the early part of 1990. Until then we cannot form a view as to whether these materials should be introduced on motorways and other trunk roads in England. Detailed cost information is not yet available. Current indications are that these materials will be significantly more expensive than conventional ones.

Heavy Goods Vehicles

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many regulations which apply to those heavy goods vehicles which are licensed in the United Kingdom are not applicable to heavy goods vehicles arriving in the United Kingdom from (a) other EEC countries and (b) other European countries.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In general, foreign lorries entering the United Kingdom for a period of more than three months must comply with all relevant United Kingdom legislation. Those arriving for periods of three months or less are exempted from customs duties and from certain of the vehicle lighting and the construction and use regulations.

Foreign vehicles carrying dangerous goods must comply with United Kingdom regulations, unless they meet the provisions of the United Nations agreement on the carriage of dangerous goods by road (ADR).

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he intends taking to bring the standards of heavy goods vehicles arriving in Britain up to the standards necessary for vehicles licensed and operating in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There is no evidence that the roadworthiness standards of visiting vehicles are lower than those of British vehicles. Foreign operators must comply with their national safety standards which, with the exception of our requirements on sideguards and spray suppression equipment, are generally similar to British standards.

Our construction and use requirements on weight limits apply to visiting vehicles.

Basic safety standards of vehicles on international journeys are applied by international conventions. Standards are enforced in the United Kingdom at ports and at the roadside. Heavy goods vehicles from EC member states must be tested annually, to comply with the EC roadworthiness directive.

Air Traffic Delays

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport by what percentage air traffic delays have increased at United Kingdom airports from 1984 to the present day.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to my reply given on Monday 7 November at column 70.

M27—M3 Link

Mr. Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has yet received the independent inspector's report on the latest public inquiry about the final motorway link between the M27 and M3; and when contracts are likely to be placed.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. We hope to receive the report of the reopened public inquiry into the Bar End of Compton section of M3 shortly. The timing of construction depends upon the inspector's recommendations and the joint decisions of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for the Environment and for Transport.

Thames Bridges

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to prevent damage to Thames bridges by river traffic.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 7 November 1988]: The Port of London Authority is responsible for controlling river traffic and making byelaws below Teddington lock. Bridge designs take account of the risks and consequences of possible collisions. It has not been the practice of Thames bridge authorities to provide external protection which would reduce the navigational channel.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Slaughtering Facilities

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the utilisation of livestock slaughtering facilities for cattle, sheep and pigs in Northern Ireland at existing abattoirs and meat plants; and whether there is over or under provision of slaughtering facilities.

Mr. Viggers: There are 23 slaughterhouses in Northern Ireland with a combined cattle and sheep slaughter capacity per week of approximately 23,000 cattle equivalents (one cattle unit equals five sheep) and 29,000 pigs. In recent years utilisation of slaughtering facilities was as follows:

Average weekly slaughterings

Year	Cattle equivalents	Pigs
1987	11,197	22,364
1986	12,025	23,352
1985	13,895	22,850

Year	Cattle equivalents	Pigs
1984	12,998	22,389
Peak weekly slaughterings
1987	15,152	25,247
1986	20,029	27,959
1985	24,183	26,890
1984	20,534	28,646

On an annual or average weekly basis, there is overprovision of slaughtering capacity. However, as the figures above for 1984 (pigs) and 1985 (cattle) indicate, there are times when the total capacity now available is required to cater for the seasonal peak of slaughtering in any year of high livestock production and marketing.

Set-aside Proposals

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the response by farmers to the new agriculture set-aside proposals.

Mr. Viggers: The Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland has received 16 applications to take 180 hectares of land out of cereal production, mostly for permanent fallow and non-agricultural use. This represents about 0·36 per cent. of land given over to cereals in Northern Ireland. A further 82 farmers have registered 2,400 hectares for potential set-aside in future years. If all the registrations were followed through to become applications, 5 per cent. of eligible land would be taken out of production.

Water Charges

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received about the increase in metered water charges in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: Since 1 April 1988 representations have been received from 16 sources, including a Member of Parliament, 14 district councils and the Ulster Farmers' Union.

School Meals

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table showing the average price of a school meal in (a) primary and (b) secondary schools for each year since 1979 to 1988 in 1988 prices in Northern Ireland.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information is as follows:

(Pence)

	Primary	Secondary
1979	46·64	46·64
1980	55·13	55·13
1981	64·52	64·52
1982	66·91	66·91
1983	70·39	70·39
1984	67·00	67·00
1985	69·35	69·35
1986	67·11	67·11
1987	74·38	79·69
1988	75·00	80·00

Average charge for a fixed price school meal adjusted to 1988 prices using the GDP deflator.

Private Health Care

Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the links between the study presently being undertaken by United Medical Enterprises and his plans to encourage private health care in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: There are no links between the present Northern Ireland health care exports study being undertaken by United Medical Enterprises and the Government's approach to private health care provision in Northern Ireland.

Ultimate Dream (Order)

Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on (a) the precise reasons why his recent negotiations with Mr. Ravi Tikkoo broke down and (b) the efforts presently being made by his Department to help secure the Ultimate Dream cruise liner order for Harland and Wolff.

Mr. Viggers: For reasons of commercial confidentiality, I am unable to elaborate on why negotiations broke down with Mr. Tikkoo. I can confirm that the Government were willing to make very substantial public funds available, in addition to full intervention aid, to enable Mr. Tikkoo to acquire the yard and to construct the Ultimate Dream. Unfortunately, Mr. Tikkoo did not feel able to proceed on the basis proposed.

The Government are committed to returning Harland and Wolff to the private sector. It will be up to the new owners to win orders for the yard under terms with which they are content. Requests by a privately owned Harland and Wolff for intervention aid for the Ultimate Dream or other merchant contracts will be considered within the limits permitted by the United Kingdom Government and the EC at that time.

Harland and Wolff

Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the criteria that Harland and Wolff need to meet in order to be able to tender for Government contracts.

Mr. Viggers: It will be open to Harland and Wolff under private ownership to seek further MOD orders. Its eligibility to undertake such work would be assessed by the MOD in the normal way.

Seals Virus

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what evidence he has of porpoises, dolphins and other cetaceans being infected by the North sea seals virus or related viruses in United Kingdom coastal waters.

Mr. Viggers [holding answer 4 November 1988]: Three dead porpoises have been received at the Department of Agriculture veterinary laboratory in Belfast from Strangford Lough and Newcastle, Co. Down. Pathological and virological examinations on two of these have shown gross and microscopic lesions of pneumonia and encephalitis identical to those seen in seals found to have been infected with a virus from the same virus group as canine distemper. Similar viral antigens have been found in both the seals and porpoises. Studies are continuing on the relationship of these viruses to canine distemper.

EMPLOYMENT

YTS

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many YTS places are available; and how many applicants for YTS places there are, in each area of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Cope: Regional figures for the number of agreed places which were unfilled on 30 September, the latest date for which information is available, are provided in the table:

	Number
London	11,300
South East	16,800
South West	10,900
West Midlands	19,900
East Midlands and Eastern	13,600
Yorkshire and Humberside	8,200
North West	13,900
Northern	6,700
Wales	3,500
Scotland	12,000
Great Britain	116,800

Northern Ireland has a separate programme for youth training.

Comparable figures for the number of applicants are not available. Each local careers office will have its own records of the number of those who have at any one time applied to them for a YTS place. This information could not be at aggregated regional or national level except at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many 16 and 17-year-olds are eligible for the YTS but have not been placed at the most recent date for which the information was available.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 7 November 1988]: All 16 and 17-year-olds not in full-time education are eligible to apply for YTS, but many do not do so. It is not possible to estimate how many of this summer's school leavers are seeking a place. On 2 November there were 31,882 young people who had applied for a YTS place and were receiving bridging allowance.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide an estimate of the total number of 16 and 17-year-olds who will not have received an offer of a YTS place on the termination of the bridging allowance on 5 November in Wales and each of the standard regions.

Mr. Cope [holding answer, 7 November 1988]: It is the responsibility of the local authority careers service to ensure that a young person who has applied to it for a YTS place, and made himself or herself available, to discuss possible places, is put in contact with managing agents to ensure they are offered a start on a YTS scheme before the end of the guarantee period. The Training Agency has made more than sufficient places available in all areas of the country to meet the potential take up. Local careers offices do not always know if a young person takes a job but they may be able to estimate how many young people were not offered a place because, for example, they did not come into the office for an interview, but I am not aware of any national estimate—which in any case would be difficult to make on a consistent basis across the country.

Job Clubs

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many unemployed claimants have been referred to job clubs or the new job training scheme as a result of restart interviews since 1986; how many of them have subsequently taken up places in job clubs or on NJTS; how many of them have been recalled for follow-up interviews with either a claimant adviser or restart counsellor because they have failed to join the job club or NJTS; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Referrals to jobclubs and new job training Scheme since 1986 are given in the table. We do not know how many people ultimately take up the options offered to them at the restart interview. Information is only held on the total number of follow-up interviews carried out and not by category.

	Referrals to:
Year	Jobclubs	NJTS
1986-87	76,690	3,456
1987-88	225,130	227,912
1988-89[1]	110,143	121,051
Total	411,963	352,419

Tourism

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many tourist attractions in the United Kingdom are based on railway history; and how many have received grant aid.

Mr. Lee: The Museums Association currently list 31 railway-based attractions in the United Kingdom open to the public which have historical connections. There are also a large number of smaller attractions such as individual restored locomotives. Of the 31 major attractions, one in England received grant aid under section 4 of the Development of Tourism Act in 1988-89. In Northern Ireland, under the local authority grants scheme, one attraction received assistance in 1987-88, and one in 1988-89.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what grants are available to private companies promoting tourism which intend to expand their operations in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lee: Grants are available in England through the English Tourist Board under section 4 of the Development of Tourism Act 1969. Tourism projects may also be eligible for other forms of assistance, for example, from the MAFF farm diversification scheme or the DTI's city grant scheme.

HEALTH

Local Authority Spending

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will state the amount of local authority spending, on average, on social services and the amount per head for 1960, 1970, 1979, 1984 and 1988.

Mr. Mellor: The table gives the information requested for the financial years 1979-80 (outturn), 1984-85 (outturn) and 1988-89 (budgets). The figures are also shown in real terms adjusted by the GDP deflator (base 1987-88). Information for 1960 and 1970 is not available in a comparable form.

Doctors

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will state, as a ratio, the number of doctors to patients in the National Health Service for 1970, 1979, 1984 and 1988; and if he will give the percentage change for those years.

Mr. Meller: Meaningful ratios cannot be obtained to include all hospital activity. The table sets out information available about hospital services.

Table: doctors and patients—NHS hospital services, England

Medicine Imports

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many product licences (parallel imports) have been granted for medicines imported from each of the member states of the European Community; and what was the value of the parallel imports of medicines from each country in 1987.

Mr. Meller: The number of product licences (parallel imports) granted for medicinal products imported from each of the member states of the European Community as at 31 October 1988 is as follows:

	Number
Belgium	1,147
Denmark	49
Eire	Nil
France	584
Germany	28
Greece	169
Holland	17
Italy	311
Luxembourg	Nil
Portugal	Nil
Spain	4

No information is available about the value of parallel imports of medicinal products from each country in 1987.

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which EEC countries are not members of the pharmaceutical inspection convention.

Mr. Meller: EEC countries which are not members of the pharmaceutical inspection convention are:

Spain
France
Italy
Luxembourg
Greece
Holland

(Belgium has recently joined the convention).

Measles, Mumps, Rubella

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many doses of the measle mumps rubella vaccine were available in each district health authority to coincide with the launch of the measles mumps rubella immunisation campaign by his Department on 1 October; and why clinics in the Tower Hamlets district health authority have had to refuse vaccinations to four to five-year-olds.

Mrs. Currie: District health authorities obtain supplies of the vaccine from some 250 nominated ordering points. By 1 October each ordering point had available an average of 1,080 doses, and a minimum of 270 doses, with 300,000 doses available in total. Further supplies continue to be distributed on a regular basis. We are still on target to distribute one million doses by Christmas. Because of local uncertainty about supplies Tower Hamlets district health authority decided to defer its programme for four to five-year-olds for a short period. It now plans to resume this programme in January 1989 and supply is matching its capacity to use the vaccine.

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps are being taken to ensure that adequate supplies of measles mumps rubella vaccine are supplied to district health authorities to meet the demands created by the measles mumps rubella immunisation campaign launched by his Department on 1 October.

Mrs. Currie: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 31 October to my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Hicks) at column 491.

Nurses (Back Injuries)

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish in the Official Report the cost to district health authorities of back injury litigation claims by nurses.

Mr. Meller: We do not collect this sort of detailed information centrally.

Private Residential Homes

Mr. Jack Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has any plans to introduce new legislation to improve safety and care standards in private residential homes.

Mrs. Currie: The Registered Homes Act 1984 gives my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State powers to make regulations governing the conduct and inspection of private and voluntary residential care homes registered with local social services authorities. We have used these powers to make the Residential Care Homes Regulations 1984 (S.I. 1345) which includes requirements for adequate arrangements for fire safety and for precautions against the risk of accidents. The regulations as amended by the Residential Care Homes (Amendment) Regulations 1988 also oblige authorities to inspect registered homes at least twice in every period of 12 months. In addition general guidance on the running of residential care homes is available in "Home Life", a code of practice for residential care, and in circulars issued by the Department. Further regulations or guidance will be issued as necessary.

These measures complement the health and safety at work legislation in its application to these homes.

RAWP Targets

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects St. Helens and Knowsley health authority to reach its resource allocation working party target; and if he will make it his policy to target the additional resources announced in the autumn statement on those authorities significantly below resource allocation working party target.

Mr. Mellor: It is a matter for Mersey regional health authority to make decisions about the funding of St. Helens and Knowsley health authority. Regions are expected to base allocations on service plans and not simply apply a formula. RAWP has significantly reduced the disparities between regional health authorities since 1978-79 so that no region is now more than 4 per cent. below its RAWP target. We will be making decisions on regional allocations for 1989-90 shortly.

Cleveland (Child Abuse)

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he has taken to monitor the response of the social services department in Cleveland to the criticisms made by the report of the inquiry into child abuse in Cleveland 1987.

Mr. Mellor: I have called for and received from the leader of the Cleveland county council an account of the measures being taken to ensure that the events in Cleveland never happen again. I have asked the social services inspectorate to undertake an immediate inspection of the current policies and procedures in Cleveland county council for responding to possible or actual cases of child sexual abuse.

The inspection will centre on the investigation of a sample of children recently referred to the social services department where sexual abuse has been suspected or alleged. The focus will be primarily on the arrangements within the social services department but will also take account of the relationships with the health authorities, police and other agencies. These terms of reference and the arrangements from the inspection have been agreed with the local authority. The social services inspectorate will report by the end of November.

Aluminium

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice is available to him as to which diseases are caused by overconsumption of aluminium.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 1 November 1988]: Aluminium and its salts are of low toxicity and have various approved uses in medical practice and in the food and water industries. No disease is known to be caused by aluminium naturally present, or as a result of approved use, in food or drinking water.

An hypothesis that aluminium may have a role in the causation of Alzheimer's disease is amongst those currently being studied. Rare incidents of gross contamination of water with certain salts of aluminium have caused acute outbreaks of diarrhoea and vomiting. Prolonged overconsumption of aluminium hydroxide, used as an antacid, can cause metabolic disturbances including demineralisation of bone (osteomalacia) particularly in people with kidney disease. Renal dialysis with fluid high in aluminium is liable to cause encephalopathy and osteomalacia because the aluminium readily enters the bloodstream, unlike ingested aluminium; low aluminium dialysis fluid is therefore now used.

Mental Health Act Commission

Mr. John Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in how many cases since the establishment of the Mental Health Act Commission a second-opinion-approved doctor has disagreed with the treatment plan of the responsible medical officer; and, in each case, on what grounds.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 4 November 1988]: The number of cases since the establishment of the Mental Health Act Commission in which a second-opinion-approved doctor has declined to issue a certificate under sections 57 or 58 of the Mental Health Act 1983 is not known.

For the two year period 1 July 1985 to 30 June 1987, there were 5845 "second opinions" given under section 58 of the Mental Health Act 1983 and 54 "second opinions" given under section 57.

In 4 to 6 per cent. of the cases a certificate was not issued. The reasons for non-issue of certificates are not available.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Attendance Allowance

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will place in the Library copies of all the standard letters used by his Department in turning down claims for the attendance allowance.

Mr. Scott: Copies of the letters have been placed in the Library.

Unclaimed Benefits

Dr. Reid: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much of the total social security and benefits entitlement was left unclaimed in the past year.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No precise estimates of total unclaimed benefits can be provided and those figures which the Department does publish give no more than the broadest orders of magnitude. I refer the hon. Member to paragraphs 21 to 25 and table 15.17 on pages 272 to 273 of Cm. 288 (the 1988 Public Expenditure White Paper) for details of the latest available take-up estimates for the main income-related benefits. Take-up estimates for 1985 should be available by around the end of this year.

Retirement Pensions

Mr. Adley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many additional persons are qualified to receive and are in receipt of retirement pensions now, compared with 1979.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: In 1979, 8·8 million pensioners were in receipt of basic retirement pension. By March 1988 this figure had risen to 9·8 million. This represents an increase over the period of 11·4 per cent.

Forms (Welsh Language)

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he intends to review the procedures at local offices in Wales to ensure that (a) claimants are made aware of the fact that certain forms are available in the Welsh language or in a bilingual form and (b) that local offices keep a sufficient supply of these forms to meet demand.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Officials are undertaking a review of all aspects of the provision of forms in the Welsh language in the light of the 1988 social security reforms and the Department's communications strategy. This will include consideration of publicity and supply arrangements.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the forms which are available in a bilingual form at local offices in Wales by reference to the nature of the benefit claimed.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Department does not produce bilingual forms.

The following list contains all the forms currently available, or in preparation, in Welsh.

Family Credit—FC1 and FC2 (with printers)
Social Fund—SF100, SF200, SF101, SF102, Sf103 and SF113
General—BF134
National Insurance—NI255 and RD3A

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he will review the adequacy of the provision of forms in the Welsh language at local offices in Wales and in particular forms of application for sickness benefit.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Officials are undertaking a review of the arrangements for producing Welsh language versions of some of those social security forms for local offices in Wales.

A Welsh language version of application form SC1, for sickness benefits, is not available. The great majority of claims are for statutory sick pay and are handled by employers.

Family Credit

Mr. Nicholas Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action he is taking to reduce delays in dealing with applications for family credit.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: In recent weeks clearance of some claims has been delayed by the effects of the postal strike: prior to that the average time taken to deal with a claim was very near our target of 18 working days. Action already taken to reduce delays includes an extension of the arrangements for identifying cases which should be given priority because the claimant or partner has just started work after being on income support.

Delays often occur because of the need to obtain further information from claimants or whilst awaiting earnings information from employers. We are looking at possible improvements both to the claim form to try to ensure that all the required information is provided at the outset, and to the inquiry form about earnings sent to employers. We shall shortly be laying amending regulations to provide for relaxations in the rules about the acceptability of accounts in claims from self-employed people which should enable them to supply information about their earnings more easily and more quickly.

Enhancements to the family credit computer system will become available in the new year and will improve routines and provide more information for management control purposes.

Income Support

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if the amount included in the income support personal allowances for compensating for 20 per cent. community charge contribution is based on the average liability for income support claimants; and how this amount differs from the average community charge as a whole.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We are satisfied that the amounts included in the 1989-90 income support rates as compensation for 20 per cent. of the community charge are adequate to meet the average liability faced by single claimants under 25, and by couples. For single claimants over 25 compensation is more than adequate. These amounts are likely to be somewhat higher than the average community charge faced by the population as a whole.

Private Residential Care Accommodation

Mr. Jack Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the estimated cost to his Department of the provision of private residential care accommodation (a) nationally and (b) in the county of Northumberland for each of the years 1980 to 1987.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Separate figures for those independent residential care homes which are run privately are not collected either nationally or on a regional basis.

Social Fund

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the operation of the social fund.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The social fund has now been operating satisfactorily for over seven months. Social fund loans have been steadily increased as more people have become aware of the flexible and effective help which is available through budgeting loans to enable them to spread the cost of large expenses which are difficult to meet from weekly benefit, and through crisis loans for those facing an extreme short-term financial difficulty. About 60 per cent. of all budgeting loan applications and almost 90 per cent. of crisis loan applications have resulted in a payment being made.

The take-up of community care grants has been slower, (in September it was 52 per cent. of profiled expenditure) though there has been a steady increase in applications over recent months as more people have become aware of the special contribution that these new grants provide, both to help people in vulnerable groups re-establish themselves in the community and to improve the living conditions of those already in the community and reducing the risk of their going into institutional or residential care. Awards have been made for about 45 per cent. of applications; unfortunately many people who have applied have not satisfied the basic criteria for community care grants (ie not on income support). We are currently considering what further steps might need to be taken to ensure that those people for whom the grants are intended are made aware of their availability and are encouraged to apply.

The review system is proving to be a quick and effective way of reconsidering disputed decisions on social fund applications. About 20 per cent. of people who are refused a payment have been exercising their right to ask for a review in the local office and about 29 per cent. of review decisions have resulted in the original decision being changed. Applicants who remain dissatisfied have the right to ask for a further review by a social fund inspector. The figures show that in about two-thirds of cases which have reached the social fund inspectors the decision on the review conducted in the local office has been confirmed. In about one-third of cases the social fund inspectors have referred the papers back to the local office for reconsideration or further action as appropriate.

I have arranged for national tables to be placed in the Library showing for the latest month available, and the year to date, the numbers of applications received, applications processed, the outcome of decisions and data on the review procedure. These will be updated monthly. Copies of this information are held at the Department's libraries where they may be viewed by appointment. Two copies are deposited with the British Library, one of which may be borrowed by other libraries for inquiries; the other copies may be consulted at the British Library. Microfiche copies may be purchased from Messrs. Chadwyck-Healey of Cambridge.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish national and regional figures on the take-up to date of community care grants and crisis loans from the social fund; if he will state for each region and the nation as a whole what percentage of the annual budgeted totals for community care grants and crisis loans these payments represent, for each region and the nation as a whole and what percentage of the total monthly budgets for community care grants and crisis loans to date these payments represent; and if he will place these figures in the Library on a monthly basis from the present time.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 4 November 1988]: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell) today.

From now on we shall be making available national summary tables of social fund data which will be updated monthly. There is not a separate budget for crisis loans; however the tables show expenditure separately for both budgeting loans and crisis loans from which it is possible to calculate total loans expenditure as a percentage of the annual loans budget. Expenditure nationally as a percentage of national monthly profiled expenditure can be calculated by reference to the national profile of expenditure held in the Library. We do not propose to publish aggregated data for the seven social security administrative regions; however details of the allocations to, and expenditure by, individual local offices, listed by region, are in the Library.

Transitional Payments Unit

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing, for each month since the transitional payments unit was set up, the number of (a) applications received, (b) inquiry forms issued to local authorities, (c) inquiry forms returned by local authorities, (d) transitional payments assessed, (e) applicants found to have no entitlement to transitional payments, (f) declaration forms issued to applicants, (g) declaration forms returned and (h) Giro cheques issued and their total value.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 27 October 1988]: The table provides statistical information on housing benefit transitional payments, showing the cumulative position on the last working day of each month.

	July	August	September	October
Applications received	135,433	267,009	316,473	359,866

Lone Parents

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what research his Department has undertaken or sponsored on the impact of the availability of social security benefits on the behaviour of (a) young single parents and (b) married men seeking separation from their wives.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 7 November 1988]: The number of lone parents receiving supplementary benefit increased from 318,000 to 659,000 between 1979 and 1987 (excluding cases of temporary separation and prisoners' wives). The number of unmarried lone parents receiving supplementary benefit increased during this period from 96,000 to 268,000. In contrast the value, in 1987 terms, of the total amount of maintenance payable to claimants has remaind static. Independent research which we have commissioned is exploring the motivations and perceptions of lone parents receiving benefit. We will continue to examine the connections between benefits and behaviour.

Child Benefit

Mr. Raison: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security at what level the latest public expenditure projections for 1990-91 and 1991-92 assume an uprating of child benefit.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 7 November 1988]: The new public expenditure plans include provision for uprating child benefit in line with the increases in prices in April 1990 and April 1991. For this purpose the retail prices index is assumed to rise by 5·5 per cent. for the uprating in 1990-91 and four per cent. for the uprating in 1991-92. However the actual level of child benefit in April 1990 and April 1991 will be decided by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State following the review which he is required to conduct each year.

THE ARTS

Paintings (Sales)

Mr. Faulds: To ask the Minister for Arts why he did not reply, before the House adjourned on 29 July for the recess, to the priority question addressed to him by the hon. Member for Warley, East for answer on 22 July; and whether he will now answer the second part of that question by indicating any bodies or individuals, other than the trustees and directors of the National gallery, the Tate gallery and the National Portrait gallery, whose opinions he would regard as relevant and of value on the subject of imposition by statute of powers to sell paintings vested in them on the trustees of those three particular institutions.

Mr. Luce: I much regret that, due to an administrative oversight, I did not reply to this question before the House adjourned on 29 July.

I published a consultative paper on disposal powers of national museums and galleries on 5 August this year. It has been circulated to a wide variety of museum, gallery and heritage interests for comment. I shall give careful consideration to the views of all interested parties.

SCOTLAND

Hospital Waiting Lists

19. Mr. Conway: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress he is making in reducing hospital waiting lists in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Over the last two years my right hon. and learned Friend has allocated an extra £6·6 million to reduce hospital waiting lists and waiting times. By March 1988 the number of people waiting for in-patient treatment fell by around 5 per cent. This year it will be possible for 30,000 extra out-patients to be seen or have tests done, 8,600 extra in-patients to be treated and 3,760 extra day cases to be treated.

YTS

20. Mr. McKelvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the implementation of the YTS guarantee in Scotland.

Mr. Lang: There are more YTS places currently available in Scotland than young people on bridging allowance. The Government expect that a YTS place will be found for all summer school leavers before their entitlement to child benefit expires.

Rent Arrears

21. Dr. Reid: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received regarding the level of rent arrears in Scotland from Motherwell district council or other Scottish local authorities.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend and I have received a number of representations from local authorities about various aspects of housing finance.

CBI

22. Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent discussions he has had with the Confederation of British Industry in Scotland concerning the Scottish economy.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend keeps in frequent touch with the Confederation of British Industry in Scotland on matters affecting the Scottish economy. His recent discussions have covered, among other things, the imaginative proposals for Scottish Enterprise advanced by the chairman of the CBI (Scotland).

46. Sir Hector Monro: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next intends to have a meeting with the chairman of the Confederation of British Industry (Scotland) to discuss the prospects for the Scottish economy.

Mr. Rifkind: I have frequent contacts with the chairman on a range of industrial and economic issues, including most recently the proposals for Scottish Enterprise which he has advanced. I look forward to a continuing exchange of views on these and other issues.

Community Care

23. Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received on the report by Sir Roy Griffiths, "Community Care: Agenda for Action"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: In addition to the organisations listed in my reply to the hon. Gentleman on 29 June 1988 representations have now been received from the following bodies:

Age Concern (Scotland)
Borders Health Board

Forth Valley Health Board
Highland Health Board
Licensed Victuallers National Homes
Renfrew District Disability Council
Scottish Action on Dementia
Scottish Consumer Council
Scottish Health Service General Managers Group
Volunteer Development Scotland
West Lothian Mental Health Forum

Mentally Handicapped People

24. Dr. Moonie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he proposes to improve the position of community care for mentally handicapped people in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Decisions about the provision of services in the community for people suffering from mental handicap are primarily for health boards and local authorities. Since 1979 we have substantially increased the resources available resulting in a considerable upturn in the level of services in the community for this group notably in day care and residential provision which have increased by 53 per cent. and 60 per cent. respectively. The funding and organisation of community care are under consideration in the light of the report prepared by Sir Roy Griffiths and the Government will bring forward proposals in due course.

Glasgow

25. Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what level of Government resources have been devoted to Glasgow since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: It is impractical to list the very substantial resources that many Government Departments and agencies have devoted to Glasgow—either directly or indirectly—in this period, though the results of generous Government funding are plain to see in the city. Within my own responsibility I draw particular attention to rate support grant payments, housing grants, and expenditure by the Scottish Development Agency and by the greater Glasgow health board.

	(1) Total rate support grant paid to Glasgow District Council	(2) Housing grants	(3) Scottish Development Agency	(4) Greater Glasgow Health Board

Notes:
Column (1) The figures are the latest estimates available.
Column (2) The figures include housing support grant, housing association grant, Scottish Special Housing Association expenditure and housing improvement etc. specific grants.
Column (3) The figures for 1984-85 to 1987-88 include spending on the Garden festival.

Council House Sales

26. Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many council houses were sold to sitting tenants in Scotland between May 1979 and June 1983, between June 1983 and June 1987 and since June 1987.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The numbers of dwellings sold by Scottish local authorities to sitting tenants in the periods from May 1979 to June 1983 and from July 1983 to June 1987 were 26,768 and 45,514 respectively. A further 17,828 sales in the period from July 1987 to 30 June 1988 have been reported to date.

27. Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many council houses have been sold in Scotland since 1979; how many applications have been received since October 1987; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Returns received to date from local authorities record 90,110 sales of council houses to sitting tenants between April 1979 and June 1988. The number of applications received between October 1987 and September 1988 was 44,292. The recent and sustained surge in applications and sales, which are making a major contribution to the diversification of ownership, is further evidence of the success of the Government's right-to-buy policy.

Campaign for a Scottish Assembly

28. Mr. Galloway: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received on the proposals in the Campaign for a Scottish Assembly's document, "Claim of Right for Scotland"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: I have received two letters including one from the Campaign for a Scottish Assembly itself. The reply to the campaign made clear the Government's commitment to the unity of the United Kingdom and our belief that the present constitutional arrangements provide for Scotland's interests to be fully respected and recognised.

SSHA (House Sales)

29. Mr. Ron Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many Scottish Special Housing Association houses have been sold to tenants in the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In the year to 30 September 1988, the Scottish Special Housing Association sold 5,150 houses bringing its total sales under the Government's right-to-buy policy to 22,640.

Nurses (Pay)

30. Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the current situation regarding nurses' pay in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: In common with the rest of the country, nurses' pay in Scotland now stands at its highest ever level in real terms, having increased by nearly 44 per cent. since 1979. Over 60,000 nurses are being assimilated into the new clinical grading structure and will receive increases ranging from 4 per cent. to over 33·6 per cent. this year. Health boards are being funded to meet the full cost.

National Farmers Union

31. Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met representatives of the National Farmers Union of Scotland; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. and learned Friend last met the president of the union at the royal highland show on 21 June. The discussion covered a wide range of issues concerning Scottish agriculture. My noble Friend the Minister of State has regular meetings with union representatives to discuss issues of current concern. The most recent of these meetings was on 26 September.

Nurses (Regrading)

32. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to deal with appeals following the nurse regrading exercise.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Appeals will be a matter for employing authorities to deal with under the agreed procedures for settling differences between employing authorities and individual employees.

Scottish Council (Development and Industry)

33. Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to meet representatives of the Scottish Council (Development and Industry); and what matters he proposes to discuss.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend has frequent discussions with the Scottish Council on a range of industrial and economic issues. He looks forward to a continuing exchange of views.

Scottish TUC

34. Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next expects to meet officials from the Scottish Trade Union Congress; and what matters he proposes to discuss.

Mr. Lang: I have agreed to a recent request from the Scottish Trade Union Congress for a meeting to discuss matters affecting the Scottish economy. A date is being arranged.

Salmon Fishing

35. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the Crown Estate Commissioners to discuss the development of salmon farming in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend has had no such recent meetings recently, but I met the First Crown Estate Commissioner on 28 June.

Balbirnie House

36. Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the sale of Balbirnie house and grounds to Balbirnie House Hotels Ltd. by Glenrothes new town development corporation.

Mr. Lang: Formal approval to the projected detailed terms of the sale was given by my right hon. and learned Friend on 25 October. Since the matter is still the subject to commercial negotiation, I cannot comment further at this stage.

Scottish Development Agency

37. Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to alter the operation of the Scottish Development Agency.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend intends to publish a consultative paper before Christmas about proposals for a new approach to training and enterprise creation, bringing together the work of the Scottish Development Agency and the Training Agency in Scotland.

Manufacturing Output

38. Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the level of manufacturing output per employee in Scotland in 1987; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: In 1987 the level of manufacturing output per employee in Scotland was 55 per cent. higher than in 1979. Indeed between 1979 and 1987 manufacturing productivity in Scotland increased by 5·6 per cent. per annum, faster than that achieved in any of the major seven OECD economies.

Borders Region

39. Mr. Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from the Borders regional council concerning the possibility of European Community assistance for the Borders region.

Mr. Rifkind: Borders regional council have asked for a case to be presented to the European Commission in support of their claim for Community assistance as a rural area. Their claims, and those of other non-assisted rural areas, will be considered by the Government once the new regulations and procedures governing the Community's structural funds have been finalised. However, funds available for rural areas will be limited, and concentration on the most needy areas will be necessary.

Rent and Rates Arrears

40. Mr. McTaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next intends to meet the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities housing committee to discuss the level of rent and rates arrears in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to do so but I expect to meet representatives of the convention's housing committee on 2 December to discuss various aspects of housing finance.

Argyll and Clyde Health Board

41. Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the chairman and representatives of the Argyll and Clyde health board; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. and learned Friend has not met the chairman and representatives of Argyll and Clyde health board. I regularly meet the chairmen of all health boards jointly.

Royal Ordnance (Bishopton)

42. Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has been in contact with British Aerospace over the proposed rundown of the Royal Ordnance factory at Bishopton; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend has written to the chairman of British Aerospace suggesting a meeting to discuss British Aerospace interests in Scotland generally. I have written separately to the chairman of Royal Ordnance requesting further details of how the company intends to help minimise the effects of the proposed rundown at Bishopton.

SSHA

43. Mr. Allen Adams: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representation he has received on his proposals relating to the future of the Scottish Special Housing Association.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Government's view of the future of the Scottish Special Housing Association was set out in CM 242 ("Housing: The Government's Proposals for Scotland"). It proposed that the association's responsibilities for housing in Scotland should be taken over by Scottish Homes. The wide range of views submitted on these proposals were fully debated at various stages of consideration of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988.

Uniform Business Rate

44. Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland to what extent the introduction of a uniform business rate in Scotland is contingent on the full harmonisation of valuation practices in England and Wales and Scotland.

Mr. Lang: Our purpose is to achieve, at the earliest opportunity, fairness for Scottish business ratepayers and protection from the depredations of high-spending local councils. We have made it clear we see advantage in moving to a common non-domestic poundage in all areas but recognise that this first requires harmonisation of valuation practice north and south of the border in order to avoid perpetuating many of the anomalies about which Scottish businessmen are understandably concerned.

Pre-school Nurseries

45. Mr. Michael J. Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he intends to give any guidance to local authorities as to the financial provision they should make for pre-school nurseries.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: In the calculation of the planning figure for education included in the rate support grant settlement, an allowance of £35·5 million was made for nursery education. It is, however, for individual authorities to determine the level of spending on particular services, within the resources available, having regard to local priorities. I have no wish to limit their discretion in this matter.

Tayside (Crime Statistics)

47. Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details of the latest crime figures for Tayside.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In the first eight months of 1988 43,459 crimes and offences were recorded in Tayside, compared with 43,527 in the same period of 1987. This is a decrease of 0·2 per cent. Further details are given in the table.

Tenants' Rights

48. Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he has taken to ensure that the statutory rights available to public sector tenants in Scotland will also be made available to private sector Scottish tenants.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend has always accepted that the rights of private and public sector tenants should be comparable so far as possible given their different circumstances. This will be achieved for the future by part II of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988, which will revitalise the private rented sector and will, for example, give the private tenant a right to a writen statement of the terms of the tenancy and a right of protection against harassment, arbitrary eviction, and the exaction of key money. A booklet explaining these and other tenants' rights will be widely available.

Education Reform

49. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he intends to introduce legislation in the next Session of Parliament which will allow primary and secondary schools in Scotland to opt out of local education authority control.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Our legislative intentions for the next Session of Parliament will be announced in due course in the usual way.

Scottish Transport Group

50. Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the progress of the proposed privatisation of the Scottish Transport Group.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend hopes shortly to annouce the detailed pattern of privatisation in terms of the units to be offered for sale in the Scottish Transport Group's main subsidiary, the Scottish Bus Group. My right hon. and learned Friend is presently considering the future arrangements for Caledonian MacBrayne Ltd.

Rating Reform

51. Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received on the certification procedures to determine whether a person's mental impairment is sufficiently severe to enable him or her to be exempt from the poll tax; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend has received a number of comments on this matter from Members of Parliament and members of the public.

A consultation paper on procedures for identification of those who may be exempt was issued to interested bodies by the Scottish Office on 22 October 1987. A further consultation paper, issued on 16 August 1988, sought views on the requirements for certain benefit entitlements in respect of the exemption. The responses to these consultation papers were taken carefully into account before the promulgation of recommended procedures in NHS circular 1988(GEN)25 and the making of the Personal Community Charge (Exemption for the Severely Mentally Impaired) (Scotland) Regulations 1988.

Educational Institute of Scotland

52. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the general secretary of the Educational Institute of Scotland; what subjects were discussed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. and learned Friend last met the general secretary of the Educational Institute of Scotland in December 1986 in relation to negotiations following the report of the Main committee of inquiry into the pay and conditions of school teachers in Scotland.

Ferry Transport (Privatisation)

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress is being made on the privatisation of ferry transport in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend is presently considering the report of the economic consultants, Pieda who were commissioned to advise him on the future arrangements for Caledonian MacBrayne.

Staffed Beds (Glasgow)

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many patients were refused hospitalisation in the Greater Glasgow area due to the shortage of available staffed beds, for each year since 1985.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Patients who require emergency treatment are admitted to hospital immediately if their condition requires this. Patients who require non-emergency elective treatment are admitted according to the severity of their condition and other factors. On occasion, hospitalisation may be deferred if an emergency case requires higher priority. Industrial action in protest at boards' plans for competitive tendering has resulted in 3,491 operations being cancelled this year.

Social Work Assessed Need

Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the social work assessed need per head of population for Strathclyde, Borders, Lothian and Highland regions, expressed in pounds sterling.

Mr. Lang: The figures requested are set out in the table.

Social work assessed need (per head)

	1989-90 £
Borders	79
Highland	72
Lothian	84
Strathclyde	96

NATIONAL FINANCE

Charitable Donations

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the cost to the Treasury of introducing relief for charitable donations through payroll deduction schemes in 1986-87, 1987-88 and for the first six months of 1988-89; and how much of the cost was attributable to such donations to professional arts organisations with charitable status.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Relief for charitable donations through payroll deduction schemes came into operation in April 1987. The estimated cost of the relief in 1987-88 was about £300,000. Information for 1988-89 is not yet available and no information is available on how much of the donations went to professional arts organisations.

Mortgages

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the amount of mortgage interest relief claimed in respect of mortgages which have been raised for purposes other than the buying of a home.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave him on 29 July at column 733. Following the abolition of relief on home improvement loans taken out from 6 April 1988, the Inland Revenue will be concentrating on checking on home purchase loans.

Disaggregation of Income

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) further to his written reply of 19 October concerning higher-rate taxpayers, whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for a married couple without wife's earnings his estimate of the number of wives in each income band with investment income and the average amount of such income together with his estimate of the cost, in terms of (i) higher-rate and (ii) basic rate tax in 1988-89 of disaggregating the wife's income from that of her husband for tax purposes;

(2) further to his written reply of 19 October concerning higher-rate taxpayers, whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for married couples (a) with wife's earnings and (b) with no earnings election, his estimate of the number of wives in each income band with investment income and the average amount of such income together with his estimate of the cost in terms of (i) higher-rate and (ii) basic rate tax, of disaggregating the wife's income from that of her husband for tax purposes;

(3) if, further to his written reply of 19 October concerning higher-rate taxpayers with a wife's earnings election, he will provide for each income band figures showing the numbers and average amount of investment income held by each spouse together with the cost to the Revenue in 1988-89 of disaggregating the wife's investment income from that of her husband for charging higher-rate tax; and if he will distinguish the cases where liability for higher-rate tax falls only on (i) the husband, (ii) the wife and (iii) both;

(4) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the numbers of earning and non-earning married women with investment income by range of total income of the married couple in cases where neither spouse is paying higher rate tax.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Available estimates are in the tables. All estimates are provisional and subject to a wide margin of error because they are based on a projection of the 1985-86 survey of personal incomes and the coverage of investment income in the survey is incomplete. In some cases, investment income on which basic rate liability is satisfied by deduction at source is not reported. No reliable estimates can be given for wives where the total income of the married couple is less than £5,000. Further information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Pensions

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the state pension for wives and the pension of a widow based on an occupational pension is treated as earned income for income tax purposes; and if he will publish in the Official Report his estimate of the number of earning and non-earning wives with income in 1988-89 by range of wife's total income up to the level of the personal allowance and thereafter by steps of £1,000 from £3,000 to £10,000 and subsequent steps to £50,000.

Mr. Norman Lamont: National insurance retirement pensions for wives and occupational pensions are both treated as earned income for tax purposes. Available estimates are in the tables. They are based on a projection of the 1985-86 survey of personal incomes and are therefore provisional.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the revenue yield at current income and tax rates from withdrawing tax relief on the employee's actual and notional pension contributions for tax purposes; and if he will provide a comparable figure for the self-employed, including partnerships, and so on.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 3 November 1988]: The available information was given in my reply to the hon. Member on 29 July 1988 at column 494.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the annual pension contribution required by an employer and an employee, respectively, as a percentage of earnings to provide a pension equal to the maximum allowed under Inland Revenue rules in the event of all tax privileges being withdrawn; and if he will state the revenue yield from the withdrawal together with the revenue loss from exempting such pensions from tax on the basis that the amount of the pension is not excluded from taxable income in estimating liability to higher rate tax.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 3 November 1988]: I regret that estimates cannot be made on the basis of the information provided.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report his estimate of the proportion of single persons and married couples with a state pension who also have an occupational pension together with a table showing by income range the number in each case of those of less than pensionable age who made pension contributions under the national insurance scheme towards an occupational pension.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 3 November 1988]: I regret that this information is not available.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of (a) actual and (b) notional pension contributions made by employers for themselves and their employees in the current financial year together with his estimate of the direct revenue yield in each case from withdrawing relief for such contributions as a business expense; and if he will add his best estimate of the United Kingdom profits after tax out of which such payments would be made.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 3 November 1988]: The available information is as follows:

Estimated value for 1988-89 of employers' pension contributions to occupational pension funds

	£ billion
Funded schemes	7
Notionally funded schemes	2

If taxable profits were increased by the withdrawal of this relief and there were no behavioural effects the Revenue yield would increase by about £2 billion. The latest available figure of profits and tax are published in tables 5.1 and 6.2 of the national income Blue Book.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report tables showing by income band for single persons and one-earner and two-earner married couples the direct gain to the Revenue from, respectively, (a) abolishing the relief for the employees' pension contributions and (b) including as part of income the employer's pension contributions.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 3 November 1988]: I regret that the information is not available.

Income Tax

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing by range of total income the estimated number of one-earner and two-earner married tax units above and below pensionable age paying tax and their income tax liability in the current financial year on the basis of a transferable married allowance of £5,000 and a band of £3,000 at 15 per cent. followed by bands of £2,000 at 25 per cent., £7,500 at 35 per cent., £8,500 at 40 per cent., two bands of £9,000 at 45 and 50 per cent. and a band of £20,000 at 55 to a maximum rate of 60 per cent. on income in excess of £64,000, assuming that, apart from all other income tax allowances and reliefs are abolished;

(2) whether he will bring up to date at 1988-89 incomes the figures given in his reply dated 25 July 1986, Official Report, column 670, for tax liabilities under an alternative regime for taxation of incomes, but increasing the nil-rate band for single persons to £2,500 and reducing that for married couples to £2,000, increasing the exempt allowance for marrieds to £3,000, reducing the 15 per cent. band for singles from £2,000 to £1,500, reducing the standard rate from 28 to 25 per cent. and the band to £7,250 for singles and £9,500 for married couples, respectively, increasing the rate of claw-back under (c) to 50 per cent. of total income above £5,000 and £10,000 for singles and marrieds, respectively, instead of 25 per cent. above £6,000 and £8,000, and excluding from the claw-back under (d) the relief for superannuation contributions and donations to charities.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I regret that the information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Domestic Credit

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will include in the Official Report a table showing the expansion of domestic credit in cash terms and as a percentage of M3 at the beginning of each period for each of the years 1980 to 1987 and for each quarter since the beginning of 1986; and if he will specify in each case the contribution made by the overseas sector.

Mr. Lilley: An article in the June 1983 Bank of England Quarterly Bulletin explained why domestic credit expansion was no longer an appropriate aggregate in changing monetary circumstances and why it would no longer be published. Prior to that time, data was established both in the Bank of England Quarterly Bulletin and in Financial Statistics.

Unearned Income

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the revenue yield in the current financial year of a tax surcharge equal to 10 per cent. of unearned income.

Mr. Norman Lamont: It is estimated that the direct revenue yield in a full year at 1988-89 levels of income of a 10 per cent. surcharge on investment income is £1·6 billion. The estimate takes no account of any behavioural changes that would follow the introduction of the surcharge. The estimate is based on a projection of the 1985-86 survey of personal incomes and is therefore provisional.

Double Taxation

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the direct (a) gain and (b) loss to the Revenue from ending all double taxation agreements for (i) profits and (ii) personal income.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The estimates requested could only be made at disproportionate cost.

Investment Income

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his estimates of the amount of tax paid on investment income are derived from the tax returns showing the investment income of husbands and wives separately.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Estimates of investment income are derived from a projection of the latest available survey of personal incomes. The information recorded in the survey uses details provided on tax returns where these are available. The tax return provides for details of the investment income of husbands and wives to be recorded separately. Where no up-to-date tax return is available for taxpayers covered by the survey, statistical estimates of investment income are made using other sources of data, such as the family expenditure survey.

Mortgage Interest Tax Relief

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report the number of cases concerning fraudulent claims for mortgage interest relief which have been prosecuted in each of the past three years and the current year to date, the amount of tax recovered, and the penalties exacted.

Mr. Norman Lamont: There were three criminal prosecutions by the police in 1987-88. There have been another three so far this year. Further prosecutions are pending. Tax and penalties are recovered by civil proceedings or settlements, but figures are not available for mortgage fraud investigations separate from other Inland Revenue investigations.

Taxation

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, further to his written reply dated 19 October concerning the rate of income tax in Germany, why he has converted the deutschmark figures into sterling at purchasing power parities; and if he will list in the Official Report the divisions of the United Kingdom retail prices index shown in table 18.2 of the monthly digest in cases where he has evidence that the level of German prices at the current rate of exchange is 30 per cent. higher than the level of United Kingdom prices.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Because purchasing power parities offer a more reliable guide than exchange rates in international comparisons of this sort. I regret that it is not possible to provide the information requested in the second part of the question.

Personal Taxation Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing by range of total income for single persons above and below pensionable age the number of tax units paying tax and their income tax liability on the basis of single allowance of £2,500 followed by tax bands of £1,500 at 15 per cent., £1,000 at 25 per cent., £6,250 at 35 per cent., three bands of £5,000 at 40, 45 and 50 per cent. and one band of £10,000 to a maximum of 60 per cent. at £36,250, assuming that all their allowances and reliefs are abolished apart from superannuation contributions and donations to charities.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I regret that the information could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Corporation Tax

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will bring up to date the figures for receipts of corporation tax given in his written reply dated 6 April 1987, Official Report, column 83, together with a forecast in each case for (a) receipts in 1988-89 and (b) the liability to tax arising out of profits earned in 1988; and if he will include an estimate of the revenue yield under (a) and (b) from an increase in the rate to 50 per cent.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The latest available estimates are as follows:

Receipts of Corporation Tax (CT)

£ million

	All companies and financial institutions[1]		North Sea
	Total CT	Of which ACT	CT	of which satisfied by setting off ACT[2]
1985-86	10,708	3,794	2,911	1,080
1986-87	13,495	4,455	2,676	1,130
1987-88	15,734	4,939	1,355	730
[3]1988-89	19,700	5,800	1,400	800

[1] Including North sea companies.
[2] Liability to corporation tax arising in respect of North sea production may be satisfied by setting off ACT arising on dividends paid in previous periods in respect of both onshore and offshore activities. Dividends and ACT associated with North sea activities alone cannot be identified.
[3] Forecast.

Reliable estimates of liability to tax in 1988 are not yet available. Estimates of the revenue effect of changes in the main corporation tax rate for all companies and financial institutions are provided each year in table 4.5 of the autumn statement.

Allowances and Reliefs

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, further to his reply dated 19 October concerning the direct revenue yield from abolishing allowances and reliefs, Official Report, column 933-34, he will revise the figures to include the abolition of the wife's earned income allowance and to exclude the employee's superannuation contributions and donations to charities.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The reply to which the hon. Member refers gave estimates of the cost of increasing personal allowances by £100. I cannot therefore provide the information requested.

Chancellor of the Exchequer (Press Briefing)

Sir Barney Hayhoe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer at what precise time he first became aware of reports in the Sunday press or on radio or television about his press or lobby briefing on Friday 4 November; and when he or his officials first rebutted what had been reported.

Mr. Lawson: On Sunday.

Customs and Excise

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the employment ratio between Her Majesty's Customs and Excise employees employed in preventive work and Her Majesty's Customs and Excise employees working in freight and passenger clearance duties.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 3 November 1988]: In 1988-89 Customs and Excise planned deployments give a ratio of 1·07:1 between staff time on preventative work (including passenger control) and staff time on import freight clearance duties.

Wife's Earnings Election

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, further to his reply dated 19 October, Official Report, columns 925-26, the number of tax units includes as one unit both husband and wife where a wife's earnings election is in operation.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 4 November 1988]: Yes.

VAT (Second-hand Businesses)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will list those commodities in which second-hand businesses may deal which (a) are zero-rated for value added tax purposes, (b) are exempt from value added tax, and (c) result in value added tax being paid on profits made from transactions rather than on total sale prices;

(2) if he will list those commodities in which second-hand businesses may deal on which value added tax is payable in full and on the sale price of the commodity rather than the profit made by its transaction;

(3) whether he will make a statement about the variety of value added tax positions facing second-hand businesses.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 7 November 1988]: European Community VAT rules, to which the United Kingdom adheres, require tax to be charged on the full selling price of supplies of goods and services unless otherwise relieved. There is no general relief for second-hand goods. However, there are limited special schemes for certain second-hand goods under which tax is charged only on the seller's margin i.e. the difference between the buying and selling price. The commodities for which special schemes exist are:

second-hand cars;
works of art, antiques and collectors' pieces;
second-hand motor cycles;
second-hand caravans and motor caravans;
second-hand boats and outboard motors;
second-hand aircraft;
second-hand electronic organs;
second-hand firearms;
second-hand horses and ponies.

Commodities which are zero-rated or exempt when new remain so when sold second-hand.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the European Commission is considering making any proposal for a general relief from value added tax for second-hand goods; and what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards such a proposal.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 7 November 1988]: In November 1987, the European Commission withdrew its proposal for a seventh VAT directive, which would have established a uniform system for second-hand goods. The Commission is expected to make a new proposal for a seventh directive; a United Kingdom position cannot be established until the details of any new proposal become known.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is taking any steps to promote a general relief from value added tax for second-hand goods throughout the European Community.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 7 November 1988]: No.

EC (Funding)

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the special payment made by Her Majesty's Government to the European Economic Community in respect of the budget overspend in 1987 and 1988 is incorporated in the estimates of net European Economic Community payments outlined in the paper issued in his Autumn Statement; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke [holding answer 8 November 1988]: I assume that my hon. Friend is referring to the intergovernmental agreement (IGA) to provide supplementary finance for the 1988 budget. The autumn statement projection of our net payments to Community institutions in 1988-89 includes our contributions to the IGA.

WALES

Autism

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many children and adults have been recorded as autistic by each local education authority; what special provision is made for them; and what contribution is made by his Department and by charitable bodies.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: This information is not available. School pupils in Wales have not been classified in accordance with categories of handicap since 1983 and further education students have never been so classified. LEAs must make provision for all school children with special educational needs in accordance with the Education Act 1981. This provision may include placement in one of the schools in the maintained sector in Wales which caters specifically for autistic children or, if appropriate, in one of the independent schools in England which are run by the National Autistic Society or local autistic societies. In securing adequate facilities for further education in their areas LEAs must have regard to the requirements of persons with learning difficulties.

Access Officers

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many district councils in Wales have officially designated access officers to deal with matters relating to access for disabled people.

Mr. Grist: This information is not held centrally.

Advance Factories

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much of the Welsh Office expenditure for 1989-90 has been earmarked for the construction of advance factories by the Welsh Development Agency; what resources were allocated for such purposes in 1988-89; and what was the actual expenditure under this heading for 1987-88.

Mr. Peter Walker: The information is as follows:

Gross spending on advance factories

£ million

1987-88	1988-89 budget
12·7	23·9

Consideration is still being given to the detailed allocation of Welsh Development Agency resources for 1989-90.

School Leavers

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will state (a) for the Dwyfor area and (b) for the Caernarfon area, how many of the 1988 school leavers were (i) in work, (ii) on YTS, and (iii) unemployed awaiting a date for the commencement of training schemes or full-time education, for the most recent available date.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The destinations of 1988 school leavers known to the Gwynedd careers service are as follows:

	Caernarfon	Dwyfor
Employment	42	14
YTS	176	125
Unemployed (including those awaiting a YTS start date)	41	18

These are the latest figures available as at 13 October 1988. The careers service in Gwynedd attempts to contact every school leaver, but the results of this survey will not be known until the new year.

Sea Fishing

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales who is responsible for the nomination of members of the north-western and north Wales sea fisheries committee; how many members are appointed by him, and how many by other Government Departments; and what steps he has taken to ensure that the committee as currently formulated is sufficiently responsive to the feelings and needs of those involved in sea fishing in Wales.

Mr. Peter Walker: Appointments to the north western and north Wales sea fisheries committee are made as follows:

Appointing body	Number of appointments
Dyfed County Council	2
Gwynedd County Council	2
Clwyd County Council	2
Cheshire County Council	3
Cumbria County Council	2
Lancashire County Council	3
Sefton Metropolitan Borough Council	2
Wirral Metropolitan Borough Council	2
Welsh Water Authority	1
North West Water Authority	1

In addition, 16 members are appointed jointly by myself and my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. In making these appointments my right hon. Friend and I make every effort to ensure that members are acquainted with the needs and opinions of fishing interests in the district.

Tourism

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what responsibilities he has for tourism in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Our responsibilities and major objectives are intended to encourage tourism as part of our wider aim to stimulate economic activity in Wales. Tourism is a major provider of jobs and can make a significant contribution to maintaining the level of economic activity in areas traditionally dependent on tourism and broadening the economic base of less-developed areas. The major direct instrument of Government policy is the Wales tourist board acting in conjunction with other statutory bodies through the various instruments of Government policy. We are particularly concerned to ensure the promotion of a healthy private sector tourist industry on which the future prosperity of many parts of Wales depends.

School Meals

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing how much expenditure on school meals has changed in cash and real terms each year between 1979 and the latest date available for Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Expenditure on school meals and milk for the period requested is given in the table:

School Meals and Milk: Net Current Expenditure

Year	Out-turn (£000)	1987-88 prices (£000)
1979-80	26,066	45,766
1980-81	23,455	34,769
1981-82	24,303	32,796
1982-83	27,008	34,016
1983-84	27,772	33,455
1984-85	29,745	34,106
1985-86	28,535	31,043
1986-87	29,601	31,163

Cardiff Bay Barrage

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Bridgend of 19 July, Official Report, column 566, when the environmental impact assessment report on the Cardiff bay barrage proposal will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Peter Walker: I understand that the environmental impact assessment is still being undertaken. A copy of the report will be placed in the Library by the promoters of the Cardiff Bay Barrage Bill as soon as it becomes available.

Psychiatric Nurses

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many community psychiatric nurses are employed per 100,000 population in each health authority.

Mr. Grist: It is not practicable at the moment to distinguish separately community psychiatric nurses (mental illness) at the district health authority level. However the figure for all Wales is 6·3 nurses (whole-time equivalents) per 100,000 population.

District health authorities are, in conjunction with my officials, currently improving coding procedures to enable information on these nurses to be obtained in future.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Personal Incomes

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the percentage of total personal income taken by (a) direct taxes on households and (b) employees' social security contributions in the current financial year; and if he will provide corresponding figures for 1973.

Mr. Major: For 1973 direct taxes paid by the personal sector (both taxes on income and taxes on capital) were equivalent to 12·7 per cent. of personal sector income. Employees' social security contributions were 2·7 per cent. It is not the practice to publish forecasts of these for the current financial year.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state the number of employees for each nationalised industry, the Civil Service, local government, the Post Office and all other separate concerns in the public sector for 1979, 1984 and 1988.

Mr. Major: The information is as follows:

£2 Coin

Mr. Wheeler: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he proposes to issue the new £2 coin; of what metals the proof versions will be made and how many of each; how many reverse designs there will be; what these will depict; and to what extent ordinary currency pieces will be available, and where.

Mr. Lawson: As I announced to the House on 13 January 1988, a special £2 coin will be issued in 1989 to commemorate the tercentenary of the Bill of Rights. I am now able to announce that Her Majesty has been graciously pleased to approve my recommendation to issue, in addition, a £2 coin to commemorate the tercentenary of the Scottish claim of right. The design on the obverse of both coins will feature the approved portrait of Her Majesty prepared by Mr. Raphael Maklouf. Details of the reverse designs will not be released until the coins are issued on 14 February 1989. Proof versions will be struck in silver and base metal. Coins struck in nickel brass will be available at face value at post offices and banks throughout the United Kingdom. It has not yet been decided how many coins will be minted. Although the coins are primarily for collectors, all will be legal tender.

Planning Regions (Expenditure)

Ms. Quin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the estimated public expenditure in each standard planning region of the United Kingdom arising from the expenditure plans announced in the autumn statement.

Mr. Major: Apart from expenditure that is the responsibility of the territorial departments, most public expenditure is planned on a national basis and it is not possible separately to identify expenditure in particular regions.

Chancellor of the Exchequer (Press Briefing)

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, pursuant to his replies of 7 November, he will place in the Library a copy of the record of his briefing to members of the press on 4 November on the targeting of state pensions.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place in the Library a summary of his remarks to the press of Friday 4 November concerning benefits for pensioners.

Mr. Lawson: I regret that no tape recording or transcript of the briefing exists. I have nothing to add to the information I gave the House on 7 November.

Commemorative Coins

Dr. Twinn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if Her Majesty's Government have plans to issue any new commemorative coins.

Mr. Lawson: Her Majesty the Queen has been graciously pleased to approve my recommendation that gold coins be issued in 1989 to commemorate the 500th anniversary of the introduction of the gold sovereign. Four coins will be issued: half-sovereign; sovereign; double sovereign and £5 piece. The coins will be struck for sale to collectors only. Details of the designs will be announced when the coins are issued on 31 January, 1989.

Agencies (Accounting Officers)

Mr. Robert Sheldon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what conclusions the Government have reached on the appointment of accounting officers for agencies established under the Next Steps initiative.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Public Accounts Committee has informed the Treasury that it supports the recommendation of the Treasury and Civil Service Committee that the chief executive of an agency should be its accounting officer, with the proviso that if the agency's expenditure were only part of a Vote, or spread over several Votes, the chief executive should be formally appointed an accounting officer by the departmental accounting officer; and that in these circumstances the PAC would probably wish to take evidence from both accounting officers.

The Government accept the view of the Public Accounts Committee. If, therefore, an agency has its own Vote, or is a separate Department, the Treasury will appoint the chief executive as accounting officer. Where an agency does not have its own Vote and remains part of a Government Department financed from one or more Vote subheads, the departmental accounting officer will designate the chief executive as agency accounting officer, and send him a letter of appointment defining his duties as agency accounting officer in the light of the powers and responsibilities assigned to him in the agency framework document.

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the reason for the real decline in net domestic fixed capital formation in manufacturing industry between 1979 and 1987; what has been the effect on output and employment of the decline in the real fixed capital of manufacturing industry between 1979 and 1987; and what was the corresponding figure for 1974 to 1979.

Mr. Major [holding answer 3 November 1988]: Movements in net domestic fixed capital formation, output, and employment in manufacturing industry reflect many complex factors. But manufacturing investment is likely to grow by 18 per cent. in 1988, and output is expected to rise by 7 per cent.

EC (Balance of Trade)

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the United Kingdom's surplus/deficit in its trade in manufactured goods with the rest of the EEC, in volume terms, in each of the financial years from 1981 to the latest available year; and what is Her Majesty's Government's forecast for the current financial year.

Mr. Lawson [holding answer 8 November 1988]: The figures requested are available only in value terms and are presented in the table. Forecasts of trade with the EEC are not prepared.

The United Kingdom's balance of trade in manufactured goods with the rest of the European Community

	£ million (BOP basis not seasonally adjusted)
1981-82	−3,468
1982-83	−5,084

1984-85	−8,200
1985-86	−9,210
1986-87	−9,765
1987-88	−11,030

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the United Kingdom's (i) balance of payments and (ii) balance of trade surplus/deficit in volume terms with the rest of the EEC in each of the financial years from 1981 to the latest available year; and what is Her Majesty's Government's forecast surplus/deficit for the current financial year.

Mr. Lawson [holding answer 8 November 1988]: The United Kingdom's current account balance with the rest of the EEC is only available in value terms and on a calendar year basis. The visible trade balance with the rest of the EEC is available on a financial year basis but again only in value terms. These figures are presented in the table. Forecasts of trade with the EEC are not prepared.

Gross Domestic Product Deflator

Dr. Bray: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by what percentage the gross domestic product deflator assumed for the financial year 1989-90 in table 1 of his autumn statement on public expenditure plans exceeds the gross domestic product deflator assumed for 1989-90 in his autumn statement in 1987.

Mr. Major [holding answer 9 November 1988]: In the 1988 autumn statement, the GDP deflator is assumed to rise by 5 per cent. in 1989-90. The corresponding assumption in the 1987 autumn statement was 3½ per cent.

Science and Technology

Dr. Bray: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much of the difference between the increase he announced in the autumn statement of £120 million in the provision for spending by the Department of Education and Science on science and technology in 1989-90, and the increase of £95 million announced by the Secretary of State for Education and Science in his science budget, is due to the effect of higher prices on the notional allocation to research and development of University Grants Committee expenditure.

Mr. Major [holding answer 9 November 1988]: The difference of £25 million between the two figures includes £13 million of the additional funding provided for universities in 1989-90, and spending of £12 million by the Institute of Plant Science Research following the privatisation of part of the Plant Breeding Institute. It will be for the Universities Funding Council to determine the distribution of funds to the universities, and for the universities to use the cash they receive as effectively as possible. Overall, the total cash available to the Universities Funding Council for recurrent spending in 1989-90 will be £1,672 million, more than 5 per cent. higher than the corresponding figure for 1988-89.

Manufacturing (Operating Surplus)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer why the net operating surplus in manufacturing fell in 1980 and 1981; whether he will publish in the Official Report tables showing the estimated gross and net operating surpluses as a percentage of, respectively, gross and net added value in (a) manufacturing and (b) industry plus transport and communication for 1987 and his tentative forecast for 1988 on the same basis as in tables 7.1 to 7.4 of the "Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, Historical Statistics 1960-1986"; and to what extent the improvement in the net operating surplus in manufacturing is due to an increase in the return on overseas investment.

Mr. Major: Movements in the net operating surplus in manufacturing depend on a number of complex factors. But in 1987 the net rate of return on capital employed was the highest for almost 20 years. And as paragraph 33 of the Industry Act forecast published with my right hon. Friend's recent autumn statement revealed, net rates of return are expected to improve further in 1988. The national income and expenditure Blue Book 1988 provides further data on the manufacturing industry.

THE ARTS

"Spycatcher"

Sir Hal Miller: To ask the Minister for Arts what advice he has given to public library authorities regarding the stocking of "Spycatcher", following the recent House of Lords judgment.

Mr. Luce: I informed the House on 21 October 1987 that I had suggested that public library authorities should await the outcome of prospective court proceedings. In the light of the recent House of Lords judgment, I no longer wish to advise public libraries against stocking "Spycatcher". It is for them to make up their own minds.

CIVIL SERVICE

Management Improvement

Mr. Higgins: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service when the Government intends to reply to the report of the Treasury and Civil Service Committee's inquiry into the Next Steps initiative for improving Civil Service management.

Mr. Luce: The Government have today laid before the House a Command paper (Cm. 524) giving their response. Copies of the paper, "Civil Service Management Reform: The Next Steps", are available from the Vote Office.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Departmental Publicity

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list in the Official Report the total expenditure by his Department on all forms of press and public relations, information and publicity including the production and distribution of pamphlets and video material, and so on, for each financial year from 1979 to date, and the planned allocation for the next three financial years broken down by appropriate category.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The information available, excluding staffing and associated costs, is as follows:

Expenditure on publicity, information publications and advertising

1979-80	130
1980-81	96
1981-82	178

1984-85	332
1985-86	860
1986-87	1,340
1987-88	1,826
1988-89	[1]2,900

[1] Estimated outturn.

These figures include expenditure by the Department and, in the years before 1984-85, the Central Office of Information on publicity, information publications and advertising; the arrangements for payment for COI work were changed in 1984-85. Decisions on allocations for the next three financial years have not yet been reached.

School Meals

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a table showing the average price of a school meal in (a) primary and (b) secondary schools for each year since 1979 to 1988 in 1988 prices in England.

Mr. Butcher: The available information is given in the table:

Average price for a fixed charge meal[1]

[1] The charges for September 1979 and February 1980 applied to all paid meals in maintained schools. Under Section 22 of the Education Act 1980 LEAs were given the power to set their own charges for meals. The figures in the table are national averages based on the number of paid meals provided by each authority.
[2] The figures for the earlier years hve been converted into 1987-88 real terms using the Gross Domestic Products (Market Prices) Deflator.

[4] February.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a table showing how much expenditure on school meals has changed in cash and real terms in each year between 1979 and the latest date available for England.

Mr. Butcher: The information requested is given in the table:

[2] The expenditure is net of income from such sources as parents and EC subsidies on milk products.

AIDS

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if, following his statement on 1 November, Official Report, columns 605-10, the Government will now increase expenditure on the AIDS research programmes conducted by the Medical Research Council.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I greatly welcome the enthusiasm and sense of urgency with which the council and the scientific community have embarked on the directed and strategic programmes of AIDS research. In view of the particular importance that the Government attach to the directed programme, I am making available £8 million in 1990-91 and £8·5 million in 1991-92 for its continuation. This will enable the United Kingdom to continue to play its part in responding to the AIDS emergency by contributing significantly to worldwide research into vaccines against AIDS and anti-viral drugs for those infected. I shall consider further the case for increase in the council's strategic programme on the basis of advice from the advisory board for the research councils later this year.

PRIME MINISTER

Ethical Problems

Q109. Sir David Price: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make it her policy to support the establishment of a permanent Select Committee of this House to study ethical problems arising out of new developments in the practice of science, technology and medicine and to make recommendations.

The Prime Minister: The consideration of such ethical problems is already within the terms of reference of the appropriate departmental Select Committees. Any changes in the existing Select Committee structure would be a matter for the House.

Newport, Gwent

Q122. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister if she plans to make an official visit to the Bettws area of Newport, Gwent.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Environmental Research

Q170. Dr. Bray: To ask the Prime Minister which Minister is responsible for research into the global environment.

The Prime Minister: The Secretary of State for Education and Science has primary responsibility for basic and long-term strategic research into the global environment supported from public funds, through his responsibility for the science base in the research council and universities. Other Ministers fund research into the global environment as may be necessary for their statutory and policy responsibilities. Near market research is the responsibility of industry.

Health and Social Security Records Office

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the allocation of ministerial responsibility for the Department of Health and Social Security records office following the departmental reorganisation of health and social security.

The Prime Minister: Ministerial responsibility for the records office in Nelson, Lancashire, rests with the Secretary of State for Health for those records concerned with health and personal social services matters; and with the Secretary of State for Social Security for those records concerned with social security matters.

Mergers and Takeovers

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister whether the Government will provide a fiscal disincentive as a first test of the usefulness of all mergers and takeovers of quoted companies, including the takeover of companies overseas, including increasing capital duty and extending it to the issue of shares in the acquiring company.

The Prime Minister: No.

Engagements

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 November.

Mr. Cran: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 November.

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 November.

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 November.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 November.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Broadcasting

32. Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from the Northern Ireland broadcasting authorities on the subject of the recent restrictions on their ability to provide accurate coverage of current affairs.

Mr. Renton: There are no Northern Ireland broadcasting authorities, as such. The BBC and the IBA have undertaken to implement the directions issued, although they have requested that the need for them should be kept under close review. The directions do not prevent the broadcasters from providing accurate coverage of current affairs.

33. Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the difficulties created for the broadcasting authorities in Northern Ireland by the recent restrictions imposed on them.

Mr. Renton: I do not believe that substantial difficulties have been created. The directions do not restrict the secondhand reporting of events. They restrict only the direct access of members of the organisations concerned and their supporters to the airwaves. Their activities and the words they utter can still be reported just as they are in the written press.

Attachment of Earnings

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of attachment of earnings orders made each year since the commencement of the scheme; and if he will list the number of orders currently in effect.

Mr. John Patten: Information about orders made under the provisions of the Attachment of Earnings Act 1971 is not collated centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Details of orders made under the Domestic Proceedings and Magistrates' Courts Act 1978 at magistrates courts are published in Home Office statistical bulletins, which are available in the Library. The latest relevant bulletin is No. 20/88.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing, by standard planning region, for 1980-81 to 1986-87, central Government expenditure by his Department, expressed in (a) cash terms, (b) per capita and (c) capital and current, identifying expenditure on the prison service separately by standard planning regions for the above years, on a capital and current basis, in cash and per capita terms.

Mr. Hurd: Home Office central Government expenditure for 1980-81 to 1986-87 is set out in the table.

Expenditure is shown in cash terms and split between capital and current expenditure. An analysis by standard planning region is not available.

Prison Sentences

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what evidence he has that an increase in the average length of prison sentences is effective in reducing the total volume of crime.

Mr. John Patten: The main purpose of a prison sentence is to punish the offender. The courts and prisons can make only a limited contribution to reducing crime. But long sentences for serious crimes restrict the opportunities for further offending by those who receive them, and may deter other potential offenders.

Strangeways Prison

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the last 50 receptions under sentence to Strangeways prison, giving in each case the length of sentence, the main offence charged, and in the case of property offences, the value of the property stolen or the damage caused.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: On 1 November, the latest date for which this information is available, details of the 50 most recent receptions of sentenced inmates into Strangeways prison were as follows:

made of the courts that sentenced the inmates. Such information could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Indictable Offences (Northamptonshire)

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state, for the last five years, in Northamptonshire (a) the number of indictable offences known to have been committed by offenders aged under 17 years, and 17 to 21 years, and the number per 100,000 persons in those age groups, (b) the number and percentage of such offences dealt with by a police caution and (c) the number and percentage dealt with by non-custodial sentences.

Mr. Renton: The information available relates to offenders and can be found in the table: it can be derived from the supplementary volumes 3 and 4 of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales", copies of which are in the Library, or, for 1987, will be placed there shortly.

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the number of (a) males and (b) females convicted of not wearing a seat belt in England and Wales in each of the following age groups (i) aged 14 and under 17, (ii) aged 17 and under 21, (iii) aged 21 and under 24, (iv) aged 24 and under 30 and (v) aged 30 and over; and what is the percentage of the latter to the former in each month since 1983;

(3) if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the number of (a) males and (b) females convicted of not wearing a seat belt by police force area; and what percentage the latter is of the former since 1983.

Mr. John Patten: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

HM Prison, Risley

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent progress he has made in improving conditions at Her Majesty's prison, Risley.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: D wing has been completely redecorated and refurbished. C wing has been vacated for redecoration and refurbishment.

The new working arrangements under Fresh Start have improved staff continuity in the wings with benefit to staff-prisoner relationships and prisoner care. Daytime education classes have begun for adult male prisoners. The physical education programme has been extended. Prisoners' privileges have been extended to include use of personal walkman-type cassette recorders and the borrowing of cassettes from the prison library. A television has been provided on the ground floor of the male hospital providing additional associated recreation for the more disturbed patients. A prison visitor scheme has started. A project is in progress to provide courts with better information for making bail decisions.

The central guidance on suicide prevention has been fully implemented.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

New Businesses (Derbyshire)

Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many new businesses have been set up in Derbyshire since 1983.

Mr. Atkins: The latest available estimate provided by the Department of Employment is that between the end of 1983 and the end of 1986 there were about 7,400 new businesses first registered for VAT in Derbyshire. The increase in the total numbers of businesses registered over this period was 4 per cent.

Regional Breakfasts

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster which trade union leaders or representatives have been invited to the 1992 regional breakfasts.

Mr. Maude: The DTI's regional breakfast conferences aim to encourage local business people to take action to prepare for the single market. We would be pleased to invite any trade union representative who indicated an interest in attending.

Single European Market

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in what forum his Department intends to discuss the issues raised by the single European market with the trade union movement.

Mr. Maude: The single market was discussed at a recent meeting of the National Economic Development Council. Further discussions are planned.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how much money has been spent by his Department on information regarding employment issues in the context of his campaign relating to the single European market and 1992.

Mr. Maude: The DTI's "Europe-Open for Business" campaign aims to provide the most comprehensive information service on the single market available to business anywhere in the Community. Employment issues are covered in all the main campaign materials. It is not possible to identify the costs separately.

Barlow Clowes

Sir Anthony Grant: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what action has been and is being taken in relation to financial intermediaries who dealt with the Barlow Clowes companies.

Mr. Maude: The Securities and Investments Board, at the request of the Financial Intermediaries Managers and Brokers Regulatory Association, has initiated investigations under section 105 of the Financial Services Act 1986 into certain intermediaries. The board has also obtained orders in the High Court appointing the Official Receiver as provisional liquidator of the Investment and Pensions Advisory Service Ltd. (IPAS) and of the partnership of the same name. Both previously had been prohibited by FIMBRA from carrying on further business. FIMBRA is also making inquiries of members and applicants under its rules, and has restricted or prohibited certain members from carrying on further business.

The Secretary of State has statutory powers to seek information about financial intermediaries. My Department is in touch with the board and FIMBRA to see whether the exercise of those powers would be appropriate.

Sumire Clothes plc

Mr. Sedgemore: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he intends to publish the Department of Trade and Industry report into the ownership of shares at Sumire Clothes plc; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 9 November 1988]: Yes.

Investigations and Report

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how long the inspectors took to investigate the affairs of House of Fraser (Holdings) plc; what was the cost of the investigation; what is the length of the report; and when he intends to publish it.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 9 November 1988]: Mr. Philip Linnell Heslop QC and Mr. Hugh Graham Cazalet Aldous FCA were appointed on 9 April 1987 under the provisions of section 432 of the Companies Act 1985 to investigate and report on the affairs of House of Fraser Holdings plc. Mr. Heslop resigned his appointment on 13 May 1987 and on 15 May 1987 Mr. Henry Brooke QC was appointed to act with with Mr. Aldous. Mr. Brooke and Mr. Aldous sumbmitted their report of 750 pages to the Secretary of State on 23 July 1988. The investigation has cost £1,500,294.

It is the Secretary of State's intention to publish the inspectors' report as soon as circumstances permit, as was made clear in my Department's press release on 29 September.

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how long the inspectors took to investigate the affairs of Milbury plc and Westminster Property Group Ltd.; what was the cost of the investigation; and what action he proposes to take following the publication of their report and in the light of their conclusions.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 9 November 1988]: Mr. Hugh Bernard Harwood Carlisle QC and Mr. Michael Gillam Lickiss FCA were appointed on 27 August 1985 under the provisions of section 432(1) of the Companies Act 1985 to investigate and report on the affairs of Milbury plc. The same inspectors were subsequently appointed on 26 November 1985 under section 442 of the Companies Act 1985 to investigate and report on the membership of Westminster Property Group Limited. They submitted their report on 26 August 1987. The investigation cost £1,135,274.

Whether further action is appropriate and, if so, what form that should take are matters which are receiving attention.

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how long inspectors have now been investigating the affairs of Guinness plc; what has been the cost of the investigation to date; and when he now expects the inspectors to report.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 9 November 1988]: Mr. David Torrance Donaldson QC and Mr. Ian Glendinning Watt FCA were appointed on 28 November 1986 under the provisions of sections 432 and 442 of the Companies Act 1985 to investigate and report on the affairs and membership of Guinness plc. The investigation has cost £1,632,578 to date. The investigation continues and I am unable to say when the inspectors will submit their report to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how long the inspectors have now been investigating the affairs of Barlow Clowes Gilt Managers Ltd. and James Ferguson (Holdings) plc; what has been the cost of the investigations to date; when he expects the inspectors to report; and whether he will publish as an interim report the first affidavit of Walter Max Hoffman in the matter of Barlow Clowes Gilt Managers Ltd. and in the matter of the Insolvency Act 1986 which was filed in the Chancery Division of the High Court on 10 June.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 9 November 1988]: Mr. Lawrence David Ziman and Mr. Walter Max Hoffman FCA were appointed on 10 June 1988 under the provisions of section 432 of the Companies Act 1985 to investigate and report on the affairs of James Ferguson Holdings plc. On 4 July 1988 the same inspectors were appointed under the provisions of section 442 of the Companies Act 1985 to investigate and report on the membership of that company. Also on 4 July, they were appointed under section 432 to investigate and report on the affairs of Barlow Clowes Gilt Managers Limited.

Mr. Ziman and Mr. Hoffman had previously been authorised on 13 November 1987 to exercise the powers conferred by section 105 of the Financial Services Act 1986 for the purposes of investigating the affairs of Barlow Clowes Gilt Managers Limited.

The investigations under the Companies Act have cost £186,385 to date. The investigation under the Financial Services Act has cost £186,931. The investigations under the Companies Act continue and I am unable to say when the inspectors will submit their report to the Secretary of State.

There is no statutory provision enabling the Secretary of State to publish Mr. Hoffman's affidavit or more generally enabling publication of reports submitted following the exercise of the powers conferred by section 105 of the Financial Services Act.

TRANSPORT

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Leadbitter: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if any discussions are taking place on road and rail development requirements with the local authorities and other interested bodies in the northern region to meet the regional internal and external transport needs of the European single market and the completion of the Channel tunnel; what Government funding will be made available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: Substantial discussions are taking place on both road and rail requirements. A regional forum has been held in Newcastle-upon-Tyne involving the Department of Transport, local authorities and British Rail. Working groups are considering the requirements in detail.

The Government are contributing heavily to the provision of roads in the region. Rail developments are the responsibility of the British Railways Board. Government funding of international rail services is prohibited by section 42 of the Channel Tunnel Act.

Mr. Leadbitter: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his latest assessment of the increase in the volume of goods and passenger traffic on the completion of the Channel tunnel; and what steps are being taken to avoid congestion in the south-east and provide efficient transport to the regions.

Mr. Portillo: According to Eurotunnel's latest traffic projections, the annual volume of Channel tunnel traffic on opening will be 30·7 million passengers and 15·5 million gross tonnes of freight.

For road traffic, the main route through Kent will be the M20, and this is being completed and widened to provide a three-lane motorway from the M25 to the tunnel terminal. The A20 link into Dover and a number of other roads in Kent are also being improved to provide good access to the tunnel and the ports. Cross-Channel traffic from the regions will benefit from the new Dartford crossing and the widening of some sections of the M25. The M25 is under review by consultants and their report is expected early in the new year.

For rail traffic, the Government have already approved in principle investment by BR of some £600 million in new infrastructure and rolling stock for the core London/Paris/Brussels passenger service and freight services to all parts of the United Kingdom. The investment programme includes new high-speed passenger trains, an international passenger terminal at Waterloo, a frontier station at Kensington Olympia for passenger services beyond London, a new international freight yard at Willesden, a number of freight locomotives, and improvements to track and signalling.

Section 40 of the Channel Tunnel Act requires BR to prepare by the end of 1989 a plan for passenger and freight services to the regions, and BR is currently consulting regional interests to identify the opportunities.

British Rail produced in July a report on rail capacity between London and the tunnel which indicates that new route capacity will be needed at some time in the future, involving the construction of a new line between Folkestone and London and new terminal capacity in London. BR is currently consulting local authorities and other interested parties to determine a preferred route by early next year. BR has invited proposals for private sector participation in the construction, financing and ownership of a new rail link.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if, when he next meets the chairman of British Rail, he will discuss proposals for improving rail links between the north-west and the south-east for the movement of freight via the Channel tunnel.

Mr. Portillo: This would not be the appropriate time. British Rail is required by section 40 of the Channel Tunnel Act to publish a plan by the end of 1989 setting out their proposals for international passenger and freight services and any infrastructure developments needed to support those services. British Rail is currently discussing the preparation of this plan with interested parties in all regions of the United Kingdom, with a view to producing a draft plan next summer.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many kilometres of new motorway his Department currently intends to build to relieve pressure on the M1, the M6, the M25 and the M20 in preparation for the opening of the Channel tunnel.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Government announced in the White Paper "The Channel Fixed Link" (Cmnd. 9735) that the 23 km gap between Maidstone and Ashford on the M20 would be filled with dual three-lane motorway, and that the 10·8 km Maidstone bypass section would be widened from two lanes to three to ensure good access to the tunnel terminal. In general, the impact of the Channel tunnel is one of many factors taken into account in the design of motorway and trunk road schemes.

We intend to construct some 100 km of new and improved motorway on the M1, M6, M25 and M20. The extension of the M40 from Oxford to Birmingham will also relieve pressure on the M1. The privately funded Dartford-Thurrock crossing will relieve pressure on the M25.

The schemes in the programme are as follows:

Scheme	Km
M1
Junction 1 improvement	—
Climbing Lane junction 9	1·9
Widening between junctions 23A and 24 (as part of A42 Castle Donington N)	1·6
Junction 34 Meadowhall-Tinsley roundabout improvement (privately funded)	—
M6
Widening between junctions 20 and 21A	8·5
Widening between junctions 30 and 31	3·5
Improvements between junctions 31 and 32	6·9
A446(M) Birmingham northern relief road (M6 relief road)	40·2
M20
Maidstone-Ashford	23·0
Widening between junctions 5 and 8 (Maidstone bypass)	10·8
M25
Widening between junctions 11 and 13	9·3
Total	105·7

Motorways

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much his Department currently intends to spend in this financial year on relieving the burden on (a) the M1, (b) the M20, (c) the M6 and (d) the M25.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We expect to spend the following amounts this financial year:

	Scheme construction and preparation costs £ million	Maintenance (capital and current) £ million	Total £ million
M1	4·3	16·1	20·4
M20	3·2	0·7	3,9
M6	[1]5·2	13·5	18·7
M25	35·7	15·3	51·0
Total	48·4	45·6	94·0

[1]Includes £3·2 million preparation costs for the A446(M) Birmingham Northern relief road (M6 relief road).

Spending on the privately financed Dartford-Thurrock crossing will relieve pressure on the M25. Spending by the Department on the M40 Oxford to Birmingham extension will relieve pressure on the M1.

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on which sections of the M25 traffic flows are (a) below design capacity, (b) between 100 and 125 per cent. of design capacity, (c) between 125 and 150 per cent. of design capacity and (d) over 150 per cent. of design capacity; and what proposals exist for easing congestion.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The capacity of the M25 varies with the vehicle mix, road layout, time of day, time of year and driving conditions. Measures are in hand to improve conditions in the parts of the M25 most affected by congestion. Consultants are also currently undertaking a review of the whole motorway. This will identify existing and potential problem areas on the M25 and adjacent sections of radial raods and will suggest solutions. The results of the review are expected in the new year.

EC Assistance

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on his policy on the value of future transport infrastructure scheme to be put forward for European Commission support from the different regions of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Portillo: The availability of Community support for transport infrastructure is limited by the terms of the financial instruments involved. Within those limits the Department's objective is that the United Kingdom should benefit as much as possible from any support which may be available.

A1-M1 Link Road

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if the time scale for the start of work on the A1-M1 link road has been delayed; when work is now expected to begin; and what is the anticipated completion date.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Progress on the link road has been maintained. We plan to let the first contracts this financial year for works between Kettering and east of Thrapston.

With several sections still subject to outstanding statutory procedures we cannot give a firm forecast for completion of the whole of the link road. We shall complete it as soon as possible.

M62 (Nuclear Transport)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what nuclear fuel materials are currently transported across the Pennines via the M62.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No central records are kept of the routes used. All consignments are required to comply with the safety regulations produced by the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Road Safety (Westminster)

Mrs. Rosie Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if there are any further plans to introduce measures to increase road safety for pedestrians on the line of the initiative taken at the Westminster bridge, County hall, St. Thomas's hospital junction, by which traffic is stopped at a distance from pedestrian crossings.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The initiative for introducing such measures rests primarily with local highway authorities. The relevant regulations give them some discretion and, where necessary, they can seek approval to the use of non-prescribed signs for use with such facilities.

The departmental advice note TA 52/87 entitled "Design considerations for Pelican and Zebra Crossings" is available in the Library.

M20

Mr. Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he is now in a position to make a statement on letting the fixed contract for the construction of the M20 between Hollingbourne and Ashford.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We expect to let the first contract before the end of the year and the second in the spring.

A650

Sir Marcus Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to announce the next stage of the A650 Airedale route from Crossflatts to Cottingley Bar, Bingley.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We plan to publish draft orders under the Highways Act 1980 for this scheme in the new year.

Seat Belts (Children)

Sir Anthony Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to publish the regulations to be made pursuant to the Motor Vehicles (Wearing of Rear Seat Belts by Children) Act; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Taking account of the helpful comments we have already received we hope to publish draft regulations for consultation shortly.

No responsible parent would wait for the law before restraining their children. Seat belts save lives and reduce injury.

ENERGY

Piper Alpha

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow on Thursday 3 November, Official Report, column 713, he will (a) place in the Library a copy of the abandonment programme for Piper Alpha and (b) indicate when he will make a decision on the aforesaid programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Parkinson: I expect to reach a decision within the next fortnight. Occidental's proposals for the abandonment of the Piper Alpha installation contain commercially confidential information and it would not be appropriate for me to place them in the Library of the House. The proposals are that the remains of the platform be toppled outwards on to the sea bed by means of explosive charges, so as to leave a minimum of 75 m of clear water between the sea surface and any remains.

My officials are in close touch with the Department of Transport and the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland about the navigational safety, fishing and marine environmental implications. Any approval would be without prejudice to any subsequent use of my powers under section 6 of the Petroleum Act 1987, and would be subject to the condition that the co-venturers will, if subsequently required by me, move or remove from the sea bed, such debris as I may direct. It would be my intention to consult relevant interested parties including the fishermen and the Nature Conservancy Council before deciding what debris clear up might be appropriate.

Electricity Supply Industry (Privatisation)

Mr. Prescott: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the advisers who have been appointed to assist the Government, the South of Scotland Electricity Board and the North of Scotland Hydro Electric Board in the proposed privatisation of the electricity supply industry in Scotland and the amount of money that has been paid to each of these advisers in the last financial year and how much it is estimated will be paid to each of them in this financial year and in the next financial year.

Mr. Lang [pursuant to the reply 28 October 1988 c.424]: I have been asked to reply. The advisory team to the Government currently consists of Barclays de Zoete Wedd, British Linen bank, Coopers and Lybrand, McGrigor Donald, Merz and McLellan and the reporting accountants to the two boards, Deloitte Haskins and Sells and Peat Marwick McLintock.

Expenditure in 1987-88 was £615,648 and there is estimated provision in 1988-89 of £4 million. It is not usual practice to publish details of individual contracts. Advice received by the two boards is a matter for them.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Internal Market

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about arrangements for the collection of information relevant to preparations for the internal market in 1992 by his offices in European member states.

Mr. Waldegrave: Posts in European Community member states report regularly on matters concerning European Community business, including the single market programme. These arrangements work well.

Kurdish Refugees (Turkey)

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Turkish Government about conditions in Kurdish refugee camps.

Mr. Waldegrave: We are in regular contact with the Turkish Government about conditions in the camps. Today we donated £250,000 to the British Red Cross to be passed to the Turkish Red Crescent for its relief programme for Kurdish refugees. We congratulate the Turkish Government on their speedy reponse in providing shelter, medical care and foodstuffs for the Iraqi Kurdish refugees from Iraq.

Chemical Weapons (Iraq)

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Iraq about the use of chemical weapons against Kurds; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We have made clear to the Iraqi Government on a number of occasions, particularly following events at Halabja in March this year, our condemnation of Iraqi use of chemical weapons against the Kurds. Following compelling indications of further use in August, I told the Iraqi Minister of State for Foreign Affairs on 21 September that we regarded the use of chemical weapons as barbaric and that Iraq should accept a United Nations investigative mission. We regret that Iraq refused to admit a United Nations team. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster reiterated our concern at allegations of chemical weapons use to the Iraqi Government when he visited Baghdad on 4-8 November.

We have noted the Iraqi Foreign Minister's statement of 17 September pledging Iraq to abide by international law and agreements, including the 1925 Geneva protocol, banning chemical weapons. We support the convening of an international conference in Paris between 7-11 January to reaffirm support for the protocol.

Lebanon

Mr. Adley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with representatives of the Lebanese Government; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Since 23 September governmental authority in Lebanon has been disputed. We recognise states, not governments. While we are prepared to have contact with both sides, that does not imply that we accept the claims of either.

Albania

Mr. Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the latest situation regarding a settlement of the claim of the United Kingdom against Albania for the unlawful killing of 44 Royal Navy personnel in the Straits of Corfu in 1946.

Mr. Waldegrave: Albania has still not paid the compensation of £843,947 awarded to Britain by the International Court of Justice in 1949.

Iran

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Britain's relations with Iran.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. and learned Friend agreed with the Iranian Foreign Minister on 30 September in New York that full diplomatic representation would be restored in Tehran and London. Talks between Iranian and British officials on implementing this agreement have now been concluded. Relations between the two countries will be conducted in accordance with the Vienna conventions on diplomatic and consular relations, to which both countries are signatories. We hope that this agreement will form the basis for developing a more constructive and businesslike relationship with Iran in the future. A chargé will be in place in one month and other staff will follow. We will consider the raising of representational levels from charge to ambassador in due course.

North Korea

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consideration is being given to increasing contacts with North Korea in the light of recent developments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: In order to signal our desire to see a continuation of the improvement in North-South Korean relations, we are instructing our diplomatic missions abroad to relax the current ban on contacts with North Korean officials. This move takes account of the improved level of contact between the Republic of Korea and some East European countries and the People's Republic of China.

ENVIRONMENT

Council House Sales

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of their housing stock has been sold by each of the London boroughs since the right-to-buy provisions of the 1980 Act became law.

Mr. Trippier: A table giving information on sales of dwellings up to June 1988 as reported by each London borough and each other local authority in England has today been placed in the Library in response to an earlier question from my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle). The table also shows sales since April 1979 as a percentage of housing stock.

Council Rents

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the latest level of rent arrears on each of the London boroughs.

Mr. Trippier: The information requested is listed in the table:

Barnstaple

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has received the report of the public inquiry held in Barnstaple on 7 June relating to Barnstaple town centre redevelopment; and when he expects to announce his decision.

Mr. Chope: The inspector's report has been received. It is being considered by my right hon. Friend and he will announce his decision as soon as possible.

Water

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report the average equated water rate poundage for each water authority.

Mr. Moynihan: The information requested by the hon. Member is set out in the table. The Welsh water authority is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he intends to announce experimental water protection zones.

Mr. Moynihan: My right hon. Friend has no immediate plans to announce any experimental protection zones. However, various means of protecting water from pollution are currently under consideration.

"Living Options Lottery"

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to the findings of the survey, carried out for the Prince of Wales's advisory group on disability, entitled "Living Options Lottery"; what action he is taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The report has only just been received. We will consider it carefully.

Local Authorities (Statutory Duties)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the statutory obligations currently placed upon metropolitan district councils in England; and if he will describe in each case how councils are monitored to ensure their statutory obligations are being met satisfactorily.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Information in the form requested is not available. My reply to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) on 3 November 1988 at columns 735-36 listed Acts of Parliament since 1979 which had application to local government. The Department monitors the financial aspects of new legislative proposals which have implications for local authority expenditure. The independent auditor monitors local authority compliance with statutory obligations and powers in the raising and spending of money and local authorities' responsibility for securing value for money, in accordance with the code of local government audit practice approved by Parliament.

Ministerial Cars

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many of Her Majesty's Government's Ministers currently have use of a ministerial car and driver; how many such cars have been adapted to use lead-free petrol; what action is being taken to convert all ministerial cars; and what action is being taken to encourage all Government Departments to adapt their vehicle fleets to use lead-free petrol.

Mr. Chope: At present the Government car service provides 79 ministerial cars and drivers for use of Ministers. Of the vehicles involved, 25 are capable of running on lead-free petrol. The remaining vehicles, none of which can be coverted to run on lead-free petrol, will be replaced with vehicles capable of running on lead-free fuel, in line with our normal replacement policy.

The Crown Suppliers (a trading fund of the Property Services Agency) which supplies vehicles to various Government Departments has already implemented a policy of purchasing vehicles which can run on lead-free petrol, and a programme of converting other vehicles which can be adapted to run on lead-free petrol.

All Government Departments are being encouraged to adapt existing vehicles to lead-free running where this can be done, or to replace existing vehicles with others capable of running on lead-free fuel as replacements become due.

Rating Reform

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what additional funds he proposes to make available to Tameside metropolitan borough council to meet the administrative costs of poll tax collection.

Mr. Gummer: The costs of collecting the community charge will be taken into account in the needs assessments in grant settlements for 1990-91 and in the needs grant for subsequent years.

Housing

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which are the four London boroughs which have 1,000 tenants who have not been served with an offer notice within the statutory time limit under the right-to-buy legislation; how long this state of affairs has existed in each case; and if he will use his powers under the Housing Act 1980 to remedy this situation.

Mr. Trippier: According to the latest information, the four boroughs concerned are Brent, Camden, Lewisham and Newham. In Lewisham and Brent respectively only in the last two and five months have overdue cases exceeded 1,000. The rise in overdue cases is a relatively recent phenomenon reflecting the boom in right-to-buy applications. Even in Camden (13 months) and Newham (17 months), the position is not of long standing; nor is it intractable.

My right hon. Friend recognises, of course, that this is not a satisfactory state of affairs and has impressed on the councils concerned the need for urgent action; they are taking positive action to expedite the processing of right-to-buy applications. The Housing Bill provides further powers which will ensure that local authorities are encouraged to process right-to-buy applications with the minimum of delay. These include provisions for applicants who suffer unreasonable delay to have the rent for that period set against the discounted purchase price of the dwelling; and to have the period during which they are liable to repay discount correspondingly reduced; and for local authorities to use capital receipts to fund the necessary additional administrative staff to support the processing of right-to-buy casework. My right hon. Friend takes the view that these measures combined with a recognition of the part of the local authorities of the need to take full advantage of capital receipts from sales, will encourage a significant improvement in performance. If they do not do so, he will not hesitate to act.

Building Regulations

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all of those organisations which replied to his consultation document on section F and L of the draft building regulations, relating to fuel conservation; and which organisations urged the adoption of a U value rating of 0·45 w/m² or lower for exposed walls.

Mr. Trippier: The organisations and individuals that have commented on the proposals for amendments to the requirements and guidance relating to part L of the Building Regulations (Conservation of Fuel and Power) up to 9 November are listed in the table. Those marked * have expressed concern about the proposal to upgrade the heat-transfer (u) value for exposed walls to 0·45 w/m²K or the possible technical risks associated with it. Those marked † are seeking an even lower heat-transfer value for exposed walls—that is, a higher insulation standard than that proposed. Others either support the figure in the consultation paper, or have not specifically commented on this aspect of the proposals.

In addition, 13 comments have been received which relate solely to the proposals on part F (ventilation).

Radiation (Wigan and Southport)

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to whether there was any increase in background radiation in the Wigan and Southport area on the night of 28-29 October; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No increases in background radiation were detected by the national radiation monitoring network (RIMNET) on the night in question.

Planning Appeals

Mr. Sean Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many appeals have been received by him in each of the last three calendar years against decisions of local authorities to refuse planning permission; and how many of those appeals have been upheld.

Mr. Chope: The total number of appeals received against decisions of local planning authorities (or against their failure to make decisions within the statutory period), and the number upheld, were as follows:

Year	Appeals received	Appeals allowed
1985	17,053	5,477
1986	18,863	5,992
1987	21,548	6,524

Water Pollution

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of drinking water samples in England are found to be unwholesome under the interpretation of the European Community directive relating to water quality.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 7 November 1988]: Out of several thousand supplies in England some 200 regularly exceed one or other of the limits set by the EC drinking water directive for certain parameters; however programmes of improvement are in hand for most of these.

Regional Water Authorities (Ownership)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has for including in his forthcoming plans for reorganisation of the ownership of regional water authorities provisions for restrictions of ownership, or proportion of shareholdings, to persons not of United Kingdom nationality or bodies of ultimate ownership not registered in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 8 November 1988:] We shall be announcing our intentions in due course.

Housing (Greater London)

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received regarding the transfer of formerly Greater London council-owned housing outside the former Greater London council area to housing associations (a) from the former Greater London council tenants and (b) from others; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 9 November 1988]: Before the transfer of the ex-GLC seaside and country homes, the London residuary body forwarded 379 representations in response to consultation letters to all 3,445 tenants. Since the transfer 15 representations have been received direct and eight via constituency Members of Parliament.

Marine Research

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if there are plans to fund research into the annual migratory track of porpoises from the Baltic to the North sea and to the English channel in relation to the spread of the virus affecting marine mammals; if there are proposals to initiate collaborative projects internationally; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 9 November 1988]: Preliminary work is now under way at the sea mammal research unit of the Natural Environment Research Council for a full research project based on the tracking of porpoises to proceed next year. This study will provide detailed information on the movement and feeding of porpoises and involves collaboration with other researchers both in the United Kingdom and internationally.

Evidence available so far has not identified in porpoises the particular virus responsible for seal deaths.

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the current budgetary restraints on the Natural Environment Research Council five-year project to collect data about chemistry and biology of the North sea.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 9 November 1988]: The Department intends to spend £1·2 million on North sea related research in 1988-89 and we are planning to increase that amount in 1989-90. A good proportion of this expenditure is placed with NERC. The NERC North sea project is funded principally from the science budget which is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science.

EMPLOYMENT

Employment Training

Mr. Ray Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the names of the people responsible for the employment training scheme, by area.

Mr. Nicholls: The Training Agency is in the process of producing a national directory of training agents and training managers. This will list, by Training Agency area, the names and addresses of all organisations contracted to deliver employment training. The directory is due to be published in January 1989.

Mr. Ray Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people employed under the community programme will transfer to the new employment training programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: All people employed under the community programme prior to 5 September, and whose entitlement to the community programme continued beyond that date, are entitled to transfer to employment training. There were 170,034 filled places on community programme, excluding managers and supervisors, at 31 August. A large majority of these places transferred to employment training early in September but the precise number of these and of those who will eventually transfer is not known.

Mr. Ray Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment he has made of the effect of switching of responsibility of training to local employer networks on employment training.

Mr. Nicholls: There has been no switch of responsibility of training to local employer networks on employment training.

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether an employer who is providing them with a work placement as part of their training will be allowed to require employment training scheme trainees to (a) do overtime, (b) work unsocial hours or (c) work on Saturdays or Sundays; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: The hours of attendance of employment training trainees on placements should be in line with the normal hours worked by the provider's own employees. Trainees should not, however, be required to attend for any periods which normally attract overtime or premium payments for employees, nor should they be required to attend on Sundays or bank holidays, unless that is normal for the firm or industry concerned.

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps the Training Commission will be taking to ensure that the employment training scheme trainees are not given work experience placements which substitute for or displace normal jobs; if he will ensure that no employer who has declared redundancies in the preceding two years can take on the employment training scheme trainees in the work areas or sections affected by those redundancies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: Providers of employment training places are required to offer a properly planned and structured programme of training for all trainees. It is for training managers and practical training providers to try to ensure that ET placements have the support of their employees so that there is an environment conducive to good training. For many employers this will involve following their normal industrial relations practices and procedures.

This requirement will safeguard against job substitution and any employer may seek to participate in employment training whether or not they have declared redundancies in the past.

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what safeguards he is taking to ensure that claimants, or their parents, are no worse off from participating in the employment training scheme; what will be the position, and what advice he will give, to claimants who (a) are receiving payments from insurance agreements to cover mortgage and hire purchase payments which could be affected by their change in status from unemployed claimant to trainees or (b) are living as dependants with someone else who is claiming housing benefit as head of household, where that head of household's benefit may be affected by the change in the trainee's status from unemployed claimant to trainee; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: We are concerned that some insurance companies may withdraw mortgage protection cover from people joining employment training. The terms of insurance policies are, of course, for individuals and their insurers. However, the Association of British Insurers has written to its members, asking them to do all they can to ensure that people joining employment training do not forfeit this protection.

Dependants of people in receipt of housing benefit may join employment training without this having any effect on the level of housing benefit in payment.

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will estimate the net Exchequer cost of removing an employment training scheme trainee from the unemployment register; if he will give the basis of that calculation; and what is the latest estimate of the net Exchequer cost of the community programme of removing a participant from the unemployment register.

Mr. Nicholls: In 1987-88 the net Exchequer cost of removing a community programme participant from the unemployment register was approximately £2,400. No comparable estimate for the employment training programme is available at present.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many places there are on the Birmingham city council ET scheme; and how many entrants are in place so far.

Mr. Nicholls: Birmingham city council has an employment training contract which builds up to 3,000 places by March 1989. As at 28 October, nearly 700 places were filled by former community programme participants and, in addition, there have been 160 entrants to the new programme.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many trainees have entered ET.

Mr. Nicholls: In the first eight weeks of employment training about 52,000 people entered training.

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how much is to be spent on employment training within Greater London.

Mr. Nicholls: The information is not available in the form requested. However, the planned expenditure (excluding income support) for the London region up to the end of March 1989 is £20 million.

Construction Industry Training Board

Mr. Soames: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the standards of training offered by the construction industry training board.

Mr. Nicholls: The construction industry training board is the lead body for setting training standards in the construction industry. It is working closely with the Training Agency and the National Council for Vocational Qualifications to establish occupational standards leading to the development of national vocational qualifications.

As a managing agent for YTS, CITB has approved training organisation status and is closely monitored by the Training Agency to ensure that the required standards of training are maintained. All the trainees are following programmes that lead towards recognised vocational qualifications.

Mr. Soames: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will seek to broaden the scope of training offered by the construction industry training board.

Mr. Nicholls: Following discussions with Ministers last year, the construction industry training board has taken steps to increase the number of young people entering the industry via YTS and to encourage employers to update and upgrade the skills of their existing work force, including managers and supervisors. The board has also recently committed nearly £8 million to support over 6,400 employment training places a year for adult entrants to the industry. I have asked the board to make its grant support for training more flexible and more accessible, and I am also discussing with the chairman the measures to be taken to attract women and ethnic minority groups into the industry.

Mr. Soames: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how much money the constuction industry training board received in 1987 from the construction industry; and how much was paid out in grants.

Mr. Nicholls: In the financial year ending 31 March 1987, the construction industry training board raised £47·3 million by levy on the industry. £21·1 million was paid to employers in grants towards the costs of training and a further £10·3 million was spent in support of YTS in the industry. A further £16·2 million was used to cover the board's operating costs including the running of six training centres, the activities of its field training advisory service and its standard-setting work.

Mr. Soames: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how much money the construction industry training board had in its cash balance at the bank at the end of its last financial year.

Mr. Nicholls: The latest available accounts are for the financial year ending 31 March 1987. The CITB had no cash at the bank at the end of that year. This information is taken from the 1986-87 annual report, a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

Employers (Information)

Mr. Nicholas Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has received representations about employers who provide incorrect information about circumstances in which employment of a former employee has ceased; and if he has any plans to seek powers to enable him to take action against employers engaging in this practice.

Mr. Lee: I occasionally receive such representations in connection with claims for unemployment benefit. There are procedures for obtaining claimants' comments on any statement from an employer which is likely to affect payment of unemployment benefit. I have no plans to seek powers to take action against employers in the regard.

Tourism

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has as to which seaside resorts are seeking to promote tourism by requesting better access roads to their towns; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: A number of seaside resorts including Southport have raised this issue with me.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what selective investments in developments at seaside resorts in England have been made from Government tourism finance; and how much.

Mr. Lee: Assistance offered by the English tourist board under section 4 of the Development of Tourism Act 1969, to capital projects situated in seaside locations, totalled £2·8 million in 1987-88 and £1·9 million from April to October 1988.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total of English tourist board development grants in the years 1985-86 and 1986-87.

Mr. Lee: The English tourist board offered assistance totalling £11·55 million and £13·95 million in 1985-86 and 1986-87 respectively, towards the cost of tourism projects in England under the Development of Tourism Act 1969.

Industrial Tribunals (Ethnic Minorities)

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will take steps to increase the number of members of industrial tribunals who are from ethnic minorities.

Mr. Nicholls: We expect to appoint a number of new members to the industrial tribunals in October 1989. In preparation for this exercise my officials have already held discussions with the major sponsoring bodies, drawing attention to the Government's concern to increase the proportion of industrial tribunal members from the ethnic minorities. We shall stress this point strongly when we write formally to the sponsoring bodies seeking the names of candidates suitable for appointment.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people were unemployed in Derbyshire in each year from 1983; and how many people are currently unemployed in Derbyshire.

Mr. Lee: The table shows the annual average number of unemployed claimants in Derbyshire for the years 1983 to 1987. In September 1988 the number of unemployed claimants in Derbyshire was 38,275. The September 1988 figures include some over-recording, and are also affected by seasonal influences.

The Annual Average Number of Unemployed Claimants in Derbyshire

Year	Number
[1]1983	44,202
1984	47,208
1985	48,936
1986	49,799
1987	46,911

[1] Average of the seven months June to December 1983, comparable figures for earlier months are not available on the same geographical basis. Comparisons are affected by changes in the coverage of the count.

Young Persons

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many 16 to 17-year-olds have lost benefit following the eight-week period allowed, as a result of refusing or not being found places on training schemes (a) in England and Wales and (b) in Halifax.

Mr. Cope: No 16 and 17-year-olds, other than the severely disabled, single parents and other special categories were entitled to income support (formerly supplementary benefit) after 11 September. Those who applied for YTS places were paid bridging allowance which is not a social security benefit, for up to eight weeks after that to give the local authority careers office time to offer them a YTS place.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people aged 16 and 17 years who left school in Tameside in the current year have (a) accepted a YTS place, (b) got a job and (c) not gained a YTS place or a job and receive no income.

Mr. Cope: It is estimated that about 970 16 and 17-year-olds who left school in Tameside this year have accepted a YTS place and about 720 have got a job. Information on the number who have not gained a YTS place or a job and receive no income is not available. The parents of most of these young people who left school this summer who have not found a job and who have applied for a YTS place but have not yet been placed are receiving child benefit.

Closures and Takeovers (Ballots)

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will introduce a statutory code of practice for employers requiring (a) that a ballot is undertaken to ascertain the views of employees before any proposed closures or takeovers are proceeded with, (b) that any such ballot will not be held without notice, (c) that any such ballot will not be held at a time when industrial relations might be harmed and (d) that any such ballot will not impose costs on participants.

Mr. Nicholls: No.

Wages Councils

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the occasions since 1979 when he has written to chairmen of wages councils about the proposed level of wage settlements in the respective wages council.

Mr. Nicholls: The then Secretary of State wrote to the chairman of the retail food and allied trades and the retail trades (non-food) wages councils on 25 February 1983, and to the chairmen of the unlicensed place of refreshment and the licensed residential establishment and licensed restaurant wages councils on 9 and 17 August 1983 respectively, about proposals published by those councils for increases in statutory minimum rates. I regret that mention of the latest of these letters was omitted from the reply to the hon. Member given on 27 October 1986, Official Report at columns 43-44.

HEALTH

NHS Staff (Length of Service)

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will state the average length of service, in years, of staff members in the National Health Service for 1970, 1979, 1984 and 1988, respectively.

Mr. Mellor: We do not hold such information centrally.

Family Planning and Abortion

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, following the recommendations contained in the recent independent report of the multidisciplinary committee under the chairmanship of Professor Alwyn Smith, "The Nation's Health, A Strategy for the 1990s," what steps the Government are proposing to take to improve family planning and abortion services; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: The Government have noted the report and will consider the detailed points in the light of other comments made on the study. The introductory chapter includes, in its list of important health gains, the prevention of ill health in the area of sexuality and unwanted pregnancy. We shall, of course, continue to monitor closely these aspects of health.

Waiting Lists

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Health by what percentage in-patient waiting lists fell between 1978 and the latest available year in (a) England and (b) the Mersey regional health authority.

Mr. Mellor: The requested information is given in the table.

Cases on in-patient waiting list, Mersey RHA and England, 1978, 1988

	Mersey	England
December 1978	38,110	682,444
March[1] 1988	31,031	678,777
Change 1978-1988	−7,079	−3,667
Percentage Change 1978-1988	−18·6	−0·5

[1] Total less self deferred cases.

Contracts (Mersey RHA)

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list all contracts let by competitive tendering to outside operators within the Mersey regional health authority, together with their associated savings over the last three years.

Mr. Mellor: Under the competitive tendering initiative, outside contractors, in the period 1 October 1985 to 30 September 1988, won contracts—all for domestic services—as follows:

District Health Authority and Hospital/Unit

Macclesfield—District General Hospital Community and Mental Handicap Unit.
South Sefton—Fazakerley Hospital.
Warrington—Winnick Hospital.
Wirral—St. Catherine's Hospital, Victoria Central Hospital, Clatterbridge Hospital.

Estimated annual savings generated total £¾ million.

Vascular Surgery, Wakefield

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has as to the reasons why a vascular surgeon at Pinderfields hospital, Wakefield, has been refused permission to purchase a large size of aortic graft.

Mrs. Currie: None. The vascular surgeon in this health authority has indicated that stocks of aortic grafts are adequate for patients' needs.

Service Men (Nuclear Tests)

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will take steps to purchase or obtain the use of equipment recently developed in the United States of America, capable of tracing radiation in an individual's bone and the date of that exposure, so as to enable tests to be carried out on all British service men involved in Britain's nuclear test programme who may request it; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: No. We are advised that such equipment, known as dual laser beam flow sorters, cannot, as yet, measure radiation doses to the bone marrow with any more precision than established techniques. We are further advised that it is not, at present, possible to estimate accurately doses which were received many years ago, unless such doses had been so high that serious health effects would have occurred within a few weeks of exposure.

We understand that work is currently being carried out at the Medical Research Council's clinical and population cytogenetics unit in Edinburgh in an attempt to develop flow sorter technology so that, at some time in the future, it may be possible to estimate much lower doses.

A review of this type of technology has recently been carried out in relation to possible studies of American test veterans, and arrived at the same conclusions as those outlined above.

Private Residential and Nursing Care (Training)

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his latest estimate of the full cost to public funds of the training of those who are now employed in social or nursing care in private residential care and nursing homes.

Mr. Mellor: We do not hold such information centrally. We are encouraging the private sector to contribute to nurse education and training, and the English National Board for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting is talking with representatives of the private sector about further opportunities.

Market Harborough (Ambulances)

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will state how many ambulances the Leicester district health authority has to service the Market Harborough area for each shift over 24 hours; and what other areas the ambulances have to service.

Mrs. Currie: Provision of ambulance services is a matter for the district health authority concerned. The hon. Member may care to write to Mr. G. Farnham the chairman of the Leicestershire health authority for the information he seeks.

Maternity Unit, Market Harborough

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received concerning the proposals by Leicester district health authority to close the maternity unit at Market Harborough and move the services to Leicester hospital; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: We have received one representation specifically about the closure proposals at Market Harborough. It would not be appropriate for me to comment at this stage on the proposals because Ministers may be called upon to make the final decision.

Hospital Pharmacist Service

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has any plans to ameliorate the recruitment and retention problems of the hospital pharmacist service, particularly in the south-east.

Mr. Mellor: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones) on 1 November 1988 at column 588.

Pinderfield Hospital, Wakefield

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will investigate claims made by surgeons at Pinderfield hospital, Wakefield, that patients are having to wait for certain operations until instruments can be borrowed from manufacturers.

Mrs. Currie: A variety of systems are in use for the nailing of fractures and for such operations as knee implants.

The free loan instruments come as part of a package when the implant material is purchased. Four weeks ago the Wakefield orthopaedic surgeons were asked to make a clinical decision to select one of the several fracture nailing systems now available. This would enable the instruments to be available on permanent, rather than ad hoc loan. A formal response from the surgeons to this request for a decision has not yet been submitted.

We have no information on any patient being inconvenienced as a result.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received seeking action to enable the Wakefield health authority to resume the provision of artificial fingers to patients under treatment at Pinderfield hospital.

Mrs. Currie: None. The supply of artificial limbs and appliances, including fingers, to NHS patients is the responsibility of the disablement services authority. The hon. Member may therefore wish to contact the regional manager of the Leeds disablement services centre, Chapel Allerton hospital, Harehills Lane, Leeds LS7 4EZ for information on the service.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received seeking action to enable the Wakefield health authority to resume knee implant operations at Pinderfield hospital.

Mrs. Currie: None.

Dental Charges (Students)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if his Department will publish a simple guide to dental charges appropriate to students in full-time higher education.

Mrs. Currie: Our leaflet D11, "NHS Dental Treatment —how to get it free or get help with the cost", gives clear information on what the charges are and who can get free treatment or help with the cost. It is available from doctors' and dentists' surgeries, local social security offices and citizens advice bureaux.

Registered Homes

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if, in the light of the recent registered homes tribunal decision in respect of Wiltshire county council's deregistration of the Westgate private aged persons' home in Swindon, he will as a matter of urgency issue guidance to local authorities as to whether, under the provisions of the Registered Homes Act, they should continue to regard proprietors with convictions for theft as unsuitable for registration purposes.

Mrs. Currie: This tribunal decision demonstrates the need for authorities to take into account all the circumstances of a home and of the person registered in relation to it including any convictions in deciding on the suitability of a person for registration. We do not think that it would be useful to issue general guidance specifically on the subject of convictions for theft.

Hospital Social Work Service

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proposals he has to introduce a system of pooling arrangements, specific grants or cross billing between local authorities in order to improve the funding of the hospital social work service.

Mr. Mellor: Officials have been engaged in discussion with the relevant local authority associations of a number of proposals for improving the distribution of funding for the hospital social work service within the local government system. No conclusion has yet been reached.

Social Workers

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many social workers were employed in hospital settings in each year since 1979.

Mr. Mellor: I regret that this information is not available centrally.

Nursing

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will place a copy of the following reports in the Library (a) Nursing in London Study, (b) Regional Health Authority Leavers Survey 1 July to 30 September 1987, (c) Nursing Career Development Project Report, (d) Nursing Retention and Recruitment by Price Waterhouse and (e) the Wastage Rates in Nurse Training Report.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to the reply 29 July 1988, c. 783]: We are now able to let the hon. Member know that we have placed in the Library copies of the reports of:

(i) The nurses recruitment and retention survey undertaken by Price Waterhouse for RHA chairmen;

(ii) "Lasting the Course"—a study of training success and wastage undertaken by Rosemary Hutt for the Department; and

(iii) "The Way Ahead"—Carer Pathways for Nurses, Midwives and Health Visitors". The report of the nursing carer development project group.

Copies of the report of the review of nursing services in London have already been placed in the Library.

The survey of leavers between 1 July and 30 September 1987 was commissioned from the regional health authority chairmen by the review body for nursing staff, midwives, health visitors and professions allied to medicine. I understand that the results of this survey have not yet been received by the review body. When these results have been received, it will be for the review body to decide to what extent they will be made public.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Payments

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security under what powers his Department has reduced payments after 31 July for anyone with capital between £6,000 and £8,000; and why the reduction is not mentioned in RR4 or any other public document.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: On April 27 my right hon. Friend announced that the capital limit in housing benefit was to be increased from £6,000 to £8,000 with effect from 30 May. Households affected could reapply and be paid housing benefit by their local authority from the beginning of June. At the same time my right hon. Friend announced the scheme of transitional protection; the details of which were outlined to claimants in leaflet RR4, which makes it clear that households with less than £8,000 in capital can claim a transitional payment to cover them from the beginning of April until the end of May. A claim to housing benefit from June obviously reduced the need for transitional protection. Transitional protection is therefore adjusted with effect from the date when housing benefit is paid. Clearly a cut-off date had to apply to these arrangements and so, following discussions with the local authority associations, it was decided that the period for which transitional payments could be paid in such cases in respect of the full loss would not extend beyond 31 July where there continues to be entitlement to housing benefit. Claimants who delayed a claim for new housing benefit until after that date would have their entitlement to housing benefit reflected in a reduced transitional protection from 31 July. It is open to local authorities to consider the backdating of housing benefit in these cases.

All transitional payments are extra-statutory and applicants are notified individually about circumstances affecting the calculation of their transitional payments.

National Insurance

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list each of the changes to class 1 national insurance contributions since 1979.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information is as follows:

Reciprocal Arrangements (Irish Republic)

Mr. John Carlisle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what reciprocal arrangements exist between United Kingdom social security offices and social security offices in the Irish Republic.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The social security benefit position of EC nationals moving between the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland is in the main covered by the European Community social security arrangements. Liaison for these purposes between these countries' social security offices is generally undertaken through the Department's overseas branch at Newcastle upon Tyne.

Claimants (EC and Ireland)

Mr. John Carlisle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will inquire into investigatory procedures as practised by social security officers on claimants who arrive from other EC countries or Ireland requiring immediate financial assistance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We are obliged by EC law, and a Council of Europe convention, not to discriminate against European Nationals in our benefit rules, but social security officers investigate carefully all claims for immediate financial assistance.

Payments may be made as repayable crisis loans from the social fund to meet immediate short-term needs in an emergency; including such needs arising before a first payment of income support is due. In these cases, the social fund officer must satisfy himself that serious damage or a serious risk to the health or safety of the applicant or a member of his family can be prevented only by making such a payment.

Household Incomes

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the average household income for all families with children in the current year.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I regret that this information is not available.

Medical Appeal Tribunals

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the average length of time between applications for medical appeal tribunals and the subsequent hearing for the periods (a) January to March, (b) April to June and (c) July to September.

Mr. Scott: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Irish Nationals

Mr. John Carlisle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what evidence has been given to him of Irish nationals arriving at United Kingdom airports and making immediate claims for benefit from social security offices.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Citizens of the Republic of Ireland have no conditions attached to their stay and are able to claim income support in the same way as United Kingdom citizens. If my hon. Friend has evidence that the system is not working as it should, I should be grateful if he would let me have details.

"Living Options Lottery"

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what consideration the Minister for the Disabled has given to the findings of the survey, carried out for the Prince of Wales's advisory group on disability, entitled "Living Options Lottery"; what action is being taken; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: I have seen the report and am considering its findings.

Family Credit

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the criterion for eligibility to apply for family credit by using fast application procedures which were available for those starting work on low incomes when applying for family income supplement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: As with family income supplement, the special procedures for claims made by people starting work after being unemployed and on benefit to enable them to be dealt with more speedily apply only to claims referred by claimant advisers in the Department of Employment. For other claims a help desk facility has been provided at the family credit unit for local social security offices to raise any cases where a claimant is in difficulties pending an award of family credit, so as to prompt urgent action.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what calculation he made in reaching the conclusion that a person earning £9,300 per annum, with two children aged between 12 and 14 years could qualify for family credit; and what assumptions he made before undertaking his calculations.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The highest gross earnings at which such a family could qualify for family credit is £9,297·60 per annum, or £178·80 a week, at the proposed rates from April 1989. The calculation is as follows:

Maximum family credit is:—
Adult credit	33·60
Child credit	12·90
Child credit	12·90
	59·40
Maximum credit	59·40
Less	58·89
Family credit payable	[3] 0·50
Gross earnings	178·80
Deductions
tax[1]	23·76
national insurance contributions[2]	16·10
Net	138·94

[1] Assumes tax allowances increased in line with inflation.
[2] At the levels proposed for April 1989, as announced.
[3] 50p is the minimum amount of family credit payable.
The amount to be taken into account against the maximum credit is 70 per cent. of the excess over the family credit 'threshold' of 54·80 = 138·94—54·80 × 70 per cent. = £58·898.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claimants currently in receipt of family credit were previously in receipt of family income supplement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: This information will not be available until early in the new year.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the current total of family credit cases being handled by his Department; and what percentage of the total eligible to claim this represents.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: At the end of October, 248,000 families were receiving family credit, and 57,500 claims were awaiting determination. A precise estimate of the number of families eligible for family credit, and therefore what percentage is represented by those already in receipt, cannot be made until information from the 1988 family expenditure survey is available.

Family Credit (Bradford)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what is the average delay in Bradford between the receipt of an application for family credit and that application being determined; where information about family credit and forms and guidance notes to apply for family credit is available in Bradford; and in what languages this material is available;

(2) how many applicants in Bradford for family credit (a) have been accepted, (b) have been refused and (c) are still under consideration.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Family credit is dealt with centrally, and information is not available on a local basis. Claim forms and leaflets are available at post offices and social security offices or by telephoning Freeline Social Security 0800 500 222. Information on all social security benefits is also available by telephoning 0800 666 555. As with other departmental claim forms the family credit claim form is available in English only: people who have difficulty in completing the claim form because of this can seek help from the local social security office.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of families in Bradford are in receipt of family credit; what estimates about the level of take-up this represents have been made; and what action he is taking in Bradford to increase the take-up of family credit and to reduce delays in applications being determined.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Family credit is dealt with centrally and information is not available on a local basis. For details of the measures we are taking to increase take-up I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) on 4 November at column 810. For details of the measures we are taking to reduce delays in dealing with claims, I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker) on 9 November.

SERPS

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (a) women and (b) men receive more than £15 a week from SERPS.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: As at 31 March 1988, a total of 33,000 men and 4,130 women were in receipt of at least £15 from SERPS.

State Pensions

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the proportion of the average male wage represented by the basic state pension on (a) 24 April 1981 and (b) 24 April 1988.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information requested is as follows:

	Per cent.
April 1981	22·6
April 1988	20·5

The earnings figures used are all full-time male manual earnings on adult rates where earnings are unaffected by absence. Full basic state retirement pension for a single person is used in the calculations. Although a date is given when the new earnings survey is carried out (20 April in 1988) employers sometimes provide monthly information. April figures are therefore quoted.

Benefit Entitlement

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will make it his policy that the rules currently governing the payment of pensions and benefits will not be changed to exclude people who currently receive them and could be expected to receive them in the near future;

(2) if he will make it his policy that no person in receipt of a pension or benefit of any kind will lose it as a result of his expressed intention to target help to those he defines as poor.

Mr. Scott: We have no plans to alter the basis on which the basic state pension is paid, or to introduce any modification to our reform of the state earnings-related pension scheme. It is not our intention that anyone in receipt of retirement pension or any other benefit should lose entitlement as a result of our plans to make additional resources available to pensioners on lower incomes.

Social Fund

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what analysis of the social fund figures contained in deposited papers No. 25 in the Library is being undertaken by his Department.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Department is closely monitoring the levels of demand and expenditure on the social fund.

Appeal Tribunals

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the average length of time between applications for social security appeal tribunals and the subsequent hearings for the periods (a) January to March, (b) April to June and (c) July to September.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The latest available statistics relate to appeals heard in the year ending 31 December 1987. The average time between date of lodgement of an appeal and date of hearing in the four quarters of 1987 was as follows:

	weeks
Quarter ending 31 March	18·2
Quarter ending 30 June	20·3
Quarter ending 30 September	23·2
Quarter ending 31 December	24·1
Average for the year	21·7

Single Parents

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will state the number of single parents drawing supplementary benefit in 1974, 1979 and for the latest date; and if he will also state separately the number of dependants.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information requested is as follows. The figures exclude cases of temporary separation and prisoners' wives.

	November 1974	November 1979	May 1987
Numbers of lone parents	265	318	659
Number of children under 16	503	539	1,037
Number of dependants over 16	12	19	57
Total of dependants (all ages)	514	558	1,094

Source: annual statistical inquiries 1974, 1979 and 1987

Pensioners

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will state (a) the total number of pensioners and (b) the number and percentage of those who have no income apart from the state pension and income support.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: As at 31 March 1988 there were nearly 9·8 million pensioners. In 1986 there were just under 7 million pensioner units (a pensioner unit is a single person over state pension age or a married couple where the husband is aged 65 or over) of whom approximately 1·4 million (just under 20 per cent.) had no income from earnings, occupational pensions or savings. This information is taken from the 1986 family expenditure survey, and is the latest available.

Income Support

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will bring forward proposals to allow for payments made under section 27 of the Child Care Act 1980 to be disregarded for income support purposes.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: There is already provision to disregard the first £5 a week of any regular payments of this sort; any payment for housing or accommodation costs not met by benefit and all regular payments in kind. In addition, the first £250 of any irregular payments made in a 52-week period is treated as capital: the limit will be removed later this year.

Low-income Families

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing individuals below various percentiles of the income distribution, before adjustment for household size and composition, analysed by economic status, using household disposable income after housing costs, in the manner of table D1 of the recent DHSS publication, "Households Below Average Income: A Statistical Analysis, 1981-85".

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing individuals in each of the five lowest decile groups of the income distribution, before adjustment for household size and composition, analysed by economic status, using household disposable income after housing costs, in the manner of table D1 of the recent DHSS publication, "Households Below Average Income: A Statistical Analysis, 1981-85".

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 22 June 1988]: As explained in paragraph 1.2 of Cm. 523 "The Measurement of Living Standards For Households Below Average Income", the "Households Below Average Income" statistics are designed to provide various measures of the numbers of people with different living standards. And, as paragraphs 2.6 and 2.7 of Cm. 523 further explain, it is the Government's view that allowing for the size and composition of households is an essential part of this process.

Nevertheless, the "Households Below Average Income" statistics can be adjusted so that they do not take account of household size and composition. One such approach is to assume that all households with a given income achieve the same standard of living. In other words, a household composed of two adults and several children is assumed to achieve the same living standard from an income of £100 as a household including only one adult and no children. Alternatively, in order to give some recognition to household size (if not to composition), each individual within each household can be given equal weight. This per capita approach carries with it the implication that, in order to achieve the same living standard, a baby must consume the same resources as an adult.

Although neither of these approaches is meaningful, and although the methods of both these approaches is inconsistent with the objectives of the "Households Below Average Income" statistics, figures on both bases for table D1 have been put in the Library. The Government have no doubt that equivalisation is necessary to the measurement of living standards.

Departmental Switchboard (Efficiency)

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the average time taken by his Department's telephone switchboard to answer external telephone calls; and what steps he is taking to improve it.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 3 November 1988]: Answering external telephone calls on the switch board for Richmond house and a number of other Whitehall offices is the responsibility of the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency (CCTA). It employs British Telecommunications telephonists and aims for an average 25 seconds response time for each call. We are content that this provides a satisfactory level of service, but CCTA is looking at ways to improve upon this response time.

SCOTLAND

Disabled People (Access)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many of the building control authorities in Scotland have designated access officers to assist on matters relating to access for disabled people.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I understand that all 50 building control departments have designated access officers.

School Meals

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing how much expenditure on school meals has changed in cash and real terms each year between 1979 and the latest date available for Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information is as follows:

£000's

1978-79	34,057	73,040

Note. Figures for 1987-88 are not yet available.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the average price of a school meal in (a) primary and (b) secondary schools for each year since 1979 to 1988 in 1988 prices in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information is set out in the table:

Teachers (Statistics)

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the total number of (a) female and (b) male teachers holding promoted posts, at all levels, in (i) primary and (ii) secondary level.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested, taken from the school census held in September 1987, is set out in the table:

Numbers[1] of teachers holding promoted posts in education authority schools, Scotland, 1987

Type of school	Male	Female
Primary	985	2,986
Secondary	9,097	3,550

School Boards

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will detail in the Official Report the training provision to be made for (a) parent and (b) teacher members of school boards.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: There is no differentiation between the central training provision to be made for parent and staff members of school boards. The training programme currently being developed by the Scottish Education Department will offer a wide range of choice to individual boards and board members and boards themselves will be free to choose training appropriate to their own circumstances.

I have already announced details of the programme and have arranged for copies of that announcement to be placed in the House Library.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether his Department is prepared to meet the cost of releasing teachers to be members of school boards.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Like other members of a school board, staff members will serve on a voluntary basis in their own time. We shall be encouraging boards to meet at times—such as in the evening—which will be convenient for working people in order to enable a wide cross-section of the community to participate in the work of the boards.

Mobile Creche Facilities

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has on the provision by local authorities in Scotland of mobile creche facilities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The latest figures, for year ending 31 March 1987, show that the following playbus facilities were provided by Strathclyde regional council and the Western Isles islands council.

	Number of buses	Number of groups serviced	Number of children accommodated
Strathclyde	4	15	184
Western Isles	2	61	732

Green Belt Boundaries

Mr. Ron Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has received recent representations from the Scottish Ramblers' Association concerning the review of green belt boundaries by Lothian regional council; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Both my right hon. and learned Friend and I have just received letters from the Ramblers' Association in connection with this review. A full reply to the points raised by the association in its letters will be sent shortly but its general concern is over our commitment to the green belt and I can confirm that the Government stand by the maintenance of effective green belts and want to establish confidence in their permanence. The responsibility for the review itself rests with Lothian region and the districts who participated in the exercise. It is for the planning authorities concerned to decide how the green belt boundaries are drawn.

YTS

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many 16 and 17-year-olds were eligible but had not been placed on YTS at the date when the most recent information was available.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 7 November 1988]: All 16 and 17-year-olds are eligible to apply for YTS but many do not do so. Excluding this summer's school leavers, on 2 November there were 6,592 young people who had applied for a YTS place and were receiving bridging allowance, as against some 12,000 unfilled YTS places.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will provide an estimate of the total number of 16 and 17-year-olds who will not have received an offer of a YTS place on the termination of the bridging allowance on 5 November in Scotland.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 7 November 1988]: It is the responsibility primarily of the local authority careers service to ensure that young people who have applied for a YTS place, and made themselves available to discuss possible places, are put in contact with managing agents to ensure they are offered a start on a YTS scheme before the end of the guarantee period. I am satisfied that the Training Agency has made available more than sufficient places to meet the potential uptake and I have therefore made no national estimate of a shortfall in offers.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Radioactivity

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what results he has of his two recent surveys carried into post-Chernobyl radioactivity in Cumbria by (a) multi-wheeled vehicles, and (b) helicopter: and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Full results are not yet availabe from the recent aerial survey of the post-Chernobyl restricted area which was supported by surface monitoring using multi-wheeled vehicles. The results will be published in the usual way as soon as possible.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many samples of sheep milk were taken in (a) Cumbria, (b) Lancashire and (c) England to test for radioactivity for each month, respectively, since the Chernobyl accident: and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Full details of samples of sheep milk and of all other categories of produce monitored following the Chernobyl accident are regularly published and are available in the Library of the House.

EC (Food Aid)

Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will define the current policy with regard to the distribution of European Economic Community butter and in some instances, canned stewed steak, and in particular who is eligible.

Mr. Ryder: I assume that my hon. Friend's question relates to the European Community's surplus food scheme. There has been no change in the policy announced by the then Minister of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) in response to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss) on 21 April. Details of the eligibility criteria were also given by my right hon. Friend in response to a further question by the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) on 19 July.

BSE

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, further to his reply of 3 November, Official Report, columns 747-48, which organisation first raised with his Department the need for a compensation scheme for farmers with stock affected by BSE: and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: According to my Department's records, the possibility of introducing compulsory slaughter with compensation was first raised at a meeting held on 1 June this year between my officials and a number of organisations. These included the British Veterinary Association, the Farmers' Union of Wales, the Milk Marketing Board, the National Cattle Breeders' Association, the National Farmers' Union and the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons.

Apples

Mr. Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what quantity of apples has been destroyed or converted under European Community arrangements in each of the most recent five years for which figures or estimates are available for the European Economic Community; and what has been the expenditure in each year on such disposals.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 8 November 1988]: The following figures show the amounts of apples withdrawn under the EC intervention arrangements which were either converted to animal feed or industrial alcohol or which found no other destination and were therefore wasted; and the cost of these withdrawal operations to Community funds; for the last five years for which these are available:

	Amounts Tonnes	Cost to FEOGA mecu
1982-83	1,121,011	124·9
1983-84	120,849	14·0
1984-85	643,851	69·0
1985-86	178,592	21·4
1986-87	343,325	40·9

Mr. Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the current levels of apple stocks in the European Economic Community.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 8 November 1988] The most recent available figure for Community stocks of apples is for 1 February 1988 when the figure was 2·4 million tonnes. Figures for the new Community crop are not normally available until later in the year.

Barnes Review

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the share of cuts to be implemented under the Barnes review of agricultural research and development for each of the annual periods commencing from April 1989; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 9 November 1988]: Final decisions on the future level of Government funding of agricultural research and development following the Barnes review will not be made until after consultations with industry have been completed. As announced in November 1987, planned expenditure on R and D by agriculture departments will be reduced by £5 million in 1989-90 and by a further £5 million in 1990-91. This year's autumn statement announced a further £5 million reduction for 1990-91 and an additional £9 million for 1991-92. Together, these reductions amount to a total of £24 million by 1991-92, which is equivalent to £30 million at full: economic cost. However, there will be an increase in the strategic research funded from the agriculture, fisheries and food programme of £2 million in 1990-91 and a further £3 million in 1991-92.

DEFENCE

Overseas Students (Military Training)

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many overseas students have attended United Kingdom military training establishments for each year from 1978.

Mr. Freeman: The number of overseas students who have attended military training courses in the United Kingdom since financial year 1981-82 is as follows:

	Number
1981-82	5,636
1982-83	4,602
1983-84	5,188
1984-85	5,447
1985-86	5,167
1986-87	5,480
1987-88	4,858

Figures for earlier years are not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Land Disposal

Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will reconsider the way his Department places a valuation on publicly owned land to be disposed of.

Mr. Freeman: No. Before disposing of surplus property we obtain professional advice either from within MOD, from the district valuer or from commercial consultants. They prepare valuations of surplus property on the basis of full open market value taking account of existing or established uses and, when appropriate, development potential.

RAF Bases (Western Isles)

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future of the Royal Air Force bases in the Western Isles.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There are no current plans to change the operational role of either RAF Stornoway or RAF Benbecula.

Relocation

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to move officials of his Department into the regions.

Mr. Sainsbury: As I told the House during the recent debate on the Defence Estimates, the successful transfer of 1,400 jobs to Glasgow under the 1979 dispersal programme is almost complete. We are now examining a range of further relocation possibilities which should significantly reduce the amount of work that must remain in London.

Hovercraft Minehunting

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if, in the light of the Gulf patrols to protect civilian shipping, he has any plans to resurrect hovercraft minehunting trials.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No, but we continue to take an interest in the possible use of hovercraft in any military role for which they might be suitable.

Warsaw Pact

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has on measures the Warsaw pact is taking to modernise its nuclear and conventional forces.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The most recent and comprehensive account of the modernisation of the Warsaw Pact's conventional and nuclear forces can be found in chapter 6 of this year's statement on the Defence Estimates (Cm. 344-I). As the statement makes clear, there has been no let-up in the Soviet Union's military modernisation programme, despite improvements in East-West relations.

Defence Expenditure

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence by how much United Kingdom spending on defence as a proportion of the gross domestic product exceeds the average combined spending for other members of the EEC; and what is this proportion expressed in cash terms.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: On the latest available estimates of GDP and defence spending for European Community countries in the calendar year 1987, United Kingdom defence expenditure exceeds the average for other member states by 1·6 per cent. When related to United Kingdom GDP this represents a figure approaching £7 billion.

Stealth Systems

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what research and development work he has commissioned into low-observable stealth systems; and what arrangements there are for the integration into NATO airforces of stealth type aircraft.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Ministry of Defence is conducting a programme of basic applied research relating to low observable air systems. This programme is aimed at understanding the techniques and technologies involved, with a view to the application to future generations of fixed wing aircraft, air-launched weapons, helicopters and unmanned aircraft.

There are no plans to introduce stealth aircraft into RAF service in the near future. It is not our practice to comment on the plans of other NATO air forces.

European Fighter Aircraft

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made towards signature of the main development contracts of the European fighter aircraft; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Younger: I am pleased to inform my hon. Friend that Spain signed yesterday the memorandum of understanding for full development of the European fighter aircraft (EFA). This follows its signature by Germany, Italy and the United Kingdom earlier this year, and represents an important step in the successful progress of European collaboration in aerospace. Very few contractual issues now remain to be resolved, and I hope that it will be possible to sign the main contracts for full development of the EFA in the next few days.

Challenger 2 Tank

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for defence what representations he has had about the purchase of the Challenger 2 tank; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations on this subject. He is considering the time scale in which the Chieftain tank might need to be replaced and the options available for doing so.

Clyde Safety Scheme

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how frequently the Clyde safety scheme is tested; and if he will detail the range of possible nuclear reactor accident scenarios under which this testing is carried out.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Clyde area public safety scheme is exercised four times a year. In addition, there is a major field exercise every three years. These exercises envisage a range of accidents greater than the maximum design accident in order to examine the consequences outside the naval base of such accidents.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish the details of the basis for the Royal Navy's estimates of the probability of nuclear reactor accidents on the Clyde.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No, but we judge that the possibility of an accident involving a defence nuclear reactor giving rise to a release of radioactivity is extremely remote.

AWRE (Incident)

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on an incident which occurred at the Aldermaston atomic weapons research establishment on Tuesday 8 November at 7.10 am involving evacuation from a building; and if any radiation leak was involved.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I can confirm that an automatic alarm system triggered falsely at the atomic weapons establishment at Aldermaston on Tuesday 8 November. The work force's entry to the area was delayed until it was clear that it was safe. This was the same alarm that triggered falsely on Friday 28 October. On neither occasion was there any leak of radiation.

Royal Ordnance plc

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will list the patents, sold by Her Majesty's Government in 1986 to Royal Ordnance factories, which relate to work undertaken at the Royal Ordnance factory at Radway Green.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 4 November 1988]: No patents were sold to Royal Ordnance in 1986. The scheme made by the Secretary of State pursuant to the Ordnance Factories and Military Services Act 1984 transferred to Royal Ordnance assets (including patents) effective 2 January 1985. The document referred to in The Sunday Times article of 30 October was a patent office formality requirement and merely confirmed the earlier transfer.

Of the patents transferred under the scheme none originated at the Royal Ordnance factory, Radway Green.

Work currently undertaken at Radway Green is under the sole control of Royal Ordnance and is its commercial concern. We are unable therefore to comment on whether or not any of the transferred patents relate to work undertaken at Radway Green.

Contractors

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many United Kingdom-based contractors which were paid £5 million or more by his Department in 1986-87 did not qualify for appearance on page 15 of the "Statement of the Defence Estimates 1988" (Volume 2) for security reasons.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 9 November 1988]: In accordance with the practice of successive Governments, the information requested cannot be disclosed because of security considerations.

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will define the term headquarter contract with respect to awards made to contractors by his Department; and what type of contracts awarded by his Department are not included in this category.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 9 November 1988]: Headquarter contracts cover the main defence equipment projects and the principal defence contracts which are handled centrally, including, for example, those for maintenance and spares. Excluded from this category are local purchase orders placed under delegated powers by service units and Ministry of Defence establishments.

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list in the Official Report the precise amounts paid to each of the following contractors by his Department in the year ended 31 March 1988 (a) The General Electric Co. plc, (b) Rolls-Royce Ltd., (c) British Telecommunications plc, (d) Lucas Industries plc, (e) BTR plc, (f) Austin Rover Group Ltd., (g) United Scientific Holdings plc, (h) Courtaulds plc and (i) Massey Ferguson Holdings Ltd.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 9 November 1988]: The payments made to each of these companies in the year ended 31 March 1988 in respect of headquarters contracts were as follows:

	£ million
a. The General Electric Company plc	1,035·0
b. Rolls-Royce Ltd.	420·0
c. British Telecommunications plc	70·0
d. Lucas Industries plc	55·0
e. BTR plc	26·0
f. Austin Rover Group Ltd.	50·0
g. United Scientific Holdings plc	25·0
h. Courtaulds plc	8·5
i. Varity Holdings Ltd. (formerly Massey Ferguson Holdings Ltd.)	12·0

Royal Ordnance plc

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make an up-to-date statement on the future of Royal Ordnance plc.

Mr. Sainsbury: The Ministry of Defence sold Royal Ordnance plc to British Aerospace in April 1987, and is therefore no longer responsible for the affairs of the company. Royal Ordnance is a registered defence contractor, and, amongst other things, is contracted to supply, over the next five years, 80 per cent. of the Ministry of Defence's requirements for certain explosives, propellants and related end-products. The company will continue to be invited to bid in the future for MOD business which it has the capabilities to undertake.

Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence at what level within his Department discussions were held with British Aerospace concerning the possible sale of Royal Ordnance factories (a) before and (b) after privatisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 4 November 1988]: During discussions at various levels between the bidders and my Department, it was made clear that decisions about rationalising and restructuring the company would be a matter for the commercial judgment of the successful bidder, although RO's existing plans were included in the information circulated to interested buyers. There were no discussions with bidders about the possible closure or sale of particular sites.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Payments for Debt Act

4. Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received seeking the repeal of the Payments for Debt (Emergency Provisions) Act (Northern Ireland) 1971.

14. Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has any plans to repeal the Payments for Debt (Emergency Provisions) Act (Northern Ireland) 1971.

Mr. Ian Stewart: In the last year there have been a number of questions on this subject from hon. Members and a letter from Derry city council.

19. Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has recently met with groups seeking a repeal of the Payments for Debt (Emergency Provisions) Act (Northern Ireland) 1971.

Mr. Ian Stewart: There have been no such meetings on this subject recently.

Irish Language

6. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the role of the Irish language in his Department's education reform proposals.

Dr. Mawhinney: The position accorded to the Irish language in the decisions on education reforms announced last month recognises the wish of a great many schools in Northern Ireland to teach Irish. A full programme of study will be provided for Irish, with associated assessment arrangements. Irish will therefore enjoy the same degree of educational esteem as other elements within the prescribed curriculum.

Anglo-Irish Agreement

15. Mr. Andrew Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a further statement on his assessment of the working of the Anglo-Irish Agreement.

Mr. Tom King: We shall be assessing the working of the Intergovernmental Conference in the course of the review under article 11 of the Agreement. Generally, I believe that the Agreement can bring considerable benefit to all law-abiding people in Northern Ireland.

25. Mr. Flannery: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the purpose of the review of the Anglo-Irish Agreement.

Mr. Tom King: Article 11 of the Agreement makes clear that the purpose of the review of the working of the Intergovernmental Conference is to see whether any changes in the scope or nature of its activities are desirable.

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects the review of the Anglo-Irish agreement to have been completed.

Mr. Tom King: As the two Governments announced in the statement issued after the meeting of the Intergovernmental Conference on 2 November, we expect the review of the working of the conference to be completed in the early part of 1989.

Health and Social Services

17. Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he last met Health and Social Service trade unions in Northern Ireland to discuss problems in health care services in the Province; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: I met representatives of the Royal College of Nursing on 29 February and the British Medical Association on 27 June 1988. On 6 September last I received a delegation from the Northern Ireland committee of the Irish Congress of Trade Unions, which included representatives of COHSE, NUPE and NIPSA.

Discussion at those meetings was wide ranging and included the implementation of the regional strategy, funding and competitive tendering.

Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the cost of the feasibility survey on Northern Ireland health care services completed in 1987 by United Medical Enterprises; and if he will list the main recommendations of that survey.

Mr. Viggers [holding answer 9 November 1988]: £35,000. The survey found that Northern Ireland possesses the skills and the commitment to enter into the overseas health care market. Four key areas with commercial potential were identified as:

the availability of skilled staff
a capacity to provide training in a wide range of health professions the supply of goods and equipment
the treatment of private patients

The full survey report is available from the Library.

Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the purpose and precise terms of reference of the study of Northern Ireland health care services presently being undertaken by United Medical Enterprises.

Mr. Viggers [holding answer 9 November 1988]: The objectives of the present United Medical Enterprises study are:

To evaluate the expertise that exists in the identified key areas and quantify the resources available.

The key areas are:

availability of staff capacity to provide training supply of goods and equipment
the treatment of private patients

Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland why United Medical Enterprises was chosen to survey and study Northern Ireland health care services; and if he will make a statement on the likely cost of its most recently commissioned study.

Mr. Viggers [holding answer 9 November 1988]: After considering other companies with the potential to carry out this type of work, UME was selected because of its expertise in this field to undertake a feasibility study in 1987 and the further current detailed study.

The current study is being supported by staff made available by DHSS(NI) and it is estimated that the total public sector commitment of phase II of this study will amount to around £80,000.

Security

18. Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the current security position in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Tom King: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea).

Harland and Wolff

20. Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretrary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received concerning the future of Harland and Wolff; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Viggers: My right hon. Friend and I have met the board of Harland and Wolff, representatives of the Confederation of Shipbuilding and Engineering Unions and the Alliance party for Northern Ireland for discussions about the future of the company. Several letters on this subject have also been received including those from a number of Northern Ireland district councils, the hon. Members for Leicester, South (Mr. Marshall) and for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle) and Dr. John Alderdice of the Alliance party for Northern Ireland.

Constitutional Reform

21. Mr. Stanbrook: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will consider proposals for constitutional reform in Northern Ireland based upon the redrawing of the border, the provision of generous resettlement grants for those affected who may wish to move across the new border in either direction, and the subsequent total integration of the Province with the rest of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Tom King: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to him by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 20 October at columns 1003-4.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on what date he received the written proposals from the Unionist parties for political progress in Northern Ireland; and whether he has yet made a full written response.

Mr. Tom King: The right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) and the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) handed me a three page "discussion paper" in the course of my meeting with them on 26 January. I had thorough discussion of this paper with them on 11 May. In the course of our talks, the Unionist leaders stressed to me that they wished their "discussion paper" to be treated on a strictly confidential basis; that it was only an outline of their ideas; and that it represented only a starting point for negotiations with the other constitutional parties. I have sought to respect the status of their paper and the basis on which it was given to me.

As I have said on a number of occasions, this "discussion paper" seems to me to set out a constructive approach. I believe the next step is to find ways of moving towards an inter-party dialogue. While I recognise the obstacle that was then created for the Unionist parties by the talks between tne SDLP and Sinn Fein, that obstacle has now disappeared. I have since suggested to the Unionist leaders that we should meet again shortly to discuss the way forward and to clarify the basis on which their outline proposals might be further considered.

Integrated Education

22. Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has any further plans to assist the integration of school children of different religious persuasions in the Province.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Government have announced their intention, as part of the education reforms in Northern Ireland, to legislate for a range of significant new measures. These are designed to promote and encourage the development of integrated education, including the creation of grant-maintained integrated schools.

Leisure and Recreation

23. Mr. Litherland: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has received any recent representations from organisations in the field of leisure and recreation.

Dr. Mawhinney: Yes; 31.

Remissions

24. Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what remission convicted criminals, including those convicted of terrorism and murder, automatically receive in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: A prisoner sentenced to a fixed term of imprisonment is eligible for 50 per cent. remission. The mandatory sentence for murder is life imprisonment, or detention during pleasure if the offender was under 18 at the time of the crime, and such sentences by their nature do not attract remission.

Broadcasting

26. Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the implications for Northern Ireland of the restriction recently imposed on the broadcasting authorities.

Mr. Tom King: I very much welcome the Home Secretary's recent announcement. The vast majority of people in Northern Ireland, as elsewhere in the United Kingdom, find it deeply offensive to see the terrorists and their allies appearing on radio and television, particularly in the wake of terrorist outrages, justifying their actions while at the same time being accorded the same courtesies as constitutional politicians.

Short Brothers

27. Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, if he will make a statement on progress in the possible privatisation of Short Brothers.

Mr. Viggers: Since I announced to the House on 21 July our readiness to consider suitable proposals for the privatisation of Shorts, the Government have appointed Kleinwort Benson as their merchant banking advisers and Norton Rose as their legal advisers. My officials and the advisers are preparing a sales memorandum for issue to prospective purchasers. A number of companies and organisations have expressed an interest in Shorts.

Criminal Evidence Order 1988

28. Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received on the draft Criminal Evidence Order 1988.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Government received four letters.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the draft Criminal Evidence Order 1988.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer the hon. Member to the written answer of my right hon. Friend on 20 October, at column 996, to my hon. Friend the Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Stevens). The draft order was fully debated in the House on Tuesday.

Chelsea Girl Shop (Arrests)

29. Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will call for a report from the Royal Ulster Constabulary Chief Constable as to the circumstances of the arrest of trade unionists at the Chelsea Girl shop in Belfast on Saturday 15 October; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I have been informed that 15 persons were arrested on 15 October for public order offences including obstruction and disorderly behaviour. They were released without charge pending the directions of the Director of Public Prosecutions. The arrests were made after the individuals refused to disperse when required to do so by the police. I understand that those arrested were not formally connected with the industrial dispute, and that the official pickets operated in an orderly manner throughout the incident.

Hospital Services (Belfast)

30. Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has considered the Eastern health and social services board's complementary study of October 1988 on the future of hospital services in Belfast; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: The results of the study have still to be considered by the board. It would not be appropriate for me to comment at this stage, but I fully support the board's objective to secure complementary working between the acute hospitals in Belfast.

Vehicle Tests

31. Mr. Kilfedder: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the waiting times for cars to be tested at vehicle testing centres; whether he will urgently recruit more staff to cut the waiting time for a test; if he will delay the introduction of MOT test every five years until the waiting period has been brought into line with that which exists in Great Britain; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: The waiting times for private car tests at each of the vehicle inspection and driving test centres in Northern Ireland at 4 November 1988 were as follows:

	Weeks
Armagh	6½
Ballymena	3½
Belfast	12
Coleraine	2½
Cookstown	9½
Craigavon	9½
Downpatrick	8½
Enniskillen	6½
Larne	5
Lisburn	7
Londonderry	4
Mallusk	6
Newry	9½
Newtownards	9½
Omagh	4

Steps are being taken to recruit more staff, but I am unable to delay the testing of five-year-old private cars which has been a statutory requirement since November 1987.

Land Registration

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what were the comparative fees for land registration charges in each of the years 1980-81 to 1986-87, inclusive.

Mr. Needham: The following comparison of charges has been limited to the main registration types carried out by the Land Registry over a range of values.

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how long it takes to process a land registration application.

Mr. Needham: The completion times for dealings vary a great deal depending on the type of dealing, its complexity, the form in which it was submitted and its dependence on other related dealings.

The average completion times for dealings on which no queries have been raised are as follows:

	Working days

If cases requiring query are included the average completion times are increased as follows:

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when a review of the operations of the land registry in Northern Ireland will take place; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: In 1983 a comprehensive review of the Land Registry of Northern Ireland was carried out in order to identify how better it might meet its responsibilities to provide a quick, simple and economic system of land transfer.

The majority of recommendations made by that review have been accepted and implemented.

Since that time a number of other reviews on specific sections of the registry have been or are being carried out. A number of further options for reviews are now being considered.

I shall write to the hon. Member when a decision has been reached.

Industrial Promotion and Enterprise

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to meet representatives of the Industrial Development Board to discuss industrial promotion and enterprise centres in South Down, similar to what has been carried out in Derry and Carrickfergus.

Mr. Viggers: The Industrial Development Board local area initiatives were instigated by the board on a trial basis in Carrickfergus and Londonderry in 1986. The initiatives are now being reviewed by the board and a decision on the future role of this type of scheme in the pilot areas and any other part of the Province will be taken in due course.

Economic Growth

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the rate of growth of the Northern Ireland economy over the last two years.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Economic growth is normally measured in terms of gross domestic product. While caution is necessary in the interpretation of short-term trends, Northern Ireland's GDP is provisionally estimated to have increased by 19·7 per cent. at current prices in the period 1985 to 1987. This compares with the 20·2 per cent. increase for GDP in the United Kingdom as a whole (excluding the continental shelf).

IRA (American Funds)

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his latest estimate of funds reaching the Irish Republican Army from the United States of America.

Mr. Tom King: The Irish Northern Aid Committee (Noraid) is believed to be the main source of United States funding of the Provisional IRA and is obliged by United States law to lodge accounts with the Federal authorities. Declared accounts for the year February 1987—January 1988 show transfers to An Cumann Cabrach of $152,000. An Cumann Cabrach purport to operate as a support fund for prisoners' dependants. I am not in a position to publish estimates of the possible overall income from the United States of America.

Rural Areas (Mains Electricity)

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applications for the supply of mains electricity to rural areas and households in Northern Ireland have not been proceeded with over the most recent period for which figures are available.

Mr. Viggers: The information requested is not available.

PRIME MINISTER

Poland (Visit)

Dr. Godman: To ask the Prime Minister if, in the course of her visit to Poland, she acquired any information relevant to the maintenance of the shipbuilding and marine engineering industry in Scotland.

The Prime Minister: No.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Prime Minister on what date she met Mr. Lech Walesa; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: As was announced at the time, I met Mr. Lech Walesa on 4 November 1988.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Prime Minister what was the cost to the public funds of her recent visit to Poland.

The Prime Minister: It is too soon after my visit to Poland to be able to give detailed information on the cost to public funds. A provisional estimate of the total cost of the visit, allowing for recoveries from journalists and others who travelled on the RAF flight, is £21,000.

Sir Peter Blaker: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on her recent visit to Poland.

The Prime Minister: I visited Poland on 2 to 4 November and had very full and useful talks with General Jaruzelski and with Prime Minister Rakowski. In Warsaw I met Cardinal Glemp and a large number of representatives of independent political groups. I also laid wreaths at the tomb of the unknown soldier and the grave of Father Popieluzsko. I unveiled a memorial to allied airmen who flew many sorties to drop supplies to the people of Warsaw during the Warsaw uprising.

I subsequently travelled to Gdansk, where General Jaruzelski and I laid a wreath at the Westerplatte monument, marking the outbreak of the second world war. While in Gdansk, I placed flowers at the shipyard workers memorial and met Mr. Lech Walesa, the President of Solidarity, together with other members of the Solidarity leadership.

I am most grateful to the Polish Government for enabling me to carry out such a full and varied programme, and to meet spokesmen for so many different political points of view.

General Jaruzelski and Mr. Rakowski informed me of the reforms being introduced in the Polish economy. They also expressed the hope that round table meetings with representatives of opposition groups would soon be possible. They wished to see closer relations between Poland and Britain, and hoped for British help in overcoming Poland's foreign indebtedness. Our talks also covered East-West relations and other international issues.

Leaders of the various independent political groups explained to me their views on the way forward. Mr. Walesa indicated that Solidarity would be ready to take part in round table discussions with the Government on the basis of good faith and fairness, and stressed the importance of legalisation of Solidarity.

I told General Jaruzelski that there was a very great interest and sympathy for Poland in this country. We shared the hope for closer contacts and were ready to support economic reform in practical ways. At the same time I stressed that economic reform could not, in our view, succeed unless accompanied by steps to give people greater political freedom. Such freedom would incur greater responsibility. I believed that the international community would be ready to provide help once such reforms were introduced and an agreement with the IMF was in place.

This was an extremely interesting and valuable visit which I hope will lead to increased contacts in future and put Britain's relations with Poland on a firmer and more positive basis.

CPSA (Meetings)

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Prime Minister on what date she last met (a) Mr. Norman Willis and (b) any officer of the CPSA; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: As was announced at the time I last met Mr. Willis when he led the delegation of pensioners to see me on 10 March 1988.

Beveridge Report

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Prime Minister if she will state those general principles contained in the report by Sir William Beveridge, "Social Insurance and Allied Services" (Cmd. 6404) which are the policy of Her Majesty's Government.

The Prime Minister: Sir William Beveridge's report contained a large number of highly detailed proposals for the shape of post-war social security. Underpinning all these proposals is Beveridge's key objective, which this Government fully share, that social security should be a partnership between the individual and the state, which neither stifles personal responsibility nor discourages voluntary action.

ENVIRONMENT

Mr. David Kinnersley

Mr. Boyes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide details of the capacity in which David Kinnersley is advising his Department in connection with water privatisation, including his terms of reference, salary and length of contract.

Mr. Moynihan: Mr. Kinnersley was appointed in July this year as a member of the National Rivers Authority advisory committee, which advises Ministers on the restructuring of the ten water authorities in England and Wales prior to privatisation and the creation of the National Rivers Authority under the chairmanship of my right hon. and noble Friend, Lord Crickhowell. Between September 1987 and July this year, Mr. Kinnersley acted as a part-time special consultant on a daily fee basis to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on the establishment of the National Rivers Authority.

Water Treatment

Mr. Boyes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make available the responses from the Water Authorities Association and the 10 water authorites to his letter asking them to carry out a thorough review of their management and operating procedures at water treatment works, particularly unmanned installations, as a consequence of the incident at the Lowermoor water treatment works of the South West water authority.

Mr. Howard: I hope to make available in due course a summary of the responses, which I have asked for by the end of the year.

Water Authorities (Land)

Mr. Boyes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to have information regarding the number of acres of land held by each water authority in England and Wales.

Mr. Howard: The Department expects to see basic information on water authorities' land holdings at an early stage in the process of drafting prospectuses for the companies which will succeed the authorities. That drafting process will take several months and will be completed in time for publication of prospectuses towards the end of next year.

Radioactive Cloud (North-West England)

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment of any emergency services were informed of the radioactive cloud that passed over the north-west of England on the night of the 28-29 October, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what advice has been given to the local authorities that might be affected by the radioactive cloud that blew across the north-west on the night of 28-29 October;

(2) what steps his Department have taken to establish the source of the gaseous radioactive waste that blew across the north-west of England on the night of 28-29 October; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No releases of radioactivity to the environment have been either notified to or detected by the Department.

Council Houses (Cost)

Mrs. Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the current estimated building cost of an average three bedroomed council home.

Mr. Trippier: The current estimated building cost of an average three bedroomed council house is £25,800.

Planning Appeals

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what have been the numbers of appeals against refusals by local authorities for planning permissions for (a) mosques, (b) gudwaras and (c) Hindu temples; and how many were successful for 1986, 1987 and up to the latest date for 1988.

Mr. Chope: According to the Department's records, the following appeals were lodged against refusals of planning permission in respect of:

(a) Mosques
1986 One appeal: allowed.
1987 None recorded.
1988 One appeal: not yet determined.

(b) Gudwaras
None recorded.

(c) Hindu Temples
1986 One appeal: dismissed.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are his proposals for the rate support grant settlement for 1989-90.

Mr. Ridley: I am today issuing a consultation paper to the local authority associations and local authorities setting out my detailed proposals for the 1989-90 rate support grant settlement. The associations and individual local authorities have been asked for their written comments and representations on these proposals by 2 December.

Copies of the consultation paper have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Craft, Design and Technology

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what studies the Government have undertaken into the numbers of girls studying craft design and technology in (a) secondary schools (i) within years one to three, (ii) within years four to five, (iii) in the sixth form and (b) tertiary or sixth-form colleges; and what were the results.

Mrs. Rumbold: Evidence from the 1986-87 school leavers survey of examination entries suggests that girls were significantly under represented among those studying craft, design and technology in years four and five of secondary school and in the sixth form. Information from the youth cohort study about what school leavers say they have studied corroborates that evidence. No other information of the kind requested about courses taken is available centrally.

International Labour Organisation

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will take steps to restore the right of employers to negotiate with their teacher employees on pay and conditions of employment to conform with the ruling of the International Labour Organisation.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend and I have met with representatives from the local authority employers and the teacher unions to hear their responses to the Government's proposals for a teachers' negotiating group. These are the first in what we expect will be a series of meetings. Our aim is to establish new permanent machinery by 1990.

Seven-year-olds

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to provide in-service training for primary school teachers who will be required under the Education Reform Act to implement testing of seven-year-olds.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's reply to the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) on 4 November at column 783.

Science and Technology (Funds)

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what additional provision has been made in the extra £120 million for science in 1989-90 for (a) CERN, (b) AIDS research, (c) the British Antarctic Survey and (d) the British Geological Survey; and how much of each such additional sum is for (i) capital expenditure and (ii) inflation.

Mr. Jackson: The Government have yet to take a decision on the United Kingdom's future membership of CERN. In respect of AIDS I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Mr. Janman) on Thursday 10 November at columns 253-54; on the British Atlantic Survey (BAS) to my right hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire West (Mr. McLoughlin) on Tuesday, 8 November at columns 134-35; and on the British Geological Survey to my right hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) on Monday 7 November at columns 2 and 3.

Only the additional amount for BAS includes a capital element, which is £8·4 million. With regard to the question of inflation I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) on Wednesday 9 November at columns 194-95.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will explain the make-up of the extra £120 million for science and technology in 1989-90 announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, distinguishing between university, research council and collaborative research programmes, showing how much of each sum represents provision for inflation.

Mr. Jackson: The £120 million increase in 1989-90 announced by my right hon. Friend includes an increase in the science budget of £95 million over the previous plans for that year, bringing the total up to £825 million—a year-on-year cash increase of 16 per cent.; spending of £12 million by the Institute of Plant Science Research following the privatisation of part of the Plant Breeding Institute; and £13 million from the additional funding provided for the universities in 1989-90. My right hon. Friend is inviting the advisory board for the research councils to advise him on the allocation of the science budget; he will announce the detailed distribution of those funds once he has received and considered the board's advice. The increase in the science budget between 1988-89 and 1989-90 is 11 per cent. in real terms.

Research Councils

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what guidance, if any, he has given the Advisory Board for the Research Councils in seeking its advice on the allocation of the science budgets in 1989-90 and 1991-92 following his announcement on 1 November, Official Report, columns 605-10; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have written today to Sir David Phillips inviting the board's advice. The following is the text of my letter:

The Science Budget 1989-90—1991-92

1. When I met the Board in February I said that I hoped that it would be possible to give greater priority to science in this year's Public Expenditure Survey. The Government's decisions, which I announced on 1 November, have done this, and provide resources in large measure commensurate with the advice that the Board gave me in May. These decisions reaffirm the Government's commitment to maintain and enhance the strength and quality of the science base. I now seek the Board's advice on the allocation of this substantially enhanced provision for the Science Budget.

2. For 1989-90 the Science Budget will be £825 million. this is 16·5 per cent. higher than the figure for the current year; and 13·1 per cent. higher than the planning figure set in last year's Public Expenditure Survey. It represents a real increase of 11 per cent. between 1988-89 and 1989-90. The planning figure for 1990-91 has also been increased substantially and now stands at £837 million. The planning figure for 1991-92 is £855 million. These two planning figures will be subject to review in the annual Survey in the normal way.

3. The settlement will increase Science Budget expenditure in relation to GDP from 0·150 per cent. in 1988-89 to 0·162 per cent. in 1989-90. By 1989-90 the Budget will have increased over the decade by more than 26 per cent. in real terms.

4. The Government's decisions take account of the detailed and persuasive advice submitted by the Board in May and of our policy progressively to redeploy public funds from the support of near-market research—which is properly the responsibility of industry—towards the support of basic and longer term strategic research.

5. The Board's advice covered a wide range of activities. Whilst we have not been able to meet your recommendations in full, the additions I have announced should make possible significant progress in each of the main areas identified by the Board—the reshaping of the science base, and new scientific opportunities. They also have regard to certain programmes to which particular factors apply. These have individually attracted Parliamentary interest and I have informed the House this week of the present position and the implications of this latest settlement. Copies of my statements are enclosed.

6. The Government attaches great importance to each of the two main areas advocated by the Board for high strategic priority; and looks forward to receiving the Board's advice on the detailed distribution of funds for these purposes. In particular I welcome the important start that has been made in establishing Interdisciplinary Research Centres and I hope that similar progress might be possible in 1989-90. For the later years I would invite the Board to take stock and give me further advice next year.

7. I would see it as important, in parallel with this, to sustain and develop the world-class science done in the Research Councils' own establishments, building up their links with higher education institutions. This will call for further reshaping of Councils' own facilities, and I shall look to the Board next year for further advice on the progress being made.

8. Under your other main head—new scientific opportunities—I have, as you will know, already allocated an extra £14 million this year for selective re-equipment, through the Research Councils, the UGC and the Royal Society. The Board will wish to consider what further provision would be right, having regard to the burgeoning scientific opportunities which you have identified as well as to the nation's vitally important need for an adequate supply of highly qualified scientific manpower. My hope and intention is that the scientific community should keep alive that excitement and excellence, particularly in basic science, for which the UK is rightly renowned and which must continue to beckon our able young people if the UK is to benefit as it should from the resources the nation devotes to science.

9. Finally, the detailed figures take account of a number of minor considerations, some of them technical. These include: VAT on construction costs; expenditure on EC research programmes; and possible costs for AFRC arising from reductions in the funding of near-market agricultural research. There is also provision (not included in the figures above) to cover capital expenditure arising as a direct consequence of the sale of PBI assets last year. My assessors will be ready to explain these items to the Board.

10. In view of Parliament's continuing interest in the Science Budget and in the work of the Board I am publishing the text of this letter in a Parliamentary Answer.

DEFENCE

Soldiers' Dress (Northern Ireland)

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps are being taken to improve the dress of soldiers serving in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Freeman: The dress issued to soldiers is kept constantly under review both in terms of quality and suitability. The hon. Member for Colne Valley has recently written to me on this subject and I shall reply shortly.

Territorial Army Recruitment

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the costs of the current territorial publicity recruiting campaign.

Mr. Freeman: The campaign to which the hon. Member refers is not aimed at recruiting but is intended to draw the attention of the public to the status of and the important role played by the volunteer forces in the defence of the country and, in particular, to seek the support of employers. As far as costs are concerned, I draw the attention of the hon. Member to the answer that I gave the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) on 31 October 1988 at column 531.

Private Security Firms

Mr. George: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many private security firms guard his Department's premises; how many guards are involved; and what is the total value of the contracts.

Mr. Sainsbury: The number of security firms currently employed to guard Ministry of Defence premises is 13. The exact number of guards employed under these contracts is variable, but approximately totals 200. The total value of these contracts for the twelve months to 30 September 1988 is of the order of £1·62 million.

NATO (Franco-German Brigade)

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the status of the joint Franco-German brigade within the command structure of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The status of individual military formations and their relationship with NATO are matters for the countries concerned.

RAF Greatworth

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future of RAF Greatworth.

Mr. Freeman: The Ministry of Defence has been considering the future of RAF Greatworth, for which the RAF no longer have a requirement and we are now able to announce that we will make available to the United States Air Force an enclave containing the station's buildings to provide support for the US Air Force main operating base at RAF Upper Heyford. The buildings will be used for personnel accommodation and the storage of non-warlike items such as furniture. That land not required by the United States Air Force will be sold. Historically the signals facilities at RAF Greatworth have played an important role in support of the Royal Air Force and I am pleased that the station will be able to continue to contribute to the defence of this country in this way. I shall be arranging for an appropriate ceremony to take place in due course to mark the handover of the station and to commemorate the station's historical contribution. Representatives of the local community will be invited, including the hon. Member for Daventry.

Tanks

Mr. Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what importance his Department attaches to the infra-red signature from the British, American and German tanks being considered for the British Army; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: All relevant technical factors are being taken into account by my right hon. Friend in considering these matters.

Scientists and Computer Experts (Deaths)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether any United States Government Department has made inquiries about the recent deaths of British defence scientists and computer experts.

Mr. Sainsbury: The MOD has not received any such inquiries.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will hold an inquiry into the recent deaths of defence scientists and computer experts; and if he will publish the findings.

Mr. Sainsbury: No.

Professor Keith Bowden

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what work Professor Keith Bowden carried out for or on behalf of his Department.

Mr. Sainsbury: It is not our policy to disclose details of the work of persons employed by the Ministry of Defence.

AWE Aldermaston

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will state the reasons why AWE Aldermaston was put on alert and warning sirens sounded on 8 November during the morning; whether the warning related to a leak of radioactivity; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I can confirm that an automatic alarm system triggered falsely at the Atomic Weapons Establishment at Aldermaston on Tuesday 8 November. The work force's entry to the area was delayed until it was clear that it was safe. This was the same alarm that triggered falsely on Friday 28 October. On neither occasion was there any leak of radiation.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much he has paid out in compensation to farmers who have had animals infected with bovine spongiform encephalopathy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Up to the end of October 1988, £283,807·50p had been paid in compensation.

Bovine Somatotropin

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food further to his answer on representations received about commercial licensing of bovine somatotropin (BST), Official Report, 19 October, column 874, if he will list in the Official Report the names of those who have written in support of the proposal.

Mr. Donald Thompson: No. I see no purpose in divulging such information.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many social fund officers are employed at each of the social security offices in Downpatrick, Ballynahinch, Newcastle, Kilkeel, Newry and Banbridge.

Mr. Needham: The information at 4 November 1988 was:

Social security office	Number of social fund officers employed

Kilkeel	2
Newry	8
Banbridge	5

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people made application to the social fund; and how many applications were approved and how many were rejected between 11 April and 30 September at the social security offices at Downpatrick, Ballynahinch, Newcastle, Kilkeel, Newry and Banbridge.

Mr. Needham: The information requested is available in the Library.

Family Income Supplement

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people were in receipt of family income supplement between 11 April 1987 and 30 September 1987 at the social security offices in: Downpatrick, Ballynahinch, Newcastle, Kilkeel, Newry and Banbridge; and what was the total payment made during that period.

Mr. Needham: Family income supplement was administered centrally and information is not available in the precise form requested. However, it is estimated that the number of families getting family income supplement on 27 October 1987 in each social security office area was:

	Number
Downpatrick	373
Ballynahinch	136
Newcastle	240
Kilkeel	153
Newry	983
Banbridge	320

The total amount of family income supplement paid in Northern Ireland in the 1987-88 financial year was £14 million. It is not possible to give a breakdown by individual office area or for the period requested.

Housing Benefit

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many Housing Executive tenants are in receipt of housing benefit at the executive offices at Downpatrick, Kilkeel, Newry district 1, Newry district 2, and Banbridge, since 11 April.

Mr. Needham: I am advised by the chairman of the Housing Executive that the figures at 28 October 1988 were as follows:

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he now expects the publication of the Limavady area plan; and if he will indicate the reasons for delay.

Mr. Needham: The Limavady area plan will be adopted before the end of November. Consideration within Government of the Planning Appeals Commission's report on the public inquiry took longer than expected.

Health Care Services (Exports)

Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will make a statement on (a) his plans to export Northern Ireland health care and related services abroad and (b) the likely effect of these plans on health care services in the Province:

(2) if he will make a statement on the implications for hospital services in Belfast of the proposal to export Northern Ireland health and related services abroad;

(3) if he will make a statement on the likely effects on nurses training within Northern Ireland of the plans to market health care services abroad.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 9 November 1988]: Last year's feasibility study by United Medical Enterprises suggested that considerable potential exists in Northern Ireland for the export of health care services. A more detailed follow-up study is now being carried out aimed at matching available resources and expertise to identified markets outside the Province. Since this study will not be completed until February, the information requested is not yet available.

Our objectives are clear however and include the creation of jobs, and the provision of increased experience for those working in the Health Service thus broadening their horizons and enhancing their existing skills. The generation of additional income will benefit services in Northern Ireland.

WALES

Advance Factories

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, how many advance factories there are currently under construction in the Arfon area; what is the square footage of factory space represented by this programme; when they are due to be completed; and what steps he has taken to ensure that current programmes for advance factory building in the Arfon area are likely to be adequate to meet demand from industrialists.

Mr. Peter Walker: The Welsh Development Agency's factory programme in Arfon is at present concentrated on the Parc Menai business complex being developed jointly with the borough council.

It is planned to construct up to 250,000 sq ft of high quality floorspace with the potential to accommodate over 700 jobs. The first two phases of the development for the provision of on-site services are due to be complete by May 1989.

The demand for industrial floorspace in Arfon is reviewed regularly by the agency and taken into account when deciding its property development programme.

Seaside Developments

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what selective investments in developments at seaside resorts in Wales have been made from Government tourism finance; and how much.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Since 1 April 1987 the Wales Tourist Board have offered £1,298,631 of grant assistance to 95 projects in coastal authorities, stimulating £11,428,041 of expenditure and creating 208 jobs. Projects receiving offers of assistance over £10,000 are listed in the Wales Tourist Board's annual review.

Home Help Service

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list for each local authority in Wales the estimated total number of hours received by clients of the home help service for the years 1986-87 and 1987-88.

Mr. Grist: This information is not available centrally. However the following table shows the number of home helps employed by local authorities in Wales in 1986 and 1987:

	1986		as at 30 September 1987
	Number	Whole time equivalent	Number	Whole time equivalent

Hospital Waiting List (Gwent)

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many people are waiting for in-patient treatment in Gwent;

(2) how many people are waiting for urgent in-patient treatment in Gwent.

Mr. Grist: The number of people waiting for in-patient treatment in Gwent hospitals at 31 March 1988 was 8,836 of which 963 are waiting for urgent in-patient treatment. Information on waiting lists for individual specialties was published on 27 October in "Welsh Hospital Waiting List Bulletin 1988 No. 2" a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has to reduce the hospital waiting list in Gwent.

Mr. Grist: Responsibility for the management of waiting lists in Wales rests with district health authorities, within their allocated financial resources. The recurrent revenue provision for Gwent health authority for 1988-89 is some £115 million which represents a growth of 26 per cent. over 1978-79, after taking account of inflation.

As part of the Department's efforts to reduce waiting times, £1 million of additional monies were made available to health authorities in 1988-89 in order to tackle specific problem lists. Gwent health authority was allocated £225,000 of these monies to fund a scheme in trauma and orthopaedics in south Gwent. In addition to the Welsh Office's annual review of all health authorities' performance, including their efforts to tackle waiting lists, officials have recently completed a round of meetings with all health authorities—including Gwent—to discuss their plans for reducing waiting times.

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how long cases for non-urgent in-patient treatment have to wait in Gwent;

(2) how long cases for urgent in-patient treatment have to wait in Gwent.

Mr. Grist: Median waiting time for patients admitted from waiting lists during the calendar year 1987 was 49 days. It is not possible to distinguish between urgent and non-urgent cases.

Detailed information on waiting lists and median waiting times for individual hospitals was published on 27 October in "Welsh Hospital Waiting List Bulletin 1988 No. 2" a copy of which is in the Library.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Iraq

Mr. Alton: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the provision of credit for Iraq.

Mr. Alan Clark: Since 1983 United Kingdom credits to Iraq supported by ECGD have been provided under successive Government-to-Government protocols negotiated annually.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster recently attended the United Kingdom-Iraq joint commission meeting in Baghdad where he signed, on 7 November, a new protocol setting out the arrangements for ECGD-supported credits for contracts to be placed in 1989. These will total £340 million, of which up to £75 million will be used for Iraqi imports of pharmaceuticals, medical appliances, baby food etc., whilst the balance will be used to finance capital projects and imports of machinery and services for the Iraqi development programme.

Outside these arrangements ECGD cover for short term credits on 180-360 day terms continues to be available.

The provision of ECGD support for United Kingdom exports is based on a commercial assessment of the risks involved and is a normal part of our trading relationship with a credit-worthy country.

Upholstery Fabrics

Sir George Young: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has had from the furnishing fabric trade on his proposals to remove on 1 March 1989 the cigarette test exemption for upholstery fabrics.

Mr. Forth: The exemption from the cigarette test in the 1980 regulations was limited to fabrics supplied separately from furniture; this included the "customer's own cover" trade. It has long been regarded as an undesirable loophole. It was therefore decided to include furniture supplied in this way in the scope of the 1988 regulations, which of course include requirements more stringent than the cigarette test. Some representatives of the fabric trade suggested that the exemption could stay, but since they also stated that "customer's own cover" accounts for a growing share of the furniture trade I was unable to consider the suggestion sympathetically.

Sir George Young: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster why he has brought forward from March 1990 to March 1989 the date for removing the cigarette test exemption for upholstered fabrics.

Mr. Forth: The cigarette ignition test in the 1980 regulations is applied to complete items of furniture rather than to fabrics over a standard filling. The great majority of new upholstered furniture sold in this country since 1982 meets the requirement and much information is therefore available about the combinations of cover and filling which pass and fail. It has been generally known in the furniture business for well over a year that new regulations would import the cigarette resistance requirement from the 1980 regulations.

The draft regulations issued for comment in March 1988 applied to all upholstered furniture. The industry needed time to adapt to the new and more stringent requirement for match resistance of covering fabrics, so the March 1990 date has been set for it. But in the interests of safety, the sooner we could reasonably extend the well-known cigarette test to all upholstered furniture, the better; March 1989 was therefore chosen.

Sir George Young: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether he has consulted with trading standards officers, the fire service and representatives of the industry about his proposals to remove the cigarette test exemption for upholstery fabrics by 1 March 1989.

Mr. Forth: Yes.

Balance of Payments

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether he will estimate the balance of payments effects of cross-border acquisitions, mergers and disposals for each year since 1980.

Mr. Alan Clark: The available information relates to the acquisition and disposal of share and loan capital by United Kingdom companies in their foreign subsidiary and associate companies and by foreign companies in their United Kingdom subsidiary and associate companies. The information differs from that published in the article on cross-border acquisitions and mergers in British Business, 28 October, pages 26 to 28 because it includes the acquisition and disposal of associate holdings as well as changes to existing holdings, where a controlling interest already exists. It also excludes transactions in share and loan capital which are indirect, that is, when a United Kingdom company acquires a foreign company through an existing foreign affiliate or when a foreign company acquires a United Kingdom company through an existing United Kingdom affiliate. The information on cross-border acquisitions is available only from 1986 onwards.

There are a number of indirect effects on the balance of payments of these acquisitions and disposals which cannot be quantified separately. They are as follows:

a. The flow of capital into and out of the United Kingdom to raise funds for, or to use the proceeds from, cross-border acquisitions and merger activity.

b. The effects on interest, profits and dividends, credits and debits in the current account of the balance of payments.

c. The effect on visible trade.

The data is as follows.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Entry Visas

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the various types of British entry visas which are available for foreign nationals and their duration and cost, respectively.

Mr. Waldegrave: Listed below are the various types of entry clearance available to Foreign and Commonwealth nationals and their costs:

Visitor, single entry	20
Visitor, double entry	30
Visitor, multiple entry	44
Settlement and other long-term entry clearance	60

Single and double-entry clearances are normally valid for presentation within six months of the date of issue, multiple entry within two years.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many entry visas of each type were issued in 1987; what was the total revenue, respectively; and what contribution this made to costs of issue.

Mr. Waldegrave: A breakdown by type of entry clearances issued overseas is not available for 1987 and 1988 but will be from 1989 onwards. In total 974,312 entry clearances were issued in 1987, including those issued on behalf of the dependent territories and some independent Commonwealth countries.

All the information on reveune and costs is not yet available but we will write to the hon. Member when it is.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the average length of time currently taken to prepare explanatory statements following refusal of entry clearance in (a) Bombay, (b) New Dehli, (c) Karachi, (d) Islamabhad, (e) Dar-Es-Salam and (f) Nairobi.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information sought has been requested from the posts concerned and the hon. Member will receive a letter as soon as possible.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current length of queues for visitors visas in terms of (a) numbers of people and (b) estimated length of time required to process these applications for each of the years 1980 to 1987 inclusive, and for each month of 1988.

Mr. Waldegrave: There are normally no queues for visit-visa applicants applying in their own country, and the large majority are processed speedily. Where a more detailed interview is necessary it can be arranged on the same day at some posts and within three days at most others; though at some posts this period could extend at times of peak demand during the busy summer months.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the number of staff employed in the visa section of posts in (a) Bombay, (b) New Delhi, (c) Karachi, (d) Islamabad and (e) Calcutta, for each year from 1980 to 1987, inclusive and for each month of 1988.

Mr. Waldegrave: Details of the number of established posts in the visa section of our posts at Bombay, New Delhi, Karachi, Islamabad and Calcutta for each year from 1982 to 1987 inclusive are given in the following table. Similar information for previous years is held in a different, non-computerised, format, and could only be supplied at disproportionate cost.

Note

[1] The figures above are based on the staff establishment at the end of each year and do not therefore include United Kingdom-based or locally engaged seasonal reinforcement. Details of such reinforcement could only be supplied at disproportionate cost.

For 1988, details of the number of established posts in the visa section of the posts are given in the table with United Kingdom-based seasonal reinforcement shown in brackets. Details of locally engaged seasonal reinforcement are not readily available and could be supplied only at disproportionate cost.

[2] For period April-October 1988.

In both tables, figures shown on a decimal basis indicate the deployment of staff (also working elsewhere in the post) on a part-time basis in the visa section.

India

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next plans to visit India; and if he will make a statement on current Indo-British relations.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. and learned Friend has visited India on a number of occasions and hopes to do so again, but he has no specific plans for a visit at present. Relations between India and Britain are close, reflecting the substantial and varied links between our two countries. During the past few years there have been some ups and downs in the relationship but latterly a better understanding has been established and our relations are currently good. We are looking for ways to make our co-operation still closer.

Foreign Visitors

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the number of foreign visitors designated as VIP's by his Department in the last 12 months.

Mr. Waldegrave: Between 1 September 1987 and 31 August 1988, which is the most recent period for which figures are available, there were 11,700 VIP movements attributable to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

Chile

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the British ambassador in Santiago last met the representatives of the Chilean democratic opposition Messrs. Aylwin, Lagos and Silva-Cimma.

Mr. Waldegrave: The British ambassador in Santiago is in regular touch with leading members of the Chilean democratic opposition. He also ensures that hon. Members of this House who visit Chile are given every opportunity to meet opposition leaders, many of whom have visited the United Kingdom in the last few years as guests of Her Majesty's Government. Sr. Ricardo Lagos, leader of the Partido Por la Demoracia (PPD), will visit the United Kingdom later this month at the invitation of Her Majesty's Government.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Betting Levy

Mrs. Golding: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has heard from the Horserace Betting Levy Board of the failure of the talks between it and the Bookmakers Committee to reach agreement on the terms of the 28 levy scheme; when he intends to make an adjudication; what principles he will follow in arriving at that adjudication; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to reach a decision on the terms of the 28 levy scheme, in the light of the failure of the Horserace Betting Levy Board and the Bookmakers Committee to reach an agreement; and what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government on the share of betting turnover which bookmakers should contribute to horse racing in order to foster the industry.

Mr. John Patten: The chairman of the Horse race Betting Levy Board informed my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary in a letter of 1 November that the board and the bookmakers' committee had failed to agree the terms on the 28th levy scheme. Under section 1 of the Horserace Betting Levy Act 1969, it therefore falls to my right hon. Friend to determine a new scheme for 1989-90 or to direct that the current scheme shall continue to have effect for that period also, subject to such modifications (if any) as he may specify. Total levy liability is customarily expressed as a proportion of betting turnover. In deciding what that proportion should be in the forthcoming scheme, my right hon. Friend will have regard both to the needs of horseracing and the ability of the bookmakers to pay, a principle which has guided all such previous decisions.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for each of the major horse racing countries the proportion of betting turnover that is levied in order to support the horseracing industry.

Mr. John Patten: I understand from the Horserace Betting Levy Board that under the horserace betting levy scheme levy receipts amount to some 0·88 per cent. of bookmakers' leviable turnover. We are establishing whether there is available directly comparable information about the arrangements in other countries. I shall write to the hon. Member.

M62 (Hazardous Loads)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what special arrangements are made with the local police when transporters carrying nuclear fuel-related loads cross the M62.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The police would not normally be involved in the routine transportation by road of nuclear fuel-related loads. Special arrangements would be made if an escort were required for an abnormally large or slow moving load. I understand that no such escorts have been required in the West Yorkshire police area.

Shipping Forecasts (Long Wave)

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he envisages that the British Broadcasting Corporation will continue to be responsible for broadcasting the shipping forecasts on the long wave.

Mr. Renton: It is for the BBC to decide how best to use the resources (including the radio frequency resources) available to it to carry out its obligations under its Royal charter. Under the Government's proposals for broadcasting legislation the BBC will continue to have allocated to it the national long wave network now used to carry Radio 4. This will therefore continue to be available for shipping forecasts, and I understand that the BBC has no plans to change the present arrangements for broadcasting them.

Prisoners (Statistics)

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what number and proportion of prisoners were (a) employed and (b) engaged in full-time education on the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The most recent figures available are for 1987 and are based on the average number of prisoners employed per weekday in male establishments. They are:

(a) 25,330, which is just over half of the male population and

(b) 6,490, which is approximately one seventh of the male population, and include those on training courses.

These figures should be regarded as approximate. There are no available figures for female establishments.

Data Protection Act (Review)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will list, in a form that cannot jeopardise the advice he may receive from the committee reviewing the Data Protection Act, the number of organisations that have given evidence to the committee, stating whether these organisations represent industry, professional bodies, international institutions, civil libertarian or consumer groups.

Mr. Renton: No organisations have been invited to give evidence to the interdepartmental committee reviewing the Data Protection Act. The committee is awaiting the result of the independent consultation exercise undertaken by the data protection registrar before deciding whether there is need to call for further evidence.

Women Prisoners

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of category A women prisoners held in prisons in the United Kingdom on 31 October.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: There were 4 category A women prisoners held in prisons in England and Wales on 31 October. The position in Scotland and Northern Ireland is respectively the responsibility of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Prison Populations

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the certified prison accommodation and the actual prison population at Wandsworth, Wormwood Scrubs, Brixton and Pentonville, on 31 October.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The information requested is as follows:

	Certified Normal Accommodation	Population
Wandsworth	1,266	1,406
Wormwood Scrubs	[1]1,024	1,030
Brixton	727	1,125
Pentonville	624	812

[1] Less 196 places undergoing refurbishment.

Prisoners (AIDS)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of prisoners being held in prisons in England and Wales who were infected with the HIV virus on 31 October.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: On 31 October 1988 the prison population of England and Wales included 49 inmates reported as having been identified as HIV antibody positive. Two hundred and three such cases had been reported since central monitoring began in March 1985.

Radioactivity (North-West England)

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the civil defence and emergency planning authorities were informed of possible radioactive precipitation in the north-west of England on the night of 28-29 October; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand that radiation readings in the north-west from the national radiation monitoring network (RIMNET) and other sources showed only normal levels of radioactivity; no authorities were therefore alerted.

Pub Bombings (Guildford and Woolwich)

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what dates the most recent representations regarding the Guildford and Woolwich cases were submitted to him.

Mr. John Patten: On 24 October.

Deaf Prisoners

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what arrangements there are for the treatment of deaf people serving prison sentences;

(2) what statistics are available of the numbers of prisoners suffering deafness;

(3) what facilities are provided for prisoners who suffer deafness;

(4) what training is given to prison staff for communicative assistance with deaf prisoners.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The most recent survey identified 45 completely or profoundly deaf people in the prison population of England and Wales on 31 January 1987, and indicated that 62 had come to the notice of prison medical officers during the 12 months up to that date. The treatment regime for such prisoners is a matter for the medical officer to determine in the light of the circumstances or the individual case and the facilities available at the establishment and in the local community.

The medical officer is able to call upon the specialist services of the NHS and other local statutory and non-statutory services. Staff training in communication skills is not routinely given because of the small number and wide scatter of prisoners with severe hearing problems.

Immigration (District Office, Liverpool)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the date on which the new district nationality office in Liverpool was officially opened to transact and process applications.

Mr. Renton: The Liverpool nationality office opened on 22 August 1988.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of persons employed in the new Liverpool district office.

Mr. Renton: On 7 November 1988, 123.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of persons employed originally at Lunar house, Croydon, who have been transferred to the Liverpool district office.

Mr. Renton: Seven.

Minister of State (Private Office)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of persons employed in the Private Office of the Minister of State, dealing with immigration matters in 1986, 1987 and currently.

Mr. Renton: The people working in my private office deal with all the subjects within my responsibility, including immigration matters. From 1 January 1986 the total number of people employed in my office was 8. Ten were employed from 1 April 1986, 9 from 1 January 1987, 7 from 1 January 1988, and 8 from 1 November 1988.

Group 4 (Holding Centre Contract)

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what experience the company Group 4 had demonstrated in running a secure holding centre or prisons prior to being offered the contract for Harmondsworth holding centre;

(2) what procedure is followed to vet the staff of private security firms who work at Harmondsworth holding centre; and how these (a) were applied to Securicor employees and (b) will be applied to Group 4 employees;

(3) what measures will be taken to ensure that a smooth changeover of management will be secured at Harmondsworth holding centre when Securicor hand over the running to Group 4;

(4) what were his reasons for deciding (a) to terminate the contract between the Home Office and Securicor for the management and staffing of Harmondsworth holding centre and (b) to award the contract to Group 4;

(5) how many of those held at Harmondsworth holding centre have escaped in the time that it has been under the management of Securicor.

Mr. Renton: The contract for the provision of Group 4 staff at the Harmondsworth, Heathrow, Gatwick and Manchester immigration detention units was awarded to the company following receipt of competitive tenders. The decision took account of a number of factors, including value for money and a detailed evaluation of the company's ability to provide the high quality of service specified.

The nature of the contract is unique in the United Kingdom and only Securicor Ltd. has so far had direct experience in this area. But Group 4 is a company of high standing. The tendering exercise enabled it to demonstrate satisfactorily its ability to provide a reliable service. Both Securicor Ltd. and Group 4 Total Security Ltd are members of the British Security Industry Association which lays down rigorous recruitment and vetting standards. Both companies fully meet those standards, including the vetting of candidates over a period extending back 20 years.

A series of meetings has been arranged between immigration service officials and senior managers within both Securicor and Group 4 to ensure a smooth transition. These discussions and detailed arrangements are progressing well. Responsibility for managing the detention units will not alter as a result of the change in contractor; that will remain firmly with the Home Office.

In 1987, 78 persons absconded from immigration service detention units; in 1988 up to 31 October the figure is 75. Figures for earlier years are not readily available. These details were not included in the factors taken into account when awarding the contract of Group 4.

Immigration Cases (Ministerial Discussions)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions immigration cases have been discussed by hon. and right hon. Members with the Minister of State at the Home Department; and what is the total number of hours these meetings have lasted for the years 1980 to 1987 inclusive, and for each month for 1988.

Mr. Renton: I see hon. and right hon. Members frequently, both in the Home Office and the House, to discuss immigration cases. Statistics for the number of meetings held in the years 1980 to 1987 are not available. About 48 meetings have been held in the Home Office from 1 January 1988 to 10 November: 4 in January, 8 in February, 8 in March, 4 in April, 5 in May, 5 in June, 4 in July, 2 in August, 3 in September, 1 in October and 4 in November. The length of meetings is not recorded.

Prison Service (Recruits)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of new recruits to the prison service in Britain for each of the years 1985, 1986 and 1987 and to the latest available date in 1988.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The information requested, for England and Wales only, is as follows:

	Prison Officers
1 April 1985-31 March 1986	997
1 April 1986-31 March 1987	934

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average time it takes to recruit prison officers from receipt of first application to the time of training.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: About nine months. The time taken in individual cases depends on a number of factors, including the availability of personal and employers' references and the timing of training courses. It is at present lengthening, because the number of suitable applicants exceeds the service's immediate requirements for new recruits.

Prisons

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list each prison in Britain by name stating (a) the number of persons they were built to hold and (b) the number of persons currently held at these prisons.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The information requested is set out in the table. The certified normal accommodation and population in respect of each prison service establishment are shown at on 4 November 1988, the most recent date for which details are available.

Television Licences (Pensioners)

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many pensioners qualify for concessionary television licences; and what is the cost.

Mr. Renton: About 786,000 pensioners and disabled people benefit from the concessionary television licence, at a cost of about £30 million a year in terms of licence revenue forgone. Most are pensioners, but separate records are not kept showing the breakdown between them and the disabled.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what would be the cost of extending concessionary television licences to all pensioners.

Mr. Renton: The cost of extending the £5 concessionary television licence to all pensioner households would be about £340 million a year in terms of licence revenue forgone.

Prisoners (Police Custody)

Mr. Wells: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners were being held in police custody in England and Wales on the most recent date for which figures are available; what was the number at the beginning of October in the current year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: On 4 October 1,917 prisoners were held in police custody in England and Wales; by 10 November the number had fallen to 1,223 a reduction of 694. This reduction has been brought about by the recent suspension of industrial action at those local prisons where branches of the Prison Officers' Association were refusing to accept prisoners from the police. Numbers will continue to fall as those prisons build up to capacity and as more of the extra prison places which I undertook in March to provide throughout this year are delivered. For example, Ashford remand centre re-opened on 9 November, and will provide 400 places for prisoners who would otherwise have been held in police cells. This, together with other place-producing measures which we have in hand, enables us to prepare to close the temporary prisons at Army camps on Salisbury plain and at Camberley before the end of the year as planned. Rollestone camp will close today and Alma Dettingen barracks on 15 December.

EMPLOYMENT

Unemployment Benefit

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment for each employment service region, how many claimants have been referred to the unemployment benefit service due to availability doubts each month between May and September.

Mr. Lee: This information is not available in the form requested. Questions concerning a person's availability for work may arise following any interview with an employment service official, and records of all such instances are not kept.

However, the table gives figures by employment service region for the number of cases which were referred, following initial claims made in unemployment benefit offices, to the independent adjudicating authorities for a decision on a claimant's availability.

Adult Training Scheme

Mr. Ray Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to his answer of 18 April to the hon. Member for Ogmore, Official Report, column 310, what are the criteria for paying supplementary grants in connection with the new adult training scheme.

Mr. Nicholls: Supplementary grants are to assist in the provision of higher cost training, including project-based training.

Effective delivery of employment training requires negotiations on levels of supplementary grants to take account of the local client group and labour market needs. Training agency officials take into consideration these factors as well as any extra requirements and additional costs being borne by training managers. Local conditions therefore dictate the level of supplementary grant offered to training managers.

SCOTLAND

General Practitioners (Women)

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the percentage of general practitioners giving unrestricted medical practice who are women.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: At 1 October 1987, the latest date for which this information is available, 23 per cent. of all general medical practitioners providing unrestricted general medical services were women.

Winget-type Houses

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will allocate additional resources to Glasgow district council to enable it to tackle the particular problems affecting the 998 Winget-type of houses in the Carnutyne area; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It is for the district council to determine the priority it attaches to improving its Winget-type houses, to include this work in its capital programme according to that priority, and to determine how it uses the capital allocation made available to it. We shall consider carefully the proposals that the council includes in its programme for next year which has only recently been submitted to the Scottish Development Department.

Education Department (Staffing Review)

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will specify the staffing to be made available to deal with disciplinary matters subsequent to the Scottish Education Department's recently published staffing review.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The non-teaching time required for such duties was among the factors taken into account in arriving at the staffing formula for secondary schools. I am currently considering comments received on a draft circular about staffing provision in schools.

Special Education (Nursery Nurses)

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the total number of nursery nurses employed in special education in each of the past five years, giving a breakdown by regional education authority, division and type of school.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The numbers employed in education authority special schools and departments at September 1983, 1984 and 1987 are set out in the table. Figures for 1985 and 1986 and for individual types of school are not available.

SSHA Houses (Ettrick and Lauderdale)

Mr. Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether, pursuant to his commitment, Official Report, 11 January, column 45, that there would never be any compulsion on any individual Scottish Special Housing Association tenant, he will make a statement explaining why the factoring of all Scottish Special Housing Association houses in the district of Ettrick and Lauderdale has been transferred from the district council housing department to the Waverley housing trust, without any prior consultation with the tenants affected or the district council; and if he will publish the names of the trustees of this body to whom this responsibility is being transferred, and the price being paid to them for this service.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Scottish Special Housing Association has agreed in principle to enter into arrangements with Waverley housing trust only for the factoring of its stock in Ettrick and Lauderdale district. Changes in factoring or management arrangements are entirely a matter for the association. The association has statutory responsibilities as landlord towards its tenants and it is for the landlord to make appropriate management arrangements so that these obligations are fulfilled. It is not customary to consult tenants on such matters.

The proposed arrangement between SSHA and Waverley housing trust does not include a commitment on future purchase of the housing stock. Any such proposals would be a matter for the SSHA or Scottish Homes in the first instance but would also require the consent of the Secretary of State for Scotland. Such consent would be withheld unless the principles set out in the guidelines by the Scottish Development Department on voluntary disposals of stock by local authorities were properly reflected. In particular my right hon. and learned Friend would be concerned to be assured that the tenants had been fully consulted in accordance with the provisions set out in clause 135 of the Housing Bill currently before Parliament.

These arrangements will provide important safeguards for the interests of secure tenants of local authorities, SSHA or Scottish Homes, as the case may be.

Since the detailed arrangements in relation to the management contract are a matter for the SSHA and the Waverley housing trust has not yet been formally established, I have no precise information on the names of the trustees. I understand that Michael Ancram has been invited to be chairman, and that five tenants, two local councillors, other local community representatives and a representative of the financial institutions will be invited to serve.

On the price of the service I refer the right hon. Gentleman to my reply to the question from the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) on Thursday 3 November 1988, at column 755.

NHS Property (Sale)

Mr. Allan Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has any plans to change the current arrangements governing the sale of surplus National Health Service property; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Following discussions yesterday with the chairmen of health boards, I have decided that health boards will retain the total proceeds from the disposal of land and property, during a strictly finite period ending in March 1991. This will give further encouragement for health boards to rationalise their property in the interests of reducing costs and improving health care.

Sheriff and District Courts

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what the average period was between pleading and trial diets in sheriff and district courts in Scotland for each year since 1984.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Information on the average periods between pleading and trial diets in the sheriff courts is given in the table. I regret that similar information for district courts is not held centrally.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In 1987, 94,022 persons were called to court in district courts in Scotland.

Procurators Fiscal (Police Reports)

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many reports submitted by the police to procurators fiscal were marked for 'no proceedings' in each fiscaldom in Scotland for the whole of 1987 and to the most recently available date in 1988.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The figures are set out in the table. Only the figures for January to September inclusive are available for 1988.

Court Cases

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he or the Lord Advocate has now sought information regarding reasons for cases being marked for 'no proceedings' by the procurators fiscal.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Reasons for cases being marked for no proceedings are regularly sought both in relation to individual cases and procurator fiscal service work loads.

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many witnesses were cited for cases that adjourned without proceedings in (a) Edinburgh district, (b) Glasgow district, (c) Hamilton district and (d) Dunfermline district in June;

(2) how many witnesses were cited for cases that adjourned without proceedings in: (a) Edinburgh Sheriff Court, (b) Glasgow Sheriff Court, (c) Hamilton Sheriff Court and (d) Dunfermline Sheriff Court in June.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not readily available and cannot be obtained except at disproportionate cost.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Income Support

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the payment of income support in respect of people in board and lodging, residential care and hostel accommodation.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: From April 1989, people in ordinary board and lodging accommodation will be eligible to claim housing benefit for help with their accommodation costs. On payments to people in hostel accommodation, I refer the hon. Member to my hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) on 27 October at column 337.

The present arrangements to pay income support to people in residential care and nursing homes will continue from April 1989. The longer term future of the funding of people in residential care is being considered by the Government in the context of Sir Roy Griffiths' report on community care.

Correspondence

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will reply to the letter sent to him on 12 April from Mr. J. Latham, of 199 Middlewich street, Crewe.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: A reply was sent to the hon. Member on 13 May.

Family Credit

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he has any proposals to improve the response time of the family credit unit in Blackpool.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker) on 9 November at column 222.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the target turn around time for claimants of the family credit unit in Blackpool.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Eighteen working days from date of receipt of the claim to date of the decision.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claims are awaiting settlement grant at the family credit unit in Blackpool.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: On 4 November, the latest date for which information is available, 56,400 claims were undecided. Of these 36,400 were awaiting the outcome of inquiries to the claimant for further information or to employers about earnings.

Residential Care Allowance

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received concerning the level of residential care allowance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have received representations from hon. Members, interested organisations and individuals, both before and after the announcement of the new limits for April 1989. Details of this uprating were given on 27 October in the schedule published by my right hon. Friend at columns 478-484 and in my hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) at column 337.

Pensioners

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the number of persons in receipt of state pensions in the parliamentary constituencies of (a) Leicester, East, (b) Leicester, West, (c) Leicester, South, (d) Rutland and Melton, (e) Blaby, (f) Leicestershire, North-West and (g) Market Harborough.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Information is not available about the number of retirement pension recipients in any particular locality.

Benefits

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the reduction in public expenditure in the current financial year as a result of reduction in entitlement to benefits since 1978; and how much of this has been targeted on raising the real level of benefit to those whom the Government want to help financially.

Mr. Scott: It is not possible to estimate the cumulative impact of the many changes to social security benefits which have been made since 1978, not least because of the major restructuring of income-related benefits in April this year. However, between 1978-79 and 1988-89 social security spending increased by over £31 billion, an increase of 33 per cent. in real terms. Around one third of this increase was due to improvements in the average amounts of benefit paid to claimants.

Low-income Families

Mr. Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received concerning the extra financial assistance he proposes to give mothers and families with low incomes during the next financial year.

Mr. Nicholas Scott: Commentators have generally welcomed the substantial additional resources that we are directing toward families in the greatest need. This help will be to the greater benefit of up to 3 million children in lower income families.

Attendance Allowance

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when Lynda McQuillan of 22 Helendale avenue, Fold Estate, Birkenhead will receive a final decision from the attendance allowance board of her claim number BT 147639D lodged in May 1987.

Mr. Nicholas Scott [holding answer 8 November 1988]: The attendance allowance board has completed its review of Miss McQuillan's case and its decision will be sent to her within the next seven days. I regret the delay in dealing with this case and I am writing to the hon. Member.

Attendance and Mobility Allowance

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people are currently being denied the disability or higher pensioner premium to income support because they do not meet the age or residence test attached to the passport benefits of attendance and mobility allowance.

Mr. Scott [holding answer 10 November 1988]: I regret that information is not available. However it is not possible for a claimant to have been denied the disability premium or the higher pensioner premium because he does not satisfy the age test for attendance allowance; that allowance has no upper age limit. Those who fail the age test for mobility allowance may qualify for attendance allowance and receive the premiums on that ground. The number of claimants who fail to satisfy the residence test for attendance and mobility allowance is estimated to be very small.

ENERGY

Conservation

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the level of Government spending on energy conservation over the past five years.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The expenditure by the energy efficiency office over the last five years is as follows:

	£ million
1983-84	11·4
1984-85	17·5
1985-86	22·5
1986-87	24·5
1987-88	18·6

The programmes of a number of other Government Departments also contribute to the improvement of energy efficiency, but in most cases the energy efficiency element is not identified separately. However figures are available for the homes insulation scheme, operated by the Department of the Environment, under which expenditure over the same period was as follows:

	£ million
1983-84	22·5
1984-85	25·3
1985-86	28·0
1986-87	26·5
1987-88	[1]21·6

HEALTH

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will take steps to ensure that advertisements in future recruitment campaigns for nurses in the National Health Service show both black and white nurses and potray them performing similar tasks; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will issue guidelines to health authorities to the effect that racial discrimination should be treated as unprofessional and punishable; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what steps he takes to ensure that young black women are encouraged into the nursing profession; what information he has about the current percentage of registered general nurse trainees that are black and about the relative numbers of black and white nurses who are directed towards state enrolled nurse and state registered nurse training, respectively; what steps are taken to ensure that arduous and unpopular nursing jobs are allocated, and promotions made, on a non-racial basis; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The Department's nurse recruitment advertisements are filmed in NHS hospitals using local nurses. Although we try to include nurses of various ethnic groups this depends on the availability of suitable staff in the particular location who are willing to appear in the advertisement. The Department's nursing careers publicity material does include nursing and midwifery staff from a number of ethnic groups.

Health authorities are producing careers leaflets in a variety of languages depending on local needs with the aim of encouraging people from their local ethnic groups to consider nursing as a career. Next year the Department will be producing for use by health authorities in local campaigns a nursing careers video specifically for ethnic minority groups. A video "Nursing For All—Career Opportunities for the Asian Community" has been produced by the Royal Society of Medicine for the Spitalfields task force with funding from a number of bodies including the Department. The aim of this video, which is available in five Asian languages, is to convince Asian families that nursing is a worthwhile, rewarding career.

Information is not available centrally about the ethnic origins of students or nursing staff.

Health authorities,which have been sent guidance in the Department's circular HC (78)36 and who are in receipt of the Commission for Racial Equality's code of practice, are well aware of their duties and responsibilities under the Race Relations Act 1976, and also of the role of the Commission and other bodies in dealing with alleged cases of discrimination. Our main concern now must be to identify the most effective means of encouraging and helping authorities to develop and implement policies of equal opportunities. That is why we support the work of the King's fund task force on racial equality in the NHS, whose model policy document, published in July of last year, was commended by the then Minister for Health my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newton) in a letter sent to all health authority chairmen. Further guidance and support is, I understand, in the pipeline. In the circumstances I see no need at present for the issue of additional guidance by the Department.

Smoking

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the effects of the new advertising campaign mounted by Gallaher's linking bread with smoking on the national anti-smoking campaign.

Mrs. Currie: None. The advertisement is within the current guidelines.

QED Campaign

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has as to the expected cost to the local health authority of the QED campaign which has been launched by the Leicester general hospital.

Mr. Mellor: Costs of local campaigns are a matter for the district health authority and the hon. Member may care to write to Mr. Farnham, the chairman of Leicestershire health authority, for the information that he seeks.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has as to the number of hospitals that have launched QED campaigns similar to that recently launched by Leicester general hospital and as to the amount of money expected to be saved.

Mr. Mellor: We do not collect such information centrally.

Mental Health Services

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his policy with respect to retaining overall responsibility for the care of people with mental illness within the National Health Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: We have no plans to change the responsibility for care of people with mental illness within the National Health Service. Proposals for improvement of the service in the community have been put to Ministers by Sir Roy Griffiths and our response will be made as soon as possible.

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his policy with regard to funds released from the run-down of large psychiatric hospitals being used within the National Health Service for the development of mental health services; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: Health authorities are asked to ensure that, generally, the proceeds of the sale of psychiatric hospital property are spent on the development of psychiatric services. Revenue and capital savings by changes in the operation of hospitals continuing in use are deployed by health authorities as they judge best in local circumstances.

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on his policy on health districts providing a wide range of residential accommodation for mentally ill persons planned according to local needs; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: Every health district should ensure the provision of a comprehensive range of services for mentally ill people, planned according to local needs. These services are likely to include residential care homes, nursing homes and hostels. The responsibility for providing these services rests with district health authorities and local authority social services departments, working in collaboration with the voluntary and private sectors.

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many psychiatric services have a voluntary help organiser; what measures he proposes to take to encourage the increase of voluntary help organisers; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: I regret that we do not hold information centrally on the number of voluntary help organisers, whose responsibilities are not necessarily restricted to a particular specialty. It is for health authorities to determine the number of organisers needed, but long-standing departmental guidance encourages their appointment as an effective means of developing and co-ordinating voluntary help in hospitals.

Medical Negligence

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many complaints alleging medical negligence were received by each regional health authority in England in the years 1984-85 to 1986-87; and what outcomes have been recorded.

Mr. Mellor: We do not hold such information centrally.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what proportion of the total cost of awards to victims of medical accidents was met by the National Health Service; and what proportion by medical defence organisations, in each of the years 1984-85, 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(2) if he will list the total expenditure on legal costs incurred (a) by the National Health Service as a whole, (b) by the hospital and community health service and (c) by the family practitioner service in defending cases brought by the victims of medical accidents for each of the years 1984-85, 1985-86 and 1986-87.

Mr. Mellor: We do not hold centrally information on awards to victims of medical accidents in respect of health authorities in England.

The legal costs incurred by health authorities in such cases are treated as an administrative expense and are not separately identified in the annual accounts submitted to the Department.

In the case of family practitioner services, general medical practitioners, as well as other family practitioners, are independent contractors and as such are individually responsible for any actions or claims arising from the services provided by them. Any costs arising from defending such actions, and the cost of any awards made, are therefore a matter for the family practitioner concerned.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many complaints alleging medical negligence were received by the family practitioner service in each of the years 1984-85, 1985-86 and 1986-87; and what outcomes were recorded.

Mr. Mellor: Family doctors are independent contractors and complaints alleging medical negligence are for settlement between the doctor and the aggrieved party. Family practitioner committees have no power to investigate allegations of medical negligence but can investigate complaints that a doctor has failed to comply with his terms of service in providing general medical services.

FP10 Forms

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many FP10 forms have been issued by general practitioners in each of the last 10 years;

(2) how many FP10 forms were submitted to chemists and other dispensaries in each of the last 10 years.

Mrs. Currie: I regret that we do not hold information on the number of FP10 forms issued by general practitioners. The number of forms sent by chemist contractors in England to the Prescription Pricing Authority were as follows:

Year	Number of forms (millions)
1978	186·5
1979	184·0
1980	183·7
1981	181·1
1982	186·7
1983	188·5
1984	190·8
1985	191·6
1986	192·2
1987	198·0

These figures exclude prescriptions dispensed by doctors.

Mr. George Farnham

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those right hon. and hon. Members he consulted before re-appointing Mr. George Farnham as chairman of the Leicestershire district health authority.

Mr. Mellor: There is no legal requirement to consult. However, before Mr. Farnham and a number of other health authority chairmen were appointed or reappointed from 1 April 1988, the then Minister for Health, my right hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newton) invited nominations from all hon. Members in his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) on 23 July at column 491.

Dental Services

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he will publish in the Official Report a table for each financial year since 1973 and his estimate for the current year of the number of dental treatments carried out under the National Health Service, the number charged, the cost of the treatment and the proportion paid by the patient and the number of free treatments for (a) children, (b) pensioners and (c) other beneficiaries together with the numbers qualifying for such treatment and the cost; and what is his estimate of the average number of treatments given to a married manual worker, his wife and two children, together with the amount charged for such treatment.

Mrs. Currie: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Motor Neurone Disease

Sir John Farr: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what have been the amounts of public money spent on research into motor neurone disease in each of the past three years; and what plans there are to expand this research.

Mr. Jackson: I have been asked to reply. The main agency through which the Government support medical research is the Medical Research Council, which receives its grant in aid from the Department of Education and Science.

Funding from the Medical Research Council for research specifically into motor neurone disease over the past three years was:

1985-86	219,235
1986-87	31,206
1987-88	137,682

In addition, the Medical Research Council, and to a smaller extent the Science and Engineering Research Council, support a range of basic research which may be of relevance to motor neurone disease. Some support for research in this area is also provided through UGC block grants to universities.

The research councils determine their own scientific priorities. They are always willing to consider soundly based scientific proposals for funding in competition with other applications.

Radioactivity

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the implications to public health of the increase in airborne radioactivity in the north-west of England on the night of 28-29 October; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: I have nothing further to add to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment on 10 November.

Patient Statistics

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give, for each district health authority, the percentage increase or decrease since 1982 in the number of patients treated each year, giving for each district health authority its ranking in England.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 31 October 1988]: The information requested has now been placed in the Library.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Pensions

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the total number of persons in Government service, of all kinds, national and local who will be eligible for index linked pensions; how many such persons have already left government service and received index linked pensions; and how much these pensions cost for 1975, 1979, 1984 and 1988.

Mr. Brooke: Under the Social Security Provisions Act 1975 public service pensions are uprated in line with state earnings-related pensions. Total numbers in public service schemes covered by these arrangements amount to 3·9 million, including the Civil Service, armed forces, NHS, teachers, police, fire and local government.

For the centrally administered schemes the numbers in receipt of such pensions and their total cost in 1984 and 1988 were as follows:

	Number of Pensioners	Cost £
At 5 April 1988
Civil Service	375,981	1,063,798,810
National Health	264,939	680,418,359
Teachers	223,473	997,361,797
Armed Forces	156,939	572,473,764
At 5 April 1984
Civil Service	338,245	801,344,916
National Health	225,353	490,094,220
Teachers	190,011	715,141,627
Armed Forces	161,549	453,081,016

No information is available before 1980.

For the devolved schemes—police, fire and local authority—information on those in receipt of pensions is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the tax yield from taxing (a) the income of pension funds at the basic rate of tax and (b) the employee's pension contributions at a rate equal to the difference between the employee's marginal rate and the standard rate in respect of that part of the contribution which exceeds the threshold for higher rate tax when it is aggregated with the contributors' income for tax purposes.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The estimated direct revenue cost of relief on the investment income of occupational pension funds in 1988-89, assuming relief at the basic rate of tax is £4,400 million. The information requested in part (b) is not available.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of (a) the value of actual and notional pension contributions in the current financial year of the state and other kinds of pensions schemes detailed in paragraph 5 of the Inland Revenue consultative document issued in September 1983 (b) the value of the pensions paid under such schemes and (c) the amount of tax payable in each case assuming, in the case of disbursements, that the pensioner has no other income.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Information for the current financial year in the detail requested is not available. Table 4.10 of the United Kingdom national accounts gives information on contributions to funded, notionally funded and unfunded pension schemes and Business Monitor MQ5 for Quarter 2 1987 provides information on self-administered pension funds.

Distributional data on which to estimate the figure requested in part (c) are not available.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table bringing up to date for the current financial year the calculations in appendix B to the paper by the Inland Revenue on the cost of tax reliefs for pension schemes issued in September 1983.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 3 November 1988]: The available information is as follows:

£ million

	Estimated direct revenue cost 1988-89
	Funded	Notionally funded or unfunded	All schemes
Employees' contribution to occupational pension schemes allowed as a deduction for income tax purposes	1,300	400	1,700
Basic rate tax relief on occupation pension funds' investment income	4,400	—	4,400
Exemption of lump sum (assuming relief at the basic rate)	n/a	n/a	1,100
Income tax paid on occupational pensions in payment	n/a	n/a	2,400

n/a = not available.

The information will enable the costs of approaches I, III and IV in the paper to be derived. The remaining information required for approach II and the 1983 "existing method" is not readily available.

Tax Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for the single and for one-earner and two-earner married couples, the number of tax units in each income band above and below this level.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I regret that the hon. Member's question contains insufficient information for a reply to be given.

Age Allowance

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Government propose to abolish the age allowance for income tax purposes to provide revenue for an increase in benefit for the needy aged.

Mr. Norman Lamont: No. Age allowance helps to keep some two thirds of elderly households with lower incomes out of income tax.

Invisible Trade

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for each year since 1980 the net results of Britain's invisible trade on a balance of payments basis both in total and distinguishing between services, interests, profits, dividends and transfers.

Mr. Major: The figures requested can be found in table 1.1 of the 1988 edition of the "United Kingdom Balance of Payments", (the CSO's "Pink Book").

They are presented in the following table:

£ million

	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985	1986	1987
Balance on:
Services	3,949	3,923	2,762	3,721	3,941	5,962	5,618	5,638

Total invisibles	1,769	3,586	2,467	4,907	6,602	5,683	8,517	7,658

Press Briefing

Mr. Sedgemore: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if his meeting with journalists on Friday about future plans for pensions was recorded by tape or other means; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if meetings he has with journalists from the press lobby are recorded; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place a copy of the tape recording of his briefing with journalists on 4 November in the Library.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what record was kept by his staff of the briefing he gave to Sunday newspaper correspondents on 4 November; whether it is intended to bring the record of the exchanges at that meeting officially in to the public domain; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) whether, pursuant to his oral answers of 7 November, Official Report, columns 22-27, he will publish in the Official Report a verbatim record of his briefing to journalists on Friday 4 November;

(2) whether, pursuant to his oral answers of 7 November, Official Report, columns 22-27, he will deposit in the Library a transcript of any tape recording made of his briefing to journalists on Friday 4 November;

(3) whether, pursuant to his oral answers of 7 November, Official Report, columns 22-27, he will publish in the Official Report a summary of his briefing to journalists on Friday 4 November in so far as it related to future targetting of benefits.

Mr. Lawson: I regret that no tape-recording or transcript of the briefing exists. I have nothing to add to the information I gave the House on 7 November.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if any of his staff have contacted the newspapers or the correspondents who attended the briefing on 4 November, regarding the articles which had appeared on 6 November on benefits for pensioners;

(2) if the chief information officer or any of his assistants contacted on 4 or 5 November the correspondents who had attended the briefing he gave on 4 November; and if he will make a statement;

(3) which correspondents from Sunday newspapers attended the briefing he gave on 4 November, and which officials;

(4) if he intends to continue to give briefings to correspondents of the Sunday newspapers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lawson: It is not the practice to publish details of ministerial or departmental contacts with the press.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has made any official complaint to the secretary of the press gallery regarding the articles on benefits for pensioners which appeared in the Sunday newspapers on 6 November; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will list those statements made in the press on 6 November which misrepresented his statements made to journalists at a briefing on 4 November, to which he referred to in his answer of 7 November, Official Report, column 26.

Mr. Lawson: I have nothing to add to what I said in the House on 7 November at column 21-27.

National Debt

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much of the national debt was repaid in 1987-88; what was the total amount outstanding at 31 March; how much he estimates will be repaid this year; and how long it would take for the whole sum to be repaid if annual repayments of £10 billion were made with effect from 1988-89.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer, 1 November 1988]: Public sector debt repayment in 1987-88 was £3.6 billion. The net debt of the public sector outstanding at 31 March 1988 was £171.3 billion. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor estimates that some £10 billion of public sector debt will be repaid in 1988-89.

Leaving aside any capital gains or losses which might occur to the values of marketable public debt, and which are inevitably uncertain, then annual repayments of £10 billion would eliminate net public debt in approximately 17 years.

EC (Investment)

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is Her Majesty's Government's estimate, in pounds sterling, of the value (i) of direct investment and (ii) portfolio investment in the United Kingdom from the rest of the EEC in each financial year from 1981 to the latest available year; and what is the corresponding value of such investment by the United Kingdom in the rest of the EEC.

Mr. Lawson [holding answer 8 November 1988]: Estimates of direct investment flows between the United Kingdom and EEC are available up to 1986 in British Business, but only on a calendar year basis. These are reproduced in table 1.

Estimates of United Kingdom portfolio investment in the EEC and of EEC portfolio investment in the United Kingdom are incomplete and not separately published. However, table 10.1 of the CSO "Pink Book" publishes estimates of total direct and portfolio investment flows between the United Kingdom and EEC, to the extent that these are available.

Table 1

Direct investment flows between United Kingdom and EEC

£ million

	United Kingdom investment in EEC	EEC investment in United Kingdom
1981	223	12
1982	−96	171
1983	−95	434
1984	−212	−2,073
1985	2,619	1,319
1986	2,472	2,338

Note: Figures prior to 1984 exclude oil companies.

Tax Fraud

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much unpaid tax was recovered, as a result of tax fraud investigations from (a) individuals and (b) companies in each of the past five years.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 4 November 1988]: The tax recovered was:

£ million

	(a) Individuals	(b) Companies
1983-84	280	41
1984-85	334	50
1985-86	345	67
1986-87	378	63
1987-88	421	74

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the cost and how many people were employed by his Department in pursuing tax fraud in each of the past five years relating to individual tax payers and to companies.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 4 November 1988]: The cost and staff employed in pursuing tax fraud were as follows:

	Individuals		Companies
	Cost (£m)	Staff (Units)	Cost (£m)	Staff (Units)
1983-84	26·8	1,540	7·5	295
1984-85	27·9	1,950	8·0	300
1985-6	28·9	2,015	7·9	275
1986-7	30·0	2,075	8·2	270
1987-88	33·2	2,300	9·2	300

TRANSPORT

Road Fund

Mr. Leadbitter: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the latest available total for road fund tax collected; and what was the amount spent on road repairs and new road provision, respectively, for the same period.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The estimated net revenue for England in the current financial year for road fund tax is £2·3 billion. The provision for national and local road construction and maintenance in England in the current financial year is about £2·9 billion.

Drink-Driving

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give details of the number of road and transport drink-related accidents in Stoke on Trent, giving the most recent figures and the annual figures for the last five years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The only information available on drinking and driving at a local authority level is the number of accidents where a driver has been given a roadside breath test, and failed it. We cannot break down the information on the blood alcohol level of drivers killed to give local authority figures. We know that there are drivers who for various reasons are not given a breath test, some of whom would probably have failed the test.

Given these limitations, and defining a "drink/drive accident" as one where at least one of the drivers or riders involved has been given a roadside breath test and failed it, the provisional accident data for the Stoke-on-Trent local authority area for the period January to July 1988, the latest period for which figures are available, show that 600 personal injury accidents occurred, of which 21 were drink/drive accidents. Comparable data for the last five years are given in the following table:

Accidents: Stoke-on-Trent local authority area: 1983-87

	Fatal	Serious	Slight	Total
1983
A	19	252	923	1,194
B	2	22	47	71
C	10·5	8·7	5·1	5·9
1984
A	19	230	1,022	1,271
B	2	17	48	67
C	10·5	7·4	4·7	5·3
1985
A	13	251	936	1,200
B	1	16	50	67
C	7·7	6·4	5·3	5·6
1986

B	0	11	39	50
C	0·0	5·8	4·1	4·3

A = total accidents.
B = drink-drive accidents.
C = B as a percentage of A.

Southern National Ltd.

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations his Department has had from Southern National Ltd. regarding public service vehicle tests in the western traffic area; whether the present arrangements are able to provide tests in less than six weeks from bookings being made; and what proposals he has for improvement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: At the company's request, the clerk to the Traffic Commissioner is meeting Southern National Ltd. on 23 November to discuss arrangements for PSV driving tests in the western traffic area.

Forward booking dates for PSV and HGV tests, including appointments reserved under advance provisional booking arrangements, range from three weeks at Plymouth to nine weeks at Poole. The average forward booking date is five and a half weeks.

We aim to provide tests within four weeks at all centres. Three additional permanent examiners are being trained for appointment to the western traffic area before the end of the year. A further two posts have been approved—one at Poole and one at Taunton.

Vehicle Wheels (Safety)

Mr. Faulds: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what examination he is making of the problems of accidents arising from wheels coming loose or falling off lorries or buses with twinned coned fixed wheels; and if he intends to introduce regulations to require the adoption of flat nuts with coned washers.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Wheel security on commercial vehicles has been the subject of recent research by the Motor Industry Research Association, sponsored by the Institute of Road Transport Engineers and the Department of Trade and Industry. The Department and the British Standards Institute expect to receive the full research reports shortly. These will be carefully considered to see whether any changes are needed in the current British standard and regulations.

EC Assistance

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the value of transport infrastructure schemes presented to the European Commission for assistance between 1985 and 1987 from (i) south east England and (ii) the rest of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Portillo: The value of schemes presented for transport infrastructure grant between 1985 and 1987 from south-east England was £367 million, and from the rest of the United Kingdom £875 million.

Air Services Agreement

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action he intends taking to seek to persuade the European Commission to amend the 1983 directive on the regional air services agreement to remove the 70-seat and 30-tonne weight limit on aircraft; and what other amendments to the directive he wishes to see implemented.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: A European Commission proposal for amendment of the inter-regional air services directive 1983 is being discussed in the Council's transport working group. The proposal, if adopted, would remove the 70 seat limit and 30 tonne weight limit and would also make it easier to establish new inter-regional air services. We wish to see all these amendments implemented.

Barnstaple Downstream Bridge

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration he has given to the Barnstaple downstream bridge to complete the route encircling Barnstaple; and what further information or action he requires from Devon county council before he can reach a decision on grant or loan sanction.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Barnstaple downstream bridge is a Devon county council scheme and is shown in the county council's 1989-90 transport policies and programme with a start of works in June 1995. The timing and priority of the scheme is entirely a matter for the county council. It is as yet too early to consider it as a candidate for transport supplementary grant.

Highways Expenditure

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the average expenditure, per capita, on highways in each of the last five years for (a) construction, (b) maintenance and (c) in total for (i) England and Wales, (ii) Staffordshire and (iii) Stoke-on-Trent.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Local authority expenditure per capita was as follows:

£s.1p

	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86	1986-87	1987-88

Separate information is not available for Stoke-on-Trent. National roads programme is not analysed by local authority area. The Department of Transport is not responsible for Wales.

A46-A47 Link Road

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to visit Leicester to discuss the route of the A46-A47 link road.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. The A46-A47 link road is a local authority scheme which is the responsibility of Leicestershire county council as highway authority.

Speed Limits

Mr. Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consultations he will be having with Ministers of the other European Community states in advance of 1992 on securing common speed limits on motorways.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We see no need for European harmonisation of speed limits on road safety grounds. We have made this clear in discussions with the European Commission and in the regular meetings of the Council of Ministers. We await Commission proposals for new road safety initiatives within the Community.

If our road casualty rate applied to the rest of the Community, 40 per cent. fewer people would die.

Our concern is to cut casualties, not harmonisation for its own sake.

Procurement Savings

Mr. Curry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his target for procurement savings in 1988-89; when it was declared; and what is his estimate of the likelihood of its being achieved.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department's target is £61·68 million or 5·1 per cent. of purchasing expenditure. We are making useful progress towards it. It is too soon to predict the outturn.

Mr. Curry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his target for procurement savings in 1987-88 as a percentage of total budget; and what was the comparable target in the previous year.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department's target amounted to 3·1 per cent. of the total budget, compared with 1·3 per cent. in the previous year. Savings actually achieved amounted to 3·2 per cent. (or £37 million).

Mr. Curry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was his target for procurement savings in his Department for 1986-87 expressed as a percentage of total budget; what percentage was achieved; and what was the relationship of actual to target savings.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department's target amounted to 1·3 per cent. of total budget. The percentage actually achieved was 1·9 (or £20·18 million). This was an improvement of 45 per cent. over target.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

English Sparkling Water

Mr. Steen: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will make it his policy to ensure that English sparkling water is always available for consumption in the Members Smoking Room.

Mr. Wakeham: It is already the Refreshment Department's policy to have British mineral waters available at all of its outlets. The error leading to the temporary absence of British sparkling waters in the Members Smoking Room has now been rectified.

PRIME MINISTER

Northern Ireland (Civil Rights)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Prime Minister when she will reply to the letter dated 26 October from the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North about civil rights in Northern Ireland.

The Prime Minister: I have replied to the hon. Gentleman today.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Adley: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to her oral answer to the hon. Member for Christchurch on 1 November, Official Report, column 820, concerning priorities for rail investment in the Channel tunnel, whether she will list the priorities of the Government in connection with providing the maximum benefits to the nation through improved rail links to the Channel tunnel.

The Prime Minister: British Rail, not the Government, is responsible for determining priorities for rail investment, including that associated with the Channel tunnel. We have already approved in principle tunnel-related investment by BR of some £600 million, and we shall be happy to consider further proposals put to us which can be justified on a commercial basis.

South Africa

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make representations to the South African authorities regarding the effects on United Kingdom-South African relations of the conscription of British nationals living in South Africa into the South African defence forces.

The Prime Minister: No.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Prime Minister what representations she has received on the practice of British corporations operating in South Africa of making supplementary payments to white employees called to serve in the South African forces.

The Prime Minister: As far as I am aware, none.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Jamaica (Hurricane Gilbert)

72. Ms. Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what help his Department will be giving Jamaica in the task of reconstruction following Hurricane Gilbert.

Mr. Chris Patten: Immediately after the hurricane we gave emergency supplies and assistance worth £550,000. As soon as the extent of the damage was assessed, we offered a grant of £3 million for reconstruction work.

80. Mr. Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further reconstruction aid he is providing for Jamaica following Hurricane Gilbert.

Mr. Chris Patten: In addition to emergency aid, we have offered £3 million for reconstruction aid in Jamaica. About £2 million of this is being used for repairing the electricity distribution system. We shall respond positively to Jamaican requests for use of the remaining £1 million.

Zambia (Debt Relief)

73. Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals the Government are making to assist debt relief in Zambia.

Mr. Chris Patten: We have told the Zambians that we stand ready to cancel their outstanding aid debt and reschedule their export credit loans in the Paris Club once they have put in place an economic reform programme which has been agreed with the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.

Aid (Environmental Impact)

74. Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what work the Overseas Development Administration is doing to assess the impact of soil degradation on the economies of developing countries.

Mr. Chris Patten: Appreciating the costs of soil degradation is important, not least because it is preferable to devote resources to preventing degradation than to deal with the consequences. We are undertaking research studies in Zimbabwe and, with the World Bank, in Nepal and we are funding work on integrating environmental costs and benefits in project appraisal.

77. Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Britain's overseas aid projects are assessed for their impact on the environment of recipient countries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: It is the policy of the Overseas Development Adminstration that its aid managers should ensure the environmental soundness of projects from the earliest stage to completion and evaluation. A new ODA manual to help project managers decide how much environmental assessment is required in each case is currently being field tested.

Mr. Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the ecological safeguard criteria used in assessing and approving aid projects.

Mr. Chris Patten: It is the policy of the Overseas Development Administration that the environmental impact of all projects should be addressed before approval. Safeguard criteria are chosen on a case by case basis depending on such factors as the sensitivity of affected ecosystems and the type of project.

Locust Control

75. Mr. Roger King: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has met representatives of the desert locust control organisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: I met representatives from the Desert Locust Control Organisation for Eastern Africa on 26 October. I confirmed Britain's support for the organisation and that we would be providing an additional £500,000 of emergency aid in support of its locust control activities. I had further discussions with the organisation in Ethiopia last week. I have decided to make another £1 million emergency aid available for locust control in eastern Africa. This brings the total British support pledged for locust control in Africa since the beginning of last year to over £7·5 million.

Zimbabwe

76. Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to provide additional aid to Zimbabwe.

Mr. Chris Patten: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced a new pledge of £15 million when she met President Mugabe on 1 October.

Voluntary Agencies

78. Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to increase the funds available to British voluntary agencies working in developing countries.

Mr. Chris Patten: I recently announced an additional £3 million for voluntary agencies working in developing countries. Up to £2·5 million is being made available to support post-flood rehabilitation programmes in Bangladesh; and £500,000 has been allocated to the joint funding scheme, bringing this year's budget for the scheme to £11·2 million.

Our financial support for the voluntary agencies has increased substantially in recent years. Although decisions about next year's spending have yet to be finalised, I look forward to being able to offer substantial support in the future.

Nepal (Reafforestation)

79. Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to make provision for an increase in his Department's support for reafforestation in Nepal.

Mr. Chris Patten: I recognise the importance of forest conservation and reafforestation in Nepal. Our current commitments to forestry projects in Nepal are about £7 million. These fund research and the provision of information designed to assist both of these objectives throughout Nepal, as well as a community forestry project in eastern Nepal. We have assisted the preparation of a forestry master plan for the development of the forestry sector in Nepal over the next 25 years. This plan is now in the final stage of consideration by the Government of Nepal. As soon as it is ready my officials will be discussing with the Nepalese Government and other donors what role we might play in its implementation.

United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees

81. Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will indicate the level of Her Majesty's Government's support for the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: So far in the calendar year 1988 we have provided £21·2 million, our highest ever contribution to the organisation. This substantial assistance makes Britain one of the largest contributors and reflects the importance we attach to the vital work of the UNHCR.

AIDS

82. Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his policy towards the inclusion of AIDS education in family planning programmes supported by the overseas aid budget.

Mr. Chris Patten: We believe information on AIDS and its prevention should be available throughout the health care system. In collaboration with the World Health Organisation's global programme on AIDS and other donors we are encouraging countries to adopt this integrated approach. We are giving £1·6 million to the International Planned Parenthood Federation to develop specific AIDS-related strategies including information and education services for family planning workers and their clients.

Kurdish Refugees (Turkey)

83. Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on British aid for the Kurdish refugees in Turkey.

Mr. Chris Patten: Her Majesty's Government are sympathetic to the suffering and needs of Kurdish refugees in Turkey, especially as winter approaches. The Turkish Government have now authorised the Turkish Red Crescent Society, which has a proven record of organising emergency relief work, to act as coordinator and take a continuing role in the care of these refugees. I have agreed therefore to make a contribution of £250,000 to the Turkish Red Crescent to support this work.

Tropical Rain Forests

84. Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what pressure he is bringing to bear either bilaterally or through international organisations to reverse the destruction of the world's tropical rain forests.

Mr. Chris Patten: It is more important to help developing countries to increase their capacity to look after their forests than to apply pressure. Her Majesty's Government play a leading role in both the International Tropical Timber Organisation and the tropical forestry action plan. Later this month we shall help to host a high level conference on stimulating international support for tropical forestry research.

"Send a Cow" Appeal

85. Mr. Soames: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he supports the "Send a Cow" appeal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: Under the Overseas Development Administration's joint funding scheme I have agreed to support the "Send a Cow" project in Uganda with a grant of up to £47,500 over the next three years. The project will provide selected farmers in Uganda with in-calf heifers which, it is hoped, will produce enough milk for their domestic needs as well as creating surpluses which will generate income. In providing an experienced stockman from Britain, the project organisers have recognised the need for careful supervision in the early stages and the need to train local people in the skills of dairy breeding and management.

Bangladesh

86. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what emergency and other aid his Department provided for Bangladesh following the recent floods.

Mr. Chris Patten: We have committed £25 million in emergency relief and rehabilitation aid in response to the recent floods in Bangladesh. This includes 50,000 tonnes of food aid, £5 million through British and local voluntary agencies, and a commodity aid grant of £15 million to help meet rehabilitation requirements.

Malawi

87. Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what development assistance he is giving in support of Malawi's economic reform programme.

Mr. Chris Patten: So far we have pledged a total of £25 million to support the economic reform programme which the Malawi Government agreed with the International Monetary Fund last March.

Punjab (Flooding)

88. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance Her Majesty's Government are providing to help alleviate the effects of the recent flooding disaster in the Punjab; and what advice he will give to British residents wishing to give financial contributions towards rapid and effective disaster relief in that area.

Mr. Chris Patten: We have made limited cash donations to both India and Pakistan to provide immediate relief, and stand ready to help with rehabilitation. It is our general policy to respond to specific requests for disaster relief, and neither Government have made an international appeal for help.

The British Red Cross Society is happy to channel any suitable contributions for flood victims to the Indian Red Cross or Pakistan Red Crescent.

International Planned Parenthood Federation

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much funding he has provided for the International Planned Parenthood Federation in each of the past five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: Since 1983 the British Government have made the following contributions to the International Planned Parenthood Federation:

	£ million
1983	2·7
1984	3·0
1985	4·5
1986	5·4
1987	6·3

So far this year we have given the federation £6·5 million and, subject to parliamentary approval, we shall give £6·75 million in 1989.

Our increasing support for the federation reflects our confidence in its work.

Saharawi Refugees

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what aid has been given by Her Majesty's Government to Saharawi refugees in the past years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: Her Majesty's Government have given no direct aid to refugees living in camps in western Algeria. They receive assistance from European Community funds and from multilateral aid agencies to which we contribute; British non-governmental organisations also have aid programmes for these refugees.

Debt (Paris Club Rescheduling)

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will list the amounts country by country of the old aid loans that have been converted to grants made by the Overseas Development Administration to countries which are now eligible to benefit from the special Paris club rescheduling of official debt for the poorest most heavily indebted countries; and when the conversions of these loans to grants took place;

(2) if he will list country by country the amounts of official debt owed to the Overseas Development Administration by the poorest and most heavily indebted countries eligible for the special Paris Club rescheduling of official debt; and what is the total of such debt.

Mr. Chris Patten: There is no list as such of countries eligible for the special rescheduling terms agreed by the Paris Club following the Toronto summit in June. Decisions on eligibility are reached by consensus and on a case-by-case basis. The Paris Club has agreed that the criteria will be poverty, indebtedness, an agreed IMF adjustment programme and good track record in debt servicing.

The United Kingdom has cancelled most of the old aid loans made by the ODA to poor countries and all aid to poor countries is now on grant terms. The list of countries whose loans have been converted to grants is as follows:

	£ million
Sub-Saharan Africa
Botswana (1979)	20·68

[1] An equivalent amount of local cost aid was offered.

Details of official debts by all developing countries outstanding at the end of 1986 were given by my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury in his answer to the hon. Member for Eccles (Miss Lestor) on 18 April, at columns 328-30.

Overseas Aid

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much he expects to spend on overseas aid in 1988-89.

Mr. Chris Patten: I am pleased to say that as a result of the agreed carry-over of aid programme underspending in 1987-88, almost entirely due to the exceptional underspending by the European Community of aid attributable to its programmes, the public expenditure provision for overseas aid in 1988-89, planned at £1,337 million, has been increased to £1,387 million. The increase will be charged to the Reserve and will not, therefore, add to the planned total of public expenditure. Parliamentary approval of the resulting increase in voted provision will be sought in a Spring Supplementary Estimate. On present plans the aid programme will be fully spent.

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much information technology development grant has been awarded to Clwyd health authority; and how this has been used.

Mr. Ian Grist: Clwyd health authority benefits from the centrally financed Welsh Health Common Services Authority bureau services. These primarily support financial, supplies and child health systems. No separate centrally funded computer systems have recently been provided, and there is no IT direct grant system administered by the Department.

Unleaded Petrol

Sir Philip Goodhart: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what instructions he has given for the modification of cars used by his Department so that they can use unleaded petrol.

Mr. Peter Walker: Our policy is that Welsh Office vehicles should run on lead-free petrol as soon as it is practical.

Drug Addicts (Needles)

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report a list of those centres which operate needle exchange schemes for drug addicts.

Mr. Grist: The Department has no such list. We are aware that some district health authorities in Wales are preparing proposals for needle exchange schemes in the light of guidance issued on 9 September 1988 in DGM(88)81.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what figures he has for the number of young people unemployed in the Vale of Clwyd and Wrexham, up to the age of (a) 20 and (b) 25 years.

Mr. Peter Walker: In July 1988, the latest available date, there were 4,709 persons under 25 unemployed in the travel-to-work areas of Denbigh, Wrexham and Shotton, Flint and Rhyl. Of these 1,907 were under the age of 20.

Bathing Waters

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report the timetable of Welsh water authority improvements which will enable all the bathing waters in Wales within the scope of the EEC bathing waters directive to be up to EEC standards by 1995.

Mr. Ian Grist: I remind the hon. Gentleman that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment recently stated that we had asked the water authorities to assess whether their programmes could be accelerated. We are considering their responses, but the programmes are a matter for the individual water authorities.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report the date of proposed overseas visits which he and his Ministers are planning.

Mr. Peter Walker: I hope to make an official visit to the United States from 30 January to 3 February 1989. I am considering a number of other possible overseas visits by Welsh Office Ministers during 1989 including visits to a number of European Community countries, the middle east, Korea and Japan.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report for each of the past five years the periods that Ministers in his Department spent on official overseas visits; and if he will specify the countries visited.

Mr. Grist: A draft order has today been sent to Welsh local authorities and local authority associations, sports organisations and other interested bodies for comment. Copies have also been placed in the Library of the House. Consultees are asked to respond by 13 January.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

National Security

66. Mr. Adley: To ask the Attorney-General what are his criteria for seeking to prevent publication of matters relating to national security; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The Government's responsibility for the security of the United Kingdom requires them to take all measures open to them to prevent disclosures damaging to national security.

Frederick Andrews

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Attorney-General to what extent the increase in valuation from £110,000 to £150,000 for properties at Smithfield square and Francis street, Belfast owned by Frederick Andrews was a result of judicial direction requiring revaluation.

The Attorney-General: No judicial direction was given in the case of Mr. Frederick Andrews, a patient, in regard to the revaluation of his properties at Smithfield and Francis street, Belfast, prior to their sale.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Attorney-General (1) when the sum of £150,000 was paid into Frederick Andrew's bank account;

(2) if Frederick Andrews or his guardian has received any annuity from (a) his estate in general and (b) the £150,000 related to Smithfield square and Francis street properties in Belfast;

(3) if he will take steps to arrange for the Official Solicitor or the Master of the Office of Care and Protection (NI) to make available to the relatives of Frederick Andrews, 1978 No. 516, statements of accounts, income tax returns and details of all movements of moneys and properties inherited by Frederick Andrews since the death of his father.

The Attorney-General: I refer the hon. Member to my earlier replies to him about this case on 25 February 1988, at columns 257-59.

Land Registry

Mr. Heddle: To ask the Attorney-General if he will indicate what improvement the measures he announced in his reply to the Adjournment debate initiated by the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire on 30 November 1987 have brought about to delays in the work of Her Majesty's Land Registry.

The Attorney-General: Conveyancing activity continued in 1988 at record levels. By increasing output urgent business had been contained throughout England and Wales, but completion times for substantive applications have not yet improved. However, the measures now in place (including the recruitment and training since April 1988 of over 2,000 additional staff, new work initiatives to improve productivity and the opening of four further offices) are expected to lead to a steady improvement over the next few months.

Nottingham Land Registry

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Attorney-General what was the net return to Nottingham district land registry after payment of administration costs in each year from 1980 to date.

The Attorney-General: Since not all the Land Registry's costs are allocated to its local offices, details of net returns, after deducting administrative costs, are available only for the Department as a whole.

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Attorney-General what was the average time taken to effect first registration of title and subsequent dealings by Nottingham district land registry in each year from 1980 to date.

The Attorney-General: The average completion times from 1980 to the end of September 1988 calculated in weeks are as follows:

	First registrations	Dispositionary first leases and transfers of part of the land in a title	Dealings with whole of the land in a title
1980	14	12	4
1981	16	12	7

1983	9	12	3
1984	14	20	3
1985	16	13	3
1986	24	19	6
1987	40	35	6
1988	48	40	6

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Attorney-General how many employees were on the staff of Nottingham district land registry in each year from 1980 to date.

The Attorney-General: The total numbers of staff employed at the Nottingham district land registry on 1 October of each year 1980 to 1988 are as follows:

	Permanent	Casual	Total
1980	635·0	0·0	635·0
1981	573·0	13·0	586·0
1982	582·0	36·0	618·0
1983	643·5	27·5	671·0
1984	637·5	24·0	661·5
1985	650·0	14·0	664·0
1986	687·0	15·0	702·0
1987	713·0	39·0	752·0
1988	800·0	15·0	815·0

Parliamentary Election (Kensington)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Attorney-General what steps the Director of Public Prosecutions proposes to take following the ruling in the Queen's Bench Divisional Court in the matter of the Representation of the People Act 1983 and of the parliamentary election for the constituency of Kensington held on 14 July 1988, Hobson v. Fishburn before Lord Justice Lloyd and Mr. Justice Nolan on 28 October 1988; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The Director of Public Prosecutions has asked the Metropolitan police to carry out inquiries.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Science (Funding)

Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much of the additional sums allocated recently for British science is to be spent defraying charges and subscription to meet the international obligations of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. Friend will announce his decisions on the overall allocation of the additional funding for science, announced on 1 November, at columns 605-6, after he has considered the advice of the Advisory Board for the Research Councils. In the particular case of the high energy particle physics laboratory at CERN, I refer my right hon. Friend to my right hon. Friend's reply of 9 November to my hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett), at column 195.

Lecturers (Pay)

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to normalise the pay structure between non-clinical and clinical lecturers working in the same university department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: There are no such plans. The work of clinical academic staff in universities is most closely comparable with that of doctors and dentists in NHS hospitals, hence the pay link. The same considerations do not apply to non-clinical staff at universities.

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has from the Universities Authorities Panel about the current year's wage increase for non-clinical lecturers.

Mr. Jackson: An increase was paid in March 1988 as the second stage of a settlement agreed in 1987. No information has yet been received from the UAP relating to salary levels in future years.

Universities Superannuation Scheme

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science why the universities superannuation scheme is no longer transferable to the National Union of Students superannuation scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: I understand that accrued pension benefits in the universities superannuation scheme can be transferred to the National Union of Students superannuation scheme where a member of USS leaves employment which is pensionable under that scheme and becomes subject to the National Union of Students scheme.

Territorial Army

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information his Department has collected on local education authorities policies towards allowing (a) teachers and (b) other employees who are members of the Territorial Army time off work for Territorial Army duties.

Mrs. Rumbold: None.

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has issued any guidance to local education authorities about allowing (a) teachers and (b) other employees who are members of the Territorial Army time off work for Territorial Army duties; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Department has not issued guidance to LEAs about allowing staff time off to undertake Territorial Army activities. As with other matters concerning special arrangements for paid and unpaid leave for LEA employees this is a matter for the employing LEA taking account of any locally negotiated agreements.

Students (Loans)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science at what level of (a) annual, (b) monthly and (c) weekly income (i) gross and (ii) net of tax and national insurance, graduates will begin to repay loans taken out as outlined in the White Paper on top-up loans for students (Cm.520).

Mr. Jackson: The White Paper, "Top-up Loans for Students" (Cm. 520) proposes that repayments should be responsive to income, and sets out various possible repayment regimes. The threshold at which repayments begin will depend on the repayment regime that is adopted in the light of further consultation and on the prevailing level of earnings at the time.

Freedom of Speech

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he is satisfied with measures taken by the university authorities to preserve freedom of speech at Leicester and other universities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: We shall want to cover this in the course of the review of s43 of the Education (No.2) Act 1986 to which I referred in my reply to my hon. Friend on 31 October, at Column 467.

City Technology Colleges

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will meet representatives of Nottingham city council to discuss the future of the city technology college in Nottingham.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Nottingham CTC will open as planned in September 1989. The trustees and the project staff would welcome positive discussions with the city council and if a meeting with officials or Ministers would materially assist, we should be happy to consider making the necessary arrangements.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what deadline has been set for companies wishing to sponsor Dixons' city technology college in Bradford to indicate their financial commitment.

Mrs. Rumbold: None.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) to what agreements staff teaching at Dixons' technology college in Bradford will be subject;

(2) whether bona fide trade unions will be recognised by management for negotiating purposes at Bradford city technology college.

Mrs. Rumbold: These will be matters for the governors of the CTC to consider in due course.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether parents of children attending Dixons' city technology college in Bradford will be required to pay fees towards their child's education or charges for particular classes or activities.

Mrs. Rumbold: No fees will be charged for admission to a CTC or in respect of education provided at the school, subject to the exceptions laid down in funding agreements between my right hon. Friend and the sponsors. Such exceptions will be in line with the charging provisions in section 106 of the Education Reform Act 1988.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science on what dates he or his ministerial colleagues have met Richard Kalms, chairman of the Dixons Group plc, Edward Simpson, city technology college consultant to Dixons, and Councillor Eric Pickles, leader of Bradford metropolitan council, to discuss the establishment of a city technology college by Dixons.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met Mr. Stanley Kalms; what subjects were discussed; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: Neither my right hon. Friend nor any of his ministerial colleagues have met Mr. Stanley Kalms, the chairman of Dixons plc, or Mr. Richard Kalms, Edward Simpson or Councillor Pickles to discuss the establishment of the Bradford CTC.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many people will constitute the governing body at Dixons' city technology college in Bradford; if parents, staff and pupils will have rights to elect governors; and if he will specify the rights of governors.

Mrs. Rumbold: The CTC in Bradford has not yet adopted a scheme of government. The model scheme of government recommended by the Department provides that the governing body of a city technology college shall consist of not fewer than nine and not more than 20 members. Not fewer than four co-opted members will be appointed to represent the interests of teachers, the parents of pupils at the college and the community. The powers and responsibilities of the governors are set out in the scheme of government.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what rights of apppeal parents will have whose children are refused a place at Dixons' city technology college in Bradford.

Mrs. Rumbold: CTCs are independent schools and parents will have no right of appeal.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if Dixons' city technology college in Bradford will be co-educational; how children attending the college will be selected; and if pupils attending the college will be eligible for the assisted places scheme.

Mrs. Rumbold: The city technology college in Bradford will be co-educational. The pupils will be selected on the basis that they are likely to benefit from the type of education that the CTC will offer and that they and their parents have a commitment to full time education or training beyond the age of 16. The pupil intake will be expected to cover the full range of abilities among pupils in the catchment area and to be representative of the local community. Because education at the CTC will be free of charge, the assisted places scheme is not relevant.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) how much land will be required in total to meet the requirements of Dixons' city technology college, including play and sports areas;

(2) what is the latest total estimate of the amount of public funds necessary to establish the Dixons' city technology college; and what is the latest total estimate of private investment available to establish this city technology college.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much his Department is contributing (a) in 1988-98 and (b) in 1989-90 towards the capital cost of establishing a city technology college in Bradford; and what is his estimate of the eventual total capital cost of establishing that city technology college.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the estimated capital cost to his Department of the construction of the city technology college in Bradford; what is the estimated annual revenue cost contribution to the running of the college; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumold: The Department is currently undertaking a feasibility and cost study for a Bradford CTC. It would be premature to release any figures on either captial or recurrent costs or land requirements before that study is complete.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether the establishment of Dixon's city technology college in Bradford will cause the closure of any maintained secondary schools in Bradford.

Mrs. Rumbold: The establishment of a CTC should not cause any closures of other secondary schools since secondary student rolls in Bradford are buoyant.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will name the local firms, which, to date, have agreed to join Dixons plc in sponsoring the Dixons' city technology college in Bradford.

Mrs. Rumbold: It is for the sponsors to decide when and if they wish the details of their sponsorship to become public.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether his Department approved the terms of a press release, issued by Dixons Group plc, embargoed until 02.00 on Tuesday 8 November concerning Bradford city technology college prior to this press release being issued to the media.

Mrs. Rumbold: Yes.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what consultations were held with teaching unions over the decision to establish a city technology college in Bradford by his Department;

(2) if he has had discussions with any teacher trade unions and Bradford local authority councillors or officers regarding the impact on the local authority schools which the establishment of a city technology college is likely to have; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has had no discussions with the teaching unions or with the local authority. Bradford has a buoyant secondary school population and the impact of a CTC on enrolment at neighbouring schools is not likely to be significant. We expect that it will have a substantial beneficial effect upon secondary education generally in Bradford.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science in how many places the Dixons Group plc has expressed interest in investing privately in the establishment of a city technology college.

Mrs. Rumbold: Dixons has given careful consideration to a number of locations, mainly in Yorkshire, but also elsewhere in the north of England.

Unleaded Petrol

Sir Philip Goodhart: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what instructions he has given for the modification of cars used by his Department so that they can use unleaded petrol.

Mrs. Rumbold: Where it purchases new vehicles, the Department's policy is to ensure they have the capacity to run on unleaded petrol. Modification of older vehicles will be undertaken at their next scheduled service.

Departmental Documents

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list all the draft circulars, discussion papers and other documents for consultation which his Department has issued since 1 August, together with the dates by which comments have been requested in each case; and if he will also list the consultation documents which he envisages the Department will issue in the next six months.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply which I gave on 1 November to the hon, Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright), at columns 602-3.

Higher Education

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to introduce a tax on graduates for students who have completed higher education courses.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. Friend announced on 9 November the Government's proposals for the financing of student maintenance in the future. They provide for loans to top up grant, not for a tax on graduates.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to introduce a voucher system in higher education.

Mr. Jackson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) on 3 November, at column 742.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will tabulate the percentage of students from each socio-economic group who entered (a) university, (b) polytechnics, (c) institutes of higher education and (d) teachers' training colleges in each year since 1958.

Mr. Jackson: The following data are readily available.

Students in higher education: percentage by social class

Social Class	All students in full-time Higher Education 1962[1]	Young entrants to full-time Higher Education in 1985[2]
		Universities	Polytechnics	Colleges	All Higher Education

[2] From a sample survey of young people in England and Wales: 'Young people's intentions to enter higher education'.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what information he has on figures for full-time and part-time students entering universities in (a) Belgium, (b) Canada, (c) Denmark, (d) the Federal Republic of Germany, (e) France, (f) Italy, (g) the Netherlands, (h) Norway, (i) Spain, (j) Sweden, (k) the United Kingdom and (l) the United States of America for each year since 1975;

(2) what information he has for each year since 1974 of the percentage of the population entering (a) full-time and (b) part-time education in universities in (1) Belgium, (2) Canada, (3) Denmark, (4) the Federal Republic of Germany, (5) France, (6) Italy, (7) the Netherlands, (8) Norway, (9) Spain, (10) Sweden, (11) the United Kingdom and (12) the United States of America.

Mr. Jackson: The readily available information is as follows:

Country[1] (main ages on entry)	New entrants[2] to higher education thousands	(latest year)	Participation rate[3] (percentage) in latest year	in 1975
Denmark (18-20)	30	(1985)	35	35
France (18-20)	282	(1985)	32	28
Germany, West (19-21)	272	(1985)	25	20

United Kingdom[5] (18-21)	304	(1986)	32	30
United States of America[6] (18)	2,292	(1985)	61	60

[1] No information is available for Belgium, Canada and Sweden.
[2] Includes full-time and part-time students entering higher education for the first time i.e. excluding postgraduate students and others already having a qualification in higher education. Not all other countries may adhere to this general definition.
[3] To aid comparison and overcome the problem of the varying lengths of courses in different countries the participation rate used is the percentage of all new entrants (defined above) to a derived relevant single year group. The latter is calculated by taking the total populations for the ages providing at least 70 per cent. of the new entrants and dividing by the number of ages involved. For the United Kingdom this is the population of ages 18 to 21 divided by 4. OECD recommends this procedure.
[4] Change in coverage between these two years in the Netherlands.
[5] Exludes the private sector and students from abroad. Includes nursing and paramedical students at health department establishments.
[6] Includes private colleges.

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of pupils in maintained schools obtained five or more GCE O levels in each year since 1970-71.

Pupil Statistics

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of pupils in maintained schools attended comprehensive schools in each year since 1970-71.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The percentage of pupils in maintained secondary schools attending comprehensive schools in January of each year since 1971 in England was as follows:

Special Schools

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) how many inspections have been made at the Small school at Red House, Norwich; when the final inspection is due to be made; and if he will make a statement.

(2) whether approval has been sought under the Education Act 1981 by the Small school at Red House, Norwich;

(3) how many individual consents have been granted in each year since 1984 under the Education Act 1981 for pupils with statements of special education needs for admission to the Small school at Red House, Norwich; and if he will make a statement;

(4) how many schools are registered for the admission of one or more pupils with statements of special educational needs under the Education Act 1981; what is the minimum, average and maximum fee charged per week per pupil; and whether an entrance fee is charged.

Mr. Butcher: The Small school at Red House was provisionally registered as an independent school on 20 June 1986. Since then it has been visited twice by Her Majesty's inspectors of schools and a further visit has been arranged for the end of November when Her Majesty's inspectors will consider the school's eligibility for final registration and advise on the timing of an application for approval under the Education Act 1981. Four LEAs have applied for and been granted consents in respect of the placement of five pupils with emotional/behavioural problems at the school since 1986.

One hundred and thirty-five independent schools have so far been approved under sections 11(3)(a) and 13(2) of the Education Act 1981 as suitable for the admission of children with statements of special educational needs. The fees charged at such schools vary widely and are related to the type of disability and the degree of specialist provision required. The payment of fees is entirely a matter for local education authorities and social services departments.

Students (Grants)

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will state in real terms the value of (a) the maximum and (b) the average student grant in (i) 1958, (ii) 1968 and (iii) 1988.

Mr. Jackson: The values, at September 1988 prices, of the standard maintenance grant for students studying outside London and living away from home and the average grant paid net of parental and other contributions are as follows:

	1958 £	1968 £	1988 £
Rate of grant	2,347	2,425	2,050
Average grant paid	n/a	1,877	[1]1,195

n/a—Not available.

The rates of grant shown do not include additional allowances to which students may be entitled, although such allowances are reflected in the average grant paid. The current mandatory awards arrangements were introduced in 1962. The 1958 figure is based on the rate of Department of Education state scholarships applicable to students in college or hall accommodation at universities other than London, Oxford and Cambridge. Figures for 1958 and 1968 have been adjusted to take account of subsequent changes in the arrangements for assisting with travel expenses.

Education Records (Access)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether the regulations which he intends to make providing a right of access by parents and older pupils to education records will include the records maintained on pupils by the education welfare service of local education authorities.

Mr. Butcher: Our consultation paper proposed that the regulations should not allow access to documents in the pupil record which had been recorded by outside bodies, and suggested that reports by education welfare officers would fall within that category. We shall be announcing our proposals for these regulations shortly.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Kagisgo Trust

Sir Ian Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken to ensure that the funding of the Kagiso Trust by the European Community conforms fully with the spirit and letter of article 935 of the European Community's special programme which expressly prohibits support for political organisations.

Mrs. Chalker: Member states are consulted by the European Commission before decisions are taken on the allocation of funds from line 953 of the EC budget for the EC's special programme of assistance for victims of apartheid. The programme is being implemented in accordance with the established criteria.

Soviet Prisoner of Conscience

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will draw the attention of his Soviet counterpart to the Soviet prisoners of conscience listed in early-day motions 1415 and 1416.

Mr. Waldegrave: We regularly make representations to the Soviet authorities on behalf of prisoners of conscience. To maximise the impact of these representations, we have concentrated on those cases which have caused most concern to British public opinion and where the details have been made available to us. Of those listed in the early-day motions whose cases we have raised, two, Vladimir Rusak and Sigitas Tomekvicius have been released. We shall continue to press for the release of the others.

Unleaded Petrol

Sir Philip Goodhart: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what instructions he has given for the modification of cars used by his Department so that they can use unleaded petrol.

Mr. Waldegrave: Official vehicles in the United Kingdom that can be converted to unleaded fuel will be so modified by the next scheduled service. Similar instructions are being issued to overseas posts.

Replacement vehicles at home and overseas will, whenever possible, be capable of running on unleaded petrol. I am happy to say that my own official car uses unleaded petrol.

Saharawi People

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards self-determination for the Saharawi people; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: We recognise neither Moroccan nor Polisario claims to the western Sahara. We support the mediation efforts of the United Nations Secretary General and welcome the acceptance in principle by both sides of his referendum proposals.

Morocco

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the present relations of Her Majesty's Government with Morocco.

Mr. Waldegrave: Relations are excellent; we continue to build on the success of King Hassan's state visit of July 1987.

Oscar Mpetha

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government has made to the South African Government for the release of Oscar Mpetha; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have made representations to the South African Government on behalf of Mr. Mpetha on at least five occasions, most recently on 5 September. We shall continue to press the South African Government to release Mr. Mpetha on humanitarian grounds.

Iraq

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps Her Majesty's Government propose to take to assist the Kurds in Iraq.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have consistently urged the Iraqi authorities to respect the human rights of its Kurdish minority. We have made our concerns clear about the ill-treatment of the Kurds, both in the past and as the result of recent Iraqi military operations. We condemned the use of chemical weapons against the Kurds at Halabja in March. In August my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State responded to compelling indications of further Iraq use of chemical weapons by urging the Iraqi Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs that his Government should accept a United Nations investigative mission. We have also provided £¼ million in humanitarian aid to the Turkish Red Crescent Society for the benefit of Kurdish refugees from Iraq in Turkey.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Toxic Sewage Sludge

Ms. Walley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will publish the explanatory statements by two water authorities outlining the reasons behind the choice of the sea disposal option for toxic sewage sludge and the implications of changing to other outlets.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The scientific evidence is that sewage sludge dumped in the sea under Ministry controls is not toxic; its constituents are well within limits set by the international dumping conventions to ensure that no harm to the marine environment can be caused by their presence.

The explanatory statements by two water authorities outlining the reasons for their choice of the sea disposal option in recent years will be published in the first annual report on disposal of waste at sea which is in preparation. I expect the report to be published early next year.

It is important to keep the practicability of disposal options on land under review. I am therefore now asking all water authorities to make a reassessment of their disposal options for sewage sludge which currently goes to sea, including incineration, landfill and spreading on agricultural land.

Food Prices

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has as to the percentage of the price of food which has gone to (a) the producer and (b) the processor, wholesaler and retailer in each year since 1973.

Mr. Ryder: Broad estimates of the proportion of the value of food at retail in the United Kingdom which goes to producers and to processors, wholesalers and retailers are as follows:

	Producers[1]	Processors[2], wholesalers and retailers
1973	51·9	48·1
1974	52·6	47·4
1975	49·9	50·1
1976	52·2	47·8
1977	52·5	47·5
1978	49·2	50·8
1979	49·0	51·0
1980	43·9	56·1
1981	44·0	56·0
1982	45·8	54·2
1983	44·1	55·9
1984	46·6	53·4
1985	44·1	55·9
1986	42·0	58·0
1987	40·5	59·5

[1] The producers' share is derived from estimates of agricultural products produced in the United Kingdom for home consumption valued at farmgate prices and imported food valued at shipside prices.

[2] The share of processors, wholesalers and retailers is derived from estimates of household expenditure on food at retail plus the estimates of the wholesale value of food used in the catering sector. The retail price of food is valued less taxes but including subsidies.

Note:

More detailed figures are given in CSO's "Annual Abstract of Statistics", 1988 edition, table 9.16.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will tabulate the sums payable in sterling equivalent per hectare for land set aside in each of the member states of the European Community.

Mr. MacGregor: The European Commission has provided comparative information on rates of payment in terms of ecus for the permanent fallow option of set-aside. The rates expressed in sterling are:

Sea Level

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) of 25 October, he will indicate those parliamentary constituencies likely to be wholly or partially under water by the year 2050 assuming a rise in sea level of (a) 0·2 m or (b) 1·65 m over the period.

Mr. Ryder: The figures quoted represent the extremes of estimates based on presently available models. There are still uncertainites, so it is not realistic to draw firm conclusions now with regard to the degree of risk to particular areas.

The tide gauge network provides a measure of actual changes in mean sea level which informs decisions on current design standards for flood defences. This information, together with the results of other research, will continue to be closely monitored. As firmer predictions become available we shall be better placed to consider the implications for flood defences, and examine further protective measures that can be undertaken.

Our policies take account of all relevant developments and this is reflected in our recent anouncement of an increase of more than £25 million a year in Government funding for an enhanced long-term programme of flood protection.

Equestrian Employees

Mr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will include equestrian employees under the Agricultural Wages Board order.

Mr. Ryder: The content of the wages order is entirely a matter for the Agricultural Wages Board to decide within the constraints of the Agricultural Wages Act 1948. The order is restricted to workers employed in agriculture as defined under the Agricultural Wages Act 1948. I have no plans at present to amend the Act to include equestrian workers in its scope.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many claims have been made, in each month of 1988, under the common agricultural policy export refund consignment schedule; how many claims for each month of 1988 are yet to be processed; how much money is yet to be refunded for each month of 1988; and when he expects refund payments to be made.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Information in the form requested is not available except at excessive cost. By 30 September some 540,000 transactions with a value of £440 million had been processed and more than 70 per cent. of claims by value are now being paid within a reasonable time scale. The intervention board continues to do everything possible to restore the position of all claims. Under a scheme announced in the House on 28 July 1988, traders will be paid compensation on all claims where this year's payments had been unreasonably delayed.

Unleaded Petrol

Sir Philip Goodhart: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what instructions he has given for the modification of cars used by his Department in England and Wales so that they can use unleaded petrol.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I am currently considering instructions to the effect that, as soon as unleaded petrol is readily available in areas where Ministry cars are used, all vehicles which are capable of modification should be so modified at the next scheduled servicing, and that, wherever possible newly purchased vehicles should be capable of running on unleaded petrol.

Cheese

Sir John Farr: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has as to the availability of (a) Stilton cheese and (b) foreign cheeses.

Mr. Donald Thompson: During 1987 approximately 8,300 tonnes of Stilton cheese were produced. In the same period some 162,000 tonnes of cheese were imported into the United Kingdom.

Fisheries Policy

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what scientific data his Department has in regard to fishing stocks in area 7; and what scientific research is currently being undertaken.

Mr. Donald Thompson: My scientists carry out continuous assessment of fish stocks in area VII, collecting information from commercial fishermen and from the research vessel programme. My Department has full access to the scientific information available to the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea's advisory committee on fishery management (ACFM) and the Community's scientific and technical committee for fisheries. ACFM reports cover all the major fish stocks in area VII.

My scientists are undertaking research to improve the quality of the assessments on which the Council of Fisheries Ministers bases its decisions. Scientists from other member states are also carrying out research, which is fed into the information available to ACFM.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the Government's policy on the present six to 12-mile United Kingdom fishing limits after 1992; and whether his Department has received any representations.

Mr. Donald Thompson: There is to be a mid-term review of the common fisheries policy by 1992. The Government are wholly committed to the structure of the common fisheries policy, including restricting access to the 12-mile belt. I have received no formal representations about these access provisions.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether his Department has investigated the possibility of extending fishing licences to boats under 10m; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Extension of licensing of vessels of 10m and under in registered length would pose considerable control and enforcement problems and would involve increased expenditure. At the same time, I recognise the problems such vessels cause. Particularly in the light of the comments which we have received following our July consultation exercise on licensing arrangements generally, I shall once more be reviewing the possibilities.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Acid House Cult

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his Department is proposing to take any action against the spread of the acid house cult; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I assume that my hon. Friend's particular concern is with misuse of certain drugs—notably MDMA, also known as ecstasy, and LSD—said to be associated with the acid house craze. The Government give the highest priority to tackling drug misuse, and have devised a balanced strategy which aims at reducing both the supply of, and demand for, drugs. Effective law enforcement action is a key element of the strategy, and hon. Members will have noted the operations against acid house parties undertaken by several police forces in the home counties during the weekend of 5 and 6 November.

HIV Screening

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will now seek to encourage voluntary HIV screening for prisoners on reception.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: There are no plans to introduce routine blood tests on voluntary basis, but a test is arranged, after counselling, for any prisioner who requests one or who consents to a test where it is clinically recommended by the medical officer. Screening of all prisoners on first reception continues in the form of medical inquiry and examination.

Prison Transfers

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans his Department has to standardise the list of personal possessions prison inmates may be allowed to take with them when they are moved from prison to prison in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Standing Order No. 4, a copy of which is in the Library of the House, describes the range of privileges available to inmates and the conditions under which they may be granted. The question whether greater standardisation is desirable is being considered as part of the Department's examination of Her Majesty's chief inspector of prison's report of his review of prisoners' complaints.

Prisoners (Pay)

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will announce the terms of reference for his review of prisoners' pay; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We are considering the form and scope of the review of prisoners' pay and a further statement will be made when this work has been completed.

Correspondence

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to reply to the letter from Nottinghamshire county council to the Minister of State dated 24 June requesting a meeting to discuss the hold-up in processing a number of applications under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966.

Mr. John Patten: I have now replied to Nottinghamshire county council notifying it of the outcome of the applications.

Prisoners (Statistics)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of people in prison in England and Wales on 31 October for the non-payment of fines.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The information requested is not yet available. On 30 September 1988 about 420 fine defaulters were held in prison service establishments in England and Wales.

Mental Defect (Criminal Cases)

Mr. Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will initiate a review of the law relating to offences arising from mental defect in criminal cases.

Mr. John Patten: I understand that my hon. and learned Friend has in mind a review of the Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964. I am giving some thought to the operation of this Act, about which the Butler committee made certain recommendations in 1975, but I cannot at present say when there may be an opportunity for amending legislation.

"Let's Take a Trip"

Mr. Heddle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the West Midlands police as to whether he intends to take action under the Obscene Publications Act to seek to prevent the public release, broadcast or playing of a recording entitled, "Let's take a trip", by a group known as Children of the Night, on the grounds that it is likely to corrupt or deprave young persons by extolling the hallucinatory properties of the drug ecstasy.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No. This is a matter for the chief officer of police.

Remand Centres

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his Department is in negotiation with private companies for the management and staffing of remand centres.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No. Such negotiation would be premature until we have received and considered responses to the Green Paper "Private Sector Involvement in the Remand System" (July 1988 Cm. 434), and the report of the management consultants who have been engaged to study the practical aspects of the options set out in the Green Paper.

Special Constables

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to introduce remuneration for special constables; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The possibility of paying some form of remuneration or bounty has been considered on a number of occasions, most recently by the conference on the special constabulary last year. The view taken at that conference was again not in favour of a bounty, but that there was need to review the allowances paid to special constables to ensure that they are not out of pocket when performing duty. In consultation with the police advisory board, my Department is carrying out that review.

DNA Testing

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is the current situation with regard to his Department's trials of DNA testing; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what is his Department's position regarding the status as evidence in immigration proceedings of positive DNA tests for applicants who applied for a DNA test before the age of 18, but who are now over the age of 18; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Unleaded Petrol

Sir Philip Goodhart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what instructions he has given for the modification of cars used by his Department so that they can use unleaded petrol.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Instructions are to be issued shortly for the conversion of London vehicles; vehicles elsewhere will be converted as the supply position improves. It is Home Office policy to purchase whenever possible vehicles that run, or can be converted to run, on unleaded petrol.

Computer Hackers

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he is taking to ensure the safety of his Department's computer from penetration by computer hackers.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: A number of measures are in place to protect my Department's computers from unauthorized access, which obviously it would not be sensible to make public. Hacking and other aspects of risk to IT systems are kept under review, and additional precautions will be taken if judged to be necessary.

Bus Lanes (Police Patrol)

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many uniformed police man-hours were spent patrolling bus lanes in inner London boroughs in each of the years 1984-85, 1985-86 and 1986-87; and if he will give the cost of this work.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The information requested is not available.

Video Surveillance

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what evidence he has of the effectiveness of the use of video surveillance of the general public by the police; and what research is currently being carried out, or funded by, his Department in this area;

(2) how many police forces in England and Wales have set up video surveillance systems to watch the general public; and, of those who have not, how many plan to do so;

(3) what research is currently being conducted into the effectiveness of video surveillance of the general public by the police forces of England and Wales.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Home Office advice to the police is that closed circuit television should be used only when necessary for the efficient conduct of police operations. The introduction of such surveillance systems is an operational matter for chief officers and there is no central record of their number. We have not conducted research into their effectiveness and have no plans to do so at present.

Fines

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he has taken to assess whether convicted persons upon whom fines have been imposed are adequately apprised of their right to return to court to request changes in the terms of payment if their circumstances have altered.

Mr. John Patten: The notice of fine issued to persons on whom a fine is imposed tells them that an application for further time to pay may be made to the justices' clerk.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his Department has completed any research into (a) the relationship between fines imposed upon offenders and their ability to pay and (b) the relationship between levels of default and offenders' incomes.

Mr. John Patten: A study in 1982 looked at inquiries by courts into the means of fine defaulters. Another study, published in 1983, looked at the relationship between fine default, unemployment and the imprisonment of defaulters. A project designed to help courts to relate fine levels more systematically to offenders' means began last month in Bradford and Basingstoke, and further schemes in Teesside and Swansea are expected to start in January. The project will run for six months with a further 12-month follow-up period.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the Minister is satisfied that the advice given by his Department in circular 13/1984 as to offenders' income and financial commitments is being universally and consistently followed by the courts in the imposition of fines.

Mr. John Patten: The advice contained in the Home Office circular 13/1984 remains appropriate. It is a matter for the courts under the law to decide what inquiry is appropriate in any individual case.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) in the last year for which statistics are available, how many persons were committed to prison for non-payment of fines; and what was the average length of the sentence imposed;

(2) what proportion of those who have defaulted on the payment of fines in each of the last three years for which figures are available were unemployed.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: In 1987 about 18,700 persons were received into prison service establishments in England and Wales following committal in default of payment of a fine. The average period imposed in default was about three weeks. Information on receptions and periods imposed in default of payment is published annually in "Prison Statistics England and Wales" (Table 7·3 of the latest issue, for 1986, Cm. 210) copies of which are in the Library.

Information on the employment status of prisoners is not recorded centrally.

Prison Discharge Procedures

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average cost per day, including the costs involved in admission and discharge procedures of periods of imprisonment lasting (a) five days, (b) seven days, (c) 14 days, (d) 30 days, (e) 45 days, (f) three months, (g) six months, (h) 12 months, (i) 18 months, (j) two years and (k) more than two years, respectively.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The average cost of imprisonment per inmate per day for 1987-88 was £39·29. Although the significance of fixed costs, including the costs of the admission and discharge procedures, declines as the length of a term of imprisonment increases, information is not held in a form which enables average cost per day for sentences of different lengths to be calculated.

Elections (Exclusion)

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which Commonwealth countries or United Kingdom dependent territories do not permit United Kingdom citizens to register as electors and if he will take steps to amend the law so as to exclude citizens of those countries from voting in United Kingdom elections.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The information requested in the first part of the question is not readily available and I shall write to my hon. Friend when it has been obtained. The answer to the second part of the question is that I have no plans to do so.

Firearms Amnesty (South Yorkshire)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total number of firearms and knives handed into the South Yorkshire police during the recent amnesties; and if he will give a breakdown by the four local authorities.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the chief constable of South Yorkshire that a total of 179 knives, three firearms and 52 other offensive weapons were surrendered in the knives campaign between 27 June and 11 July. A breakdown of these figures by local authority area has not been kept.

The number of firearms handed in during the September firearms amnesty, by local authority area, is as follows:

Town	Firearms
Doncaster	139
Barnsley	97
Rotherham	62
Sheffield	256

A total of 131 other weapons were also surrendered. More detailed information in respect of these is not readily available.

Hunting

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to make it an offence to allow an organised hunt to attack cats or dogs on local authority land whether wholly owned or leased by the local authority; and if a hunt does take place to make it a criminal offence against the master of the hunt.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) on 21 March 1988 at column 10.

By-Elections

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, following the recent by-election in the Byron ward of Nottingham, he has received any representations seeking a review of local election legislation in relation to spurious nominations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No, but I am aware of the concern about the difficulties encountered during the recent casual election to fill a vacancy on Nottingham city council, of which the returning officer and another hon. Member have supplied me with details. It appears that the remedies available in law have so far proved largely adequate to meet the situation.

Police Complaints Authority

Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is now in a position to circulate the consultation document on the recommendations in the triennial review report for 1985-88 of the Police Complaints Authority.

Mr. Douglas Hurd: The document is being sent today for comment to the police representative bodies, the Association of County Councils, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the Director of Public Prosecutions and the Police Complaints Authority. Copies are being placed in the Libraries of both Houses of Parliament. Any other interested party or individual who wishes to comment can obtain a copy of the document from the Home Office, Room 523, 50 Queen Anne's Gate, London SW1, 01-273-3612. Comments are being sought by the end of February 1989.

Police Manpower

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what provision has been made for additional police manpower in 1989-90.

Mr. Hurd: In May 1986 I announced a programme to increase police manpower by 3,200 posts. That programme would be completed in 1989-90 with increases of 800 posts.

Given the heavy demands on police resources, and the undeniable case for yet more officers on the beat, I have agreed with colleagues that the numbers for 1989-90 should be further increased, and that a fresh programme of substantial increases will follow in the years after that.

For 1989-90, therefore, I shall be able to approve up to 1,230 extra police posts: 800 for provincial police forces and 300 for the Metropolitan police, plus up to 130 posts where, as is the case for example at certain airports, costs are reimbursed by third parties.

I have also made provision for 100 extra Metropolitan police civil staff posts, to release 100 police officers for operational duty. These posts will be additional to the increase of 150 civil staff already planned for the Metropolitan police in 1989-90.

As with previous increases in provision for the police service, they will be made subject to my being satisfied that existing manpower is being properly used.

For future years we intend that the programme of increases should be substantial. The police service and police authorities will be fully involved in the process which will determine what the level of increase should be. We shall need to be satisfied that existing resources are used to best advantage, and will examine critically the arguments for increases in the context of competing demands for increases in public expenditure.

We maintain our commitment to achieving the best use of resources within police forces, and ensuring that we get value for money from the extra manpower which has been made available to the police service. I am confident that the police share this commitment, and that they will continue to find fresh ways of using their officers more effectively.

Unlicensed Vehicles

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people in London have been prosecuted successfully for keeping an unlicensed vehicle on the road in each of the past five years.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 7 November 1988]: In the Metropolitan police district and the City of London police force area there were, in 1985 and 1986 respectively, 17,158 and 19,890 findings of guilt for failure to pay the appropriate duty for a motor vehicle licence. Information for earlier years could be provided only at disproportionate cost. National figures for this offence are published annually in table 5 of "Offences relating to motor vehicles, England and Wales, Supplementary tables". The issue for 1987 will be published soon.

Probation Officers

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what matters he will discuss at his next meeting with the Association of Chief Officers of Probation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten [holding answer 31 October 1988]: While my right hon. Friend has no plans at present to meet the Association of Chief Officers of Probation, I have met it on a number of occasions—most recently at its annual conference in Leeds on 15 September—and I hope to meet it again before long to discuss the promotion of community-based disposals and the future role of the probation service. The Government have set out major proposals affecting the work of the probation service in the Green Paper "Punishment, Custody and the Community" published in July (Cm. 424) and in an action plan issued to the probation service, the courts and others in August. The aim of these proposals is to enable more offenders to be punished in the community rather than by custody. I look forward to further constructive discussions with the probation service on this subject.

Disaster Inquiries

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list each public inquiry which has been held as a result of a disaster in the past eight years; and what was the cost to public funds of each of them.

Mr. Hurd [holding answer 28 October 1988]: Public inquiries have been held by a number of Departments over the last eight years; details are set out in the table. These figures include basic running costs such as premises, printing and paper costs, boards of assessors and clerks to the inquiry; where indicated, Treasury solicitors' and staff costs are also included. In some instances details of staff costs could only be obtained at a disproportionate cost.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Trade Fair (Baghdad)

Mr. Holland: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether he expects to lead a delegation to the trade fair in December in Baghdad; and whether he expects to make any announcement concerning Iraq's export credit.

Mr. Newton: I visited Baghdad from 4 to 7 November as leader of the United Kingdom delegation to the seventh United Kingdom/Iraq joint commission.

A new financial protocol was agreed which will enable United Kingdom exporters to take advantage of increased ECGD backed credits totalling £340 million for contracts signed in 1989. £65 million of this is specifically related to the contract won by NEI for the provision of power-generating equipment for the Al Shemal power station.

Graffiti

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will consider a ban on the manufacture, sale and import of spray paint cans in view of the cost to the community of removing the graffiti caused by them; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: Graffiti, like all other forms of vandalism and criminal damage, is a problem which the Government take most seriously and this is reflected in the relevant criminal legislation, notably the Criminal Damage Act 1971.

The existing law is adequate to deal with instances of graffiti spraying. The Government have no plans to introduce a ban on the manufacture, sale or import of spray paint cans. However, they are strongly in favour of broadly based preventive action to tackle the graffiti problem. As with similar acts of vandalism, a concerted local approach, involving all sections of the community, is the best way forward.

Securities and Commodities

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what arrangements are being made for regulation in the trade of securities and commodities after 1992.

Mr. Atkins: The Financial Services Act 1986 sets the regulatory regime governing investment business in the United Kingdom, including the trading of securities and commodity futures. The European Commission is considering a draft directive on investment business as part of its programme to complete the single European market by 1992.

"Monthly Digest of Statistics"

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the weights attached to each of the headings in table 15.10 of the Monthly Digest of Statistics for imports, exports, home demand and home production; if he will provide a figure for December 1987, showing imports as a percentage of production for the home market; and if he will provide corresponding figures for 1979 and 1970.

Mr. Alan Clark: Weights are not used in the construction of figures published in table 15.10 of the Monthly Digest of Statistics. Figures of United Kingdom production for the home market are not available because it is not possible to estimate with any accuracy the proportion of United Kingdom exports which were originally manufactured abroad, or the proportion of United Kingdom imports originally produced in this country.

Exports and Imports

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for the metal goods, engineering and vehicle industries his estimate for the current degree of import penetration compared to December 1978 and the earliest period for which figures are available, together with the corresponding increase since 1973 and 1979 in: (a) the volume of United Kingdom imports and exports and in the United Kingdom output, (b) the volume of new fixed capital investment in manufacturing industry gross and net of capital consumption and (c) the change in the balance of trade with the EEC 12, European Free Trade Association, the United States of America and the rest of the world.

Mr. Alan Clark: Relevant information is in the following table. It has not been possible to make comparisons with 1973 figures due to classification changes.

	Class 31 Metal Goods	Classes 32, 33, 34, 37 Engineering Industries	Classes 35 and 36 Vehicle Industries

Change in net spending between 1973 and 1987 −74 per cent.
Change in net spending between 1979 and 1987 −78 per cent.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each year since 1976 the value of, respectively, imports and exports of manufactures less erratics in terms of 1985 unit values, together with his estimate of the contribution made to the increase in the deficit in 1986, 1987 and 1988 to date of (a) the change in the competitiveness of British industry, (b) the increase in net investment in plant and machinery by manufacturing industry and (c) the increase in consumer demand for goods; and if he will provide figures of the change in each case.

Mr. Alan Clark: No estimates are available of the contributions made to the increase in deficit of the factors mentioned in the question. The value at 1985 prices of imports and exports of manufactures, excluding the erratic items, for the years 1976 to 1987, is as follows:

Trade in manufactures excluding erratics
(Balance of payments basis) £ billion 1985 prices

	Imports	Exports
1976	24·7	39·6
1977	27·0	42·3

Grants and Assistance

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what was the total expenditure on regional development grants and regional selective assistance in 1985-86, 1986-87 and 1987-88 for Wales and each of the standard regions.

Mr. Atkins: Total expenditure on regional development grants and regional selective assistance in the English regions in the years in question was:

£ million

	North East	North West	Yorkshire/ Humberside	East Midlands	South West	West Midlands
1985-86	62·0	96·3	32·5	8·3	11·1	5·5
1986-87	107·4	132·6	37·2	10·6	20·5	9·8
1987-88	81·0	70·7	31·9	9·4	11·3	18·3

Notes:
1. All figures are gross of domestic receipts and expected receipts from the European regional development fund.
2. The figures incorporate expenditure under the original and revised RDG schemes, and on RSA industrial and training grants.

Questions about the operation of RDG and RSA in Wales are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will provide figures on regional selective assistance for (a) the total number of applications outstanding on 31 March, and the total number of applications received since April, (c) the number of those outstanding applications that have subsequently been processed, (d) the number of those applications where payment has been made, (e) the total amount of money paid out since 31 March in regional selective assistance and (f) the total estimated planned expenditure for that period and for 1988-89 for Wales and each of the standard regions.

Mr. Atkins: The information requested in respect of regional selective assistance industrial and training grants is as follows:

	North East	North West	Yorkshire and Humberside	East Midlands	South West	West Midlands
(1) Number of applications outstanding at 31 March 1988	30	100	50	10	30	100
(2) Number of applications received since 1 April 1988	150	260	150	20	60	360
(3) Number of outstanding applications at (1) fully processed at end-October 1988	30	90	40	10	30	100
(4) Number where some payment has been made by end-October 1988	5	13	4	2	3	12
(5) Total grant paid (£000) from 1 April 1988 to 31 October 1988	14,106	11,337	4,005	505	1,978	12,651

Note: All figures are gross of domestic receipts and expected receipts from the European Regional Development Fund.

Current provision for expenditure on RSA industrial and training grants in 1988-89 in England is £128 million; this will become £121 million if Parliament approves Winter Supplementary Estimate proposals published on 10 November. Estimates of future expenditure in England are not broken down by region. Questions about the operation of RSA in Wales are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Business Development Consultancy

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will give (a) the total number of applications received for business development consulting costs from 1 April to the most recent date for which figures are available, (b) the total number of applications approved, (c) the total amount of expenditure involved and (d) the total estimated planned expenditure for that period, for Scotland, Wales and for each of the standard regions.

Mr. Atkins: The business development consultancy initiatives were launched on 13 January 1988 with the introduction of the first four initiatives for design, quality, marketing and manufacturing systems. Two further initiatives—business planning and financial and information systems—were added on 29 March. In the period 1 April to 28 October a total of 10,333 applications were received for the six consultancy initiatives. In the same period 6,680 applications were approved for consultancy. The Department's contribution to the cost of completed consultancies totalled £3·03 million. It is estimated that those consultancies not completed by 28 October will cost the Department £17·41 million. A breakdown of numbers and cost for each DTI region[1] and for Scotland and Wales is as follows:

DTI region[1]/Country	(a) Number of applications received	(b) Number of applications approved for consultancy	(c) DTI expenditure on completed consultancies (£'000)	(d) Planned expenditure on outstanding consultancies (£'000)
North East	537	369	149	980
North West	1,641	1,177	628	2,974
Yorkshire and Humberside	991	653	364	1,634
West Midlands	1,051	653	394	1,604

DTI region[1]/Country	(a) Number of applications received	(b) Number of applications approved for consultancy	(c) DTI expenditure on completed consultancies (£'000)	(d) Planned expenditure on outstanding consultancies (£'000)
East Midlands	634	465	185	1,238
South West	1,026	549	176	1,504
South East:
Cambridge	707	440	134	1,212
London	1,112	649	309	1,677

Scotland	848	580	303	1,472
Wales	667	438	137	1,203
Total	10,333	6,680	3,033	17,407

[1] Data are collected for DTI regions and for Scotland and Wales. DTI regions are similar to standard economic regions except that DTI north-west includes Cumbria and the High Peak district which are in the north and east midlands standard economic regions respectively, and DTI south-east includes the East Anglia standard economic region.

Regional Assistance

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will provide figures on regional development grants for (a) the number of applications outstanding on 31 March, (b) the number of those outstanding applications that have subsequently been processed, (c) the number of those applications where payment has been made, (d) the number of those applications that are still outstanding, (e) the total amount of money paid out since 31 March in regional development grants to those applications and (f) the total estimated planned expenditure for that period and for 1988-89 for Wales and each of the standard regions.

Mr. Atkins: The information requested in respect of the revised regional development grant scheme in England is as follows:

	North East	North West	Yorkshire and Humberside	East Midlands	South West
Number of applications outstanding at 31 March 1988	3,260	2,740	830	240	540
Number of these processed at end-October 1988	2,350	2,210	800	210	520
Number where some payment has been made by end-October 1988	350	420	110	30	120
Number still outstanding at end-October 1988	910	530	30	30	20
Grant paid (£ million) on applications outstanding at 31 March 1988	4·4	5·5	1·1	0·5	1·1
Total grant paid (£ million) from 1 April 1988 to 31 October 1988	24·5	23·1	7·8	3·8	4·6

Note:

All expenditure figures are gross of domestic receipts and expected receipts from the European Regional Development Fund.

Current 1988/89 provision RDG II in England is £122·2 million gross; this will rise to £135·2 million if Parliament approves Winter Supplementary Estimate proposals published on 10 November. Estimates of future expenditure in England are not broken down by region.

Questions about the operation of RDG in Wales are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) if he will give (a) the total number of applications received for innovation grants from 1 April to the most recent date for which figures are available, (b) the total number of applications approved, (c) the total amount of expenditure involved and (d) the total estimated expenditure planned for that period, for Scotland, Wales and for each of the standard regions;

(2) if he will give (a) the total number of applications received for investment grants from 1 April to the most recent date for which figures are available, (b) the total number of applications approved, (c) the total amount of expenditure involved and (d) the total estimated expenditure planned for that period, for Scotland, Wales and for each of the standard regions.

Mr. Atkins: Regional enterprise grants became available on 1 April 1988 in the development areas, and on 1 September 1988 in South Yorkshire. The information requested, for the English regions for which DTI is responsible, for the seven months to 31 October 1988, is as follows:

Regional Enterprise Grants

Investment	Number of applications	Number of offers	Value of offers (£000)
North East	169	90	431
North West	219	124	800
Yorkshire and Humberside	58	18	138
East Midlands	13	8	37
South West	73	41	163
Total England	532	281	1,569

Payments of £84,235 have been made under Investment up to end October.

Innovation
North East	59	17	311
North West	70	23	487
Yorkshire and Humberside	21	8	173
East Midlands	4	2	50
South West	17	3	75
Total England	171	53	1,096

Payments of £26,000 have been made under Innovation up to end October.

The amount of expenditure paid out in any particular region depends on demand for the scheme and the appraisal of individual applications. The value of grants actually paid so far reflects the nature and timescale of the projects on which applicants have sought grants since scheme commencement in April.

Total provision for expenditure on regional enterprise grants in England in 1988-89 is £12·3 million. Questions about the operation of regional enterprise grants in Scotland and Wales are matters for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and Wales respectively.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what was the total estimated expenditure on regional development grants and regional selective assistance in 1988-89, 1989-90 and 1990-91 for Wales and each of the standard regions.

Mr. Atkins: The total 1988-89 provision for expenditure on regional development grants and regional selective assistance in England is £317 million; this will become £312 million if Parliament approves Winter Supplementary Estimate proposals published on 10 November. Current year figures and estimates for future expenditure in England are not broken down by region. Information about planned expenditure in 1989-90 and 1990-91 will be published in the Public Expenditure White Paper in January. Expenditure as previously planned was set out in the reply, given to the hon. Gentleman on 15 March 1988.

Questions about the operation of RDG and RSA in Wales are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Notes:

(1) The figures given for 1988-89 are net of recoveries and domestic receipts, but gross of receipts from the European regional development fund.

(2) RSA includes industrial and training grants, and expenditure under the business improvement services and exchange risk guarantee schemes.

Single European Market

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make it his policy to convene a national conference involving representatives of Government, business and trade unions in order to discuss and evolve a national strategy for the social dimension of the single European market.

Mr. Maude: No.

Unleaded Petrol

Sir Philip Goodhart: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what instructions he has given for the modification of cars used by his Department so that they can use unleaded petrol.

Mr. Atkins: None. The Department's policy is that where practicable new vehicles should either be diesel-powered or run on lead-free petrol. Existing petrol engined vehicles should be converted to lead-free petrol at a convenient major service where that can be done at no significant cost.

Mr. Key: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what steps he is taking to encourage British car makers to provide vehicles designed to run on unleaded petrol.

Mr. Atkins: It is Government policy to establish the use of unleaded petrol as the dominant fuel in the United Kingdom as quickly as possible. From October 1989 all new models of cars, and from October 1990 all new cars, must be able to run on unleaded petrol. The duty differential introduced in the last Budget gives the fuel a retail price advantage of some 6p compared with four-star petrol. In addition, the Government support the activities of the Campaign for Lead Free Air (CLEAR), which runs campaigns to encourage the use of the fuel. As a result, demand for cars which can run on unleaded petrol is growing, and this means that it is in the commercial interests of car manufacturers to provide them as quickly as they can.

Post Offices

Mr. Parry: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has received concerning the proposal to change some main post offices to agency offices; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy and I had received as at 10 November representations from seven hon. Members, bodies concerned and members of the public.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on Post Office employee's pension rights following the change of main post offices to agency office status in April 1989.

Mr. Forth: Pension arrangements for Post Office employees are an operational matter for the Post Office. I understand, however, that the Post Office expects to be able to absorb the vast majority of employees affected by the change of status. Those few who may not be able to be absorbed would be offered redundancy terms in accordance with existing Post Office redundancy arrangements.

Imports

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will give the import penetration in the United Kingdom market of 35 mm single lens reflex cameras, pocket computers, table-top computers, photocopiers, video recorders, black and white video cameras, colour video cameras, video camera battery packs and photographic tripods, stating the sources of imports in each case for 1987 and 1988 to the most recent practicable date.

Mr. Alan Clark: We have information on photocopiers, 35 mm cameras, video tape recorders and video cameras; the other items are not individually identifiable.

Photocopiers

Import penetration for 1987 is not available because of disclosure on sales.

Major sources of imports were:

France
Netherlands
West Germany

For the first half of 1988 import penetration was 124 per cent.

Major sources of imports were:

West Germany

Note: There is a large amount of entrepot trade in photocopiers.

where United Kingdom market = Sales—Exports + Imports.

Sumrie Clothing Ltd.

Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he expects to publish the report of the inspectors who have investigated the dealings in the shares of Sumrie Clothing Ltd., and the involvement of Mr. M. Z. Heptres; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: It is my intention to publish this report shortly.

Accounting Standards (Dearing Report)

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he expects to respond to the recommendations of the committee chaired by Sir Ron Dearing on accounting standards.

Mr. Maude: The Consultative Committee of Accountancy Bodies, to which the report was addressed, is now considering the Dearing recommendations. I understand that the committee aims to reach a view early in 1989. The Government will want to consider the views of all interested parties before reaching a decision on those recommendations which require action by the Government.

Motor Cars

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the increase in the volume and value of domestic production and of imports and exports of cars in the third quarter of 1988 compared with the third quarter of 1987, the increase in each of the three previous periods of 12 months and the corresponding increases in the terms of trade for cars and the increase in relative export prices for United Kingdom manufactures.

Mr. Alan Clark: There are no figures for the value of domestic production of passenger motor cars. The remaining figures requested are shown in the table:

Illegal Radio Broadcasting

Mr. Evennett: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what additional steps his Department is taking to detect and prosecute illegal radio broadcasters in Greater London.

Mr. Atkins: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to him on 1 February 1988, at column 455, by my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-West (Mr. Butcher). We are also seeking to strengthen the terms of the law concerning the unlicensed use of radio as soon as possible. I would also refer my hon. Friend to the Home Secretary's reply of 2 November to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight). Illegal broadcasters convicted after 1 January 1989 would be statutorily debarred from involvement with stations licensed by the proposed Radio Authority for a five-year period.

Mr. Evennett: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is his Department's estimate of the number of illegal radio broadcasting organisations in Greater London.

Mr. Atkins: The total number of unlicensed broadcasts varies considerably over time and my Department does not undertake systematic and regular monitoring. But so far this year my Department's radio investigation service has carried out 303 raids on 58 unlicensed stations broadcasting in the Greater London area.

Cigarette Imports

Mr. Parry: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what has been the level of the import of high tar cigarettes from Eastern Europe in each of the past five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: Available information is limited to total cigarette imports as tar levels are not separately identified in the Overseas Trade Statistics.

European Community (Financial Institutions)

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what action he is taking to enable British financial institutions to function on equal terms with similar institutions from the other European Economic Community member states operating in Britain.

Mr. Atkins: The Government are, as my hon. Friend will be aware, fully committed to completion of the single market by 1992. Two important proposals in the 1992 programme, the draft second banking directive and the proposed draft investment services directive, are designed to enable financial institutions from all member states to compete on level playing fields throughout the Community on the basis of a single authorisation.

Elders IXL

Mr. Beith: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what actions were taken by his Department in response to the discovery that Elders IXL continued to buy shares in Scottish and Newcastle Breweries after solicitors to Elders had been informed by the Office of Fair Trading that its bid was being referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission; by how much he estimates the Elders share of Scottish and Newcastle increased by trading after the referral announcement; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: My right hon. and noble Friend made an order on 10 November 1988, No. 1965, the effect of which is to prohibit further purchases of shares and to restrict to 15 per cent. the extent to which Elders IXL may exercise voting rights in respect of the Scottish and Newcastle Breweries shares held by it.

I understand that the Elders IXL holding in Scottish and Newcastle Breweries increased by some 10 per cent.

Import Penetration

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for the metal manufacturing, chemical and man-made fibre, textile, and footwear and clothing industries, respectively, his estimate for the current degree of import penetration and in December 1978 and the earliest period for which figures are available, together with the increase in each case since 1973 and 1979 in (a) the volume of imports and exports and in United Kingdom output, (b) the volume of new fixed capital investment in manufacturing industry gross and net of capital consumption and (c) the change in the balance of trade with the EEC 12, European Free Trade Association, the United States of America and the rest of the world.

Mr. Alan Clark [holding answer 11 November 1988]: Relevant information is in the table. It has not been possible to make comparisons with 1973 figures, due to classification changes.

DEFENCE

Trident Programme

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the progress of the Trident programme.

Mr. Sainsbury: The Trident programme continues to make satisfactory progress towards its in-service date of the mid-1990s. The programme is on time and within budget.

Surface Vessels (Submarine Incidents)

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received about the sinking of surface vessels after interference by submarines.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Letters have been received from fishermen's organisations and from other interested groups and individuals about a number of sinkings in which submarines are alleged to have been involved.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if an internal inquiry has been conducted in any previous instances of complaints of the sinking of surface vessels following interference by a submarine.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Royal Navy investigates all such reports.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will order a review of operational instructions given to submarine commanders regarding conduct after the sinking of a surface vessel through interference by a submarine;

(2) if he will order a review of the operational instructions given to submarine commanders with the aim of minimising the danger to fishing vessels from submarines.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No. I am satisfied both with the training which submarine commanding officers receive in the avoidance of surface ships of all kinds, including fishing boats and their gear, and that commanding officers are aware of the procedures to be followed should a collision nonetheless occur.

Unleaded Petrol

Sir Philip Goodhart: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what instructions he has given for the modification of cars used by his Department so that they can use unleaded petrol.

Mr. Sainsbury: I am pleased to announce that it has now been decided that all new staff cars due to be bought in the future will be capable of operating on unleaded petrol. Of the existing vehicles, 2,200 can be modified simply and work has been put in hand to do this. By the end of this financial year 70 per cent. of the fleet will be capable of using unleaded petrol; this figure will be increased progressively over the next three years to 100 per cent. as the balance of cars that cannot be converted cost-effectively become due for replacement.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what steps he is taking to avoid problems and delays due to shortages of qualified staff in the research and production divisions of his Department;

(2) whether a shortage of qualified staff has caused any difficulties in (a) the Trident missile warhead programme, or (b) in any similar programme within his Department.

Mr. Sainsbury: I will write to the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Computers (Safety)

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will order an inquiry into the security of his Department's computer systems, following the recent incidents of computer hacking both in Britain and abroad;

(2) what assessment he or his Department has made of the vulnerability of his Department's computer systems to penetration by computer hackers.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The vulnerability of information held on MOD computers is being assessed as part of my Department's investigation of recent press reports of a hacker gaining access to highly classified information on MOD computers.

Motor Gliders

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of the types of motor glider which are presently being examined as possible replacements for the Air Cadet Venture motor glider; if consideration is being given to purchasing a glass reinforced plastic motor glider which can be serviced by the same team which services the Air Cadets' conventional fleet; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: Replacement of the Venture motor glider fleet is currently under consideration. A final decision will be taken following a competitive tendering exercise later this year and will take into account all the relevant factors, including long-term maintenance costs.

Nuclear Submarines

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether any incidents relating to atmospheric discharges of radionuclides involving US nuclear submarines have been reported to his Department.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence why the US nuclear submarine, USS Phoenix is currently being repaired in Faslane dry dock; and what repairs are being undertaken.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The USS Phoenix visited Faslane recently for the purpose of rest and recreation. She was not dry-docked and no repairs were carried out. She has since sailed.

AWRE Aldermaston

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the alert at the Atomic Weapons Research Establishment, Aldermaston, on the morning of 8 November; what information he has regarding the cause of this alert; at what times the alert started and ended; and whether there is any link between this alert and the alert of 28 October.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The cause of the false alarm at the Atomic Weapons Research Establishment at Aldermaston on Tuesday 8 November was an electrical fault in the same system which triggered the false alarm on 28 October. The alarm sounded at 7.05 am and the work force was able to enter the building at 8.07 am.

Salisbury Plain Training Area (Incident)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 8 November, to whom the vehicles involved in the incident on 30 October on the Salisbury Plain training area in which a smoke grenade was discharged belonged; and what nationality were their occupants.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The vehicles involved are the property of the United States Air Force. The occupants were both British and United States service personnel. The vehicles were exercising on an area of the Salisbury Plain training area from which members of the public were exluded at the time, under the relevant byelaws. Inquiries have disclosed that the complainants' car was assumed to be an exercise vehicle. No disciplinary action will be taken.

Nuclear Weapons Convoys

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the potential consequences for the local population of an accident to a nuclear weapons convoy.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: In view of the extensive safety arrangements involved in the design, construction, containerisation and transport of nuclear weapons, our assessment is that it is inconceivable that the impact which could occur in the worst type of road accident would be sufficient to lead to any release of radioactive contamination into the environment.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the risks of fission of nuclear materials carried in convoy along roads.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Fission occurs naturally and spontaneously in a number of radioactive substances. The nature, quantities and methods of transport for defence nuclear materials mean that we consider it impossible for this process to become critical by accident.

Search and Rescue

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will announce his decision on the possible redeployment of 22 Search and Rescue Squadron, RAF Chivenor; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he intends to make an announcement as to the findings of the review of search and rescue operations at RAF Leuchars; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what conclusions he has reached on the deployment of military search and rescue helicopters in England.

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future of the Search and Rescue helicopter flight at RAF Leuchars.

Mr. Freeman: As we announced on 4 December 1986 at columns 725-6 by the then Secretary of State for Transport, the Ministry of Defence and the Department of Transport have been reviewing the arrangements for search and rescue helicopter coverage in the light of the recommendations of the United Kingdom SAR committee. This review has been a lengthy one because of the need not only to safeguard essential military SAR requirements in peace and war, but to take full account of civilian SAR needs.

A number of steps have already been taken to improve SAR helicopter coverage. Military SAR helicopter redeployments at Leconfield, Coltishall, Manston and Portland have already improved overall coverage in the Channel area and on the east coast. Coastguard helicopters have been provided by the Department of Transport at Stornoway and Lee-on-Solent, in addition to Sumburgh. The call-out time of the RN Sea Kings at Culdrose was upgraded on 1 April this year, significantly improving coverage in the south west.

It is now intended to improve the call-out times of the RN Sea Kings at Prestwick from summer 1989. This will provide improved SAR coverage in central Scotland and off the west coast.

RAF Sea Kings will remain at Brawdy, Lossiemouth and Boulmer; and RAF Wessex at Valley. It has also been decided to retain RAF SAR Wessex at Leuchars and Chivenor; with the improved Sea King service at Prestwick and Culdrose and the S-61N at Lee on Solent, particularly at night, the Wessex aircraft at Leuchars and Chivenor will operate during daylight hours only every day from autumn 1989. There will be two Wessex at each station, one of which will be an in-use reserve aircraft.

The net effect of these changes, which have been fully endorsed by the Department of Transport, is greatly to improve overall SAR coverage in the United Kingdom and surrounding waters, benefiting both military personnel and civilians alike.

Royal Naval College

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will halt the planned felling of a line of mature trees at the royal naval college, Dartmouth, in connection with the proposed construction of a security fence; if he will undertake consultations thereon with Dartmouth town council and South Hams district council at an early date; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what steps were taken to procure the requisite permissions for the erection of a security perimeter fence and the felling of mature trees at the royal naval college, Dartmouth.

Mr. Freeman: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Bolton Artillery Unit

Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will provide the necessary resources to allow Bolton artillery unit to remain stationed in Bolton.

Mr. Freeman: I wrote to the hon. Member about this on 10 November 1988.

River Tyne (Russian Vessels)

Mr. Ted Garrett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if there is any restriction on Russian fishing vessels entering the River Tyne to buy the remains of herring catches from local fishermen.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I have been asked to reply.

There is no blanket ban on Russian vessels operating as fish factory ships entering the Tyne, or on vessels of any other country of origin. However any particular klondyking operation is subject to United Kingdom transhipment licensing. My Department would consider any application on its merits.

Nuclear Materials

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the implications of the recommendations in the report, "Assessment of Candidate Reactor Technology for the New Production Reactor", by the Energy Research Advisory Board of the United States Department of Energy, released in July, for future nuclear materials exchanges under the 1958 Anglo-American mutual defence agreement on atomic energy matters, as amended.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 26 October 1988]: The report's recommendations are directed to the United States Government. The MOD is not aware of any implication of the kind referred to.

EMPLOYMENT

Skill Shortages

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if his Department is involved with industry and commerce in London in their efforts to reduce skill shortages.

Mr. Cope: Yes. It is primarily the responsibility of employers to meet their needs for skills through training. For their part, the Government have increased their investment in training massively since 1979, particularly for young people and the adult unemployed. Both YTS and employment training are delivered in close collaboration with local industry and commerce. Under employment training specific skill shortages, for example, schemes to train adults in construction skills within Docklands have been announced recently.

Labour Statistics

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many women are employed in firms with fewer than 20 employees; and what proportion of the total number of women in paid employment this represents.

Mr. Lee: Information is not available in the exact form requested. It is estimated from the labour force survey that in spring 1987 there were 4,705,000 women in paid employment in Great Britain, who worked either on their own or in places where there were fewer than 25 employees. These represented 45·7 per cent. of all women in paid employment at that time.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the level of unemployment in the Liverpool, Riverside constituency at the most recent date both as a number and as a percentage.

Mr. Lee: In September 1988 the number of unemployed claimants in the Liverpool, Riverside parliamentary constituency was 9,625. The Department does not calculate unemployment rates for areas smaller than travel-to-work areas. The September 1988 figures include some over-recording.

Vehicle Numbers (Fraud)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will describe facilities provided to him by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre, Swansea to enable his fraud officers to trace vehicle numbers of claimants; whether he has any figures for the number of such inquiries made by any of his fraud officers; and what controls he has established to ensure that such information is used only for legitimate purposes.

Mr. Lee: The Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre provide investigators from my Department with non-fee-paying tracing facilities. This enables us to identify the registered keepers of vehicles involved in suspected cases of benefit fraud.

The information requested on the number of inquiries made by my officials is not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate costs.

All investigative work undertaken by fraud offices is subject to management controls.

Earnings

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the estimated numbers of part-time and full-time adult male and female manual and non-manual workers from whom a sample was taken for the purpose of the latest new earnings survey; and if he will provide information showing the increase in median earnings in each case since 1979 relative to the increase in the gross domestic product deflator and in the retail price index.

Mr. Lee: Numbers in the new earnings survey sample are published in the table 36, part B of the 1988 report, a copy of which is available in the Library. The percentage increases in median earnings since 1979 after deflating by the gross domestic product (factor cost) deflator and the retail price index respectively are provided in the table:

	Deflated by: GDP deflator per cent.	RPI per cent.
Full-time adult males
Manual	13	11
Non-Manual	33	30
Full-time adult females
Manual	14	11
Non-Manual	35	32
Part-time adult males	23	21
Part-time adult females	12	9

Separate figures for manual and non-manual part-timers are not available.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for full-time adult male and female employees, respectively, the percentage increase in earnings of the lowest and highest deciles in April of the current year in relation to 1979 deflated by (a) the retail price index and (b) the gross domestic product deflator.

Mr. Lee: The information is provided in the table:

Full-time adult employees	Per cent. Deflated by:— RPI	GDP deflator
Males
Lowest decile	9	12
Highest decile	35	38
Females
Lowest decile	15	18
Highest decile	43	46

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the increase in the earnings of the median adult male manual worker since 1978; what is the corresponding increase in the unit cost of employing the median after deflating the increase in earnings by the increase in output per head in manufacturing; what was the corresponding increase in director's earnings, including profits made on share options; what is the estimated increase in the rate of inflation over the same period; and what conclusions he draws concerning the effect of the increase in the earnings of manual workers and of directors on the rate of inflation.

Mr. Lee: Median earnings for full-time adult manual males increased by 148 per cent. between April 1978 and April 1988. Over the same period, wages and salaries per unit of output for all employees in manufacturing (the only readily available data) increased by 99 per cent. and the retail prices index by 114 per cent. No reliable information on directors' earnings is readily available. Pay is a matter for negotiation between employers and employees; if pay settlements are too high, employment will be adversely affected.

YTS

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether the bridging allowance payable to 16 or 17-year-olds awaiting a YTS place is assessed on a five-day, six-day or seven-day weekly period.

Mr. Cope: YTS bridging allowance is paid for a five-day period, Monday to Friday.

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people in each travel-to-work area were in receipt of the YTS bridging allowance on 4 November.

Mr. Cope: This information is not available for travel-to-work areas. The following table gives the number of people on bridging allowance by region on 2 November and 10 November.

	2 November	10 November
London and South East	4,447	1,447
South West	1,347	646
West Midlands	3,575	1,099
East Midlands	1,898	1,138
Yorkshire and Humberside	3,765	1,360
North West	5,517	1,984
Northern	2,776	880
Wales	1,965	743
Scotland	6,572	2,076
Great Britain	31,862	11,373

British Shipbuilders plc

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the total number of former employees of British Shipbuilders plc who have received 13 weeks' arrears of unemployment benefit following the test case in Southampton involving a former employee of the company; what the average payment was; from which of his Department's offices the payments were made to the ex-employees; and what was the total amount paid out.

Mr. Lee: Information is not available in the precise form requested, as records are not kept of unemployment benefit payments arising from claims made in any particular set of circumstances. However, claims for unemployment benefit made by ex-British Shipbuilders employees who were disallowed because of the 13-week payment they received have now been reviewed. Those claimants who had not been paid 312 days of unemployment benefit (the maximum amount payable in any period of unemployment) should by now have received payment of the arrears due. Payments have been made from the offices where the application for arrears were made.

My Department has also authorised special payments to those ex-British Shipbuilders employees who at the time of their redundancy did not make claim to unemployment benefit, either on the advice of their unemployment benefit office or for some other good reason. The number qualifying for these payments, up until September 1988, is 8,389, giving a total of £2,514,265·59 being paid out. The average amount of these payments is £299·71.

Equestrian Employees

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to seek to increase the wages, holiday and sick pay, and improving the living conditions of equestrian employees.

Mr. Nicholls: None. Terms and conditions of employment are a matter for employers and employees or their representatives to determine. Sick pay is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security.

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the average weekly pay for equestrian workers employed in stables, riding schools, stud farms, hunting and livery yards.

Mr. Nicholls: Earnings information by occupation is not available at the level of detail requested.

Unleaded Petrol

Sir Philip Goodhart: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what instructions he has given for the modification of cars used by his Department so that they can use unleaded petrol.

Mr. Lee: My Department's policy is that all official cars capable of being converted to run on unleaded petrol are so converted at the earliest practicable opportunity; vehicles which cannot be converted are gradually being replaced by those which can run on unleaded petrol.

Tobacco Industry

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have been employed in the tobacco industry in each of the past five years.

Mr. Lee: The information is as follows:

Employees in employment in the tobacco industry[1] in Great Britian

June of each year
1984	23,500
1985	20,700
1986	17,100
1987	15,100
1988	13,500

[1] Activity Heading 4290 of the 1980 Standard Industrial Classification.

The figures are unadjusted for the effects of seasonal variations and are subject to considerable potential estimation error due to the relatively small number of employees in the industry.

Small Businesses

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps his Department has taken to encourage small businesses in the Nottingham, North constituency.

Mr. Cope: I am responsible for co-ordinating policy affecting small businesses throughout the Government.

Specific Department of Employment measures of particular help for small businesses which are available in the Nottingham, North area include: the small firms service, which provides information and business counselling to new and established firms; the small firms centre in Nottingham dealt with 5,193 inquiries between April and October 1988 and delivered some 566 initial counselling sessions for the Nottingham region alone. In the same area there are currently 1,838 people operating under the enterprise allowance scheme which enables those on benefit to start a business. Since the introduction of the loan guarantee scheme in June 1981 some 1,318 loans to the value of £44,380,000 have been guaranteed, as at 31 October 1988, in the east midlands region.

This Department has also supported the local enterprise agency in Nottingham, which provides advice and guidance to small businesses in that area. This assistance was first given under the local enterprise agency grant scheme and this year additionally under the local enterprise agency project scheme. The Training Agency operates a minutes of business training programmes of particular value to small businesses.

ENERGY

Electricity Generation

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what percentage of electricity is generated by nuclear power and by coal in the United States of America, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Japan, Australia, New Zealand, Canada and in each of the European Community countries.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The percentages are as follows:

Percentage of electricity generation by fuel type 1986

[1] approximate figure

This information is based on data contained in the IEA publication "Coal Information 1988".

Table 13—"Electricity Production by Fuel".

"Coal Information 1988" also contains estimates and projections of these countries' electricity generation programmes in 1987 and future years.

Similar information for the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics is not readily available.

Petroleum Engineering (Safety)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if, pursuant to his reply of 22 July, Official Report, column 884, he will disaggregate the figures for (a) operations and (b) safety for each of the years shown.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The figures for operations and safety cannot be disaggregated.

Safety has always been and will remain an integral part of the duties of all inspectorate staff.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if, pursuant to his reply of 22 July, Official Report, column 884, what has been the annual budget and the annual staffing complement of the section of his Department with responsibility for implementation of the proposals in the White Paper "Lifting the Burden" (Cmnd. 9571).

Mr. Parkinson: There are two staff whose duties include responsibility for implementing the proposals in Command 9571. The estimated costs of their work on this activity, including administrative support, are as follows:

	Cost £
1985-86 (part year)	2,400
1986-87	5,100
1987-88	6,300

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy, whether pursuant to his answer of 22 July, Official Report, column 883, if he will list in the Official Report the names of the companies granted exemptions from safety regulations for each year since 1979, including details of which off shore installation the exemptions applied to.

Mr. Peter Morrison: This information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Mudd: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy, if he will indicate the number of divers who have made representations to his Department since the Piper Alpha disaster on matters of the enhanced safety of operations in offshore installations.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I have received five specific representations from divers.

Safety Directorate

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his reply of 22 July, Official Report, column 884, what has been the annual budget of the safety directorate since 1979.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Annual budgets for the safety directorate are not separately identified within my Department's estimates for administrative expenditure.

Nottingham

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will meet Nottingham city council to discuss the east Eastcroft district heating scheme and other energy related matters relevant to the city of Nottingham.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I have no plans to meet Nottingham city council at present. However, I am aware of the Eastcroft district heating scheme, which earlier this year received a grant from my energy efficiency office for an extended energy survey.

Nuclear Technology

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if, pursuant to his answer of 16 June, Official Report, column 102, any further transfers of nuclear technology have been approved.

Mr. Michael Spicer: No.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he has any estimate as to whether any unauthorised transfer of nuclear material, technology, reprocessing and waste management has taken place since 1979.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I am not aware of any such unauthorised transfer.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish the assurances given by Japan in connection with the recent transfer of nuclear technology, in line with the policy on such exports as shown in the Official Report, of 31 March 1976, column 515.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) on 16 December 1987 at column 516.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give details of the transfer of nuclear technology to Japan referred to in the Official Report, of 16 June, column 182.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The transfer referred to in my reply to the hon. Member on 16 June 1988 at column 182 was of reprocessing technology. Specific details of individual contracts are commercially confidential.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will extend to transfers to the United States of America the considerations on the export of nuclear equipment, material or technology as set out in the Official Report, of 31 March 1976, column 515.

Mr. Michael Spicer: All civil exports of nuclear materials, equipment and technology are made within the guidelines set out in the statement referred to by the hon. Member.

Lead-free Petrol

Sir Philip Goodhew: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what instructions he has given for the modification of cars used by his Department so that they can use unleaded petrol.

Mr. Parkinson: My Department owns only one vehicle, a van, which is unsuitable for conversion to run on unleaded petrol. Full consideration will be given to one capable of so operating when the vehicle is due for replacement. The Crown Suppliers have issued instructions that all vehicles provided by them for departmental use which can be converted to run on unleaded petrol should be so converted at the earliest opportunity.

Privatisation

Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he proposes to privatise British Electricity Ltd.

Mr. Michael Spicer: British Electricity International is to be transferred to the CEGB, and will eventually become a wholly-owned subsidiary of the larger of the two CEGB successor generation companies to be formed under the Government's privatisation proposals.

Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he proposes to privatise British Nuclear Fuels plc together with subsidiary and associated companies.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Government have no plans at present to sell shares in British Nuclear Fuels plc.

Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he proposes to offer for sale that part of the National Nuclear Corporation Ltd. which at present is held by the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) on 27 July 1988 at column 292. The sale of the shareholding was completed on 31 August 1988.

Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he proposes to sell the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have no present plans to do so.

Nuclear Power Station (East London)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has given any consideration to proposals to build a nuclear power station in east London; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: No.

Mersey Barrage

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects to make a statement on the feasibility of the construction of the Mersey barrage.

Mr. Michael Spicer: A decision on the next steps will be taken after completion of the current £1·3 million phase II feasibility studies at the end of 1990. The studies are being undertaken by the Mersey Barrage Company with 50 per cent. financial support from the Department of Energy.

Magnox Reactors

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) on what date the Magnox nuclear power station at Berkeley was last refuelled; and what was the tonnage of fuel loaded at this time;

(2) what is the frequency of refuelling for the United Kingdom's civil Magnox reactors are under the management of the Central Electricity Generating Board.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Unless there are difficulties with the refuelling equipment all CEGB Magnox reactors are refuelled continuously on load on a channel-by-channel basis. Fuel is discharged from a reactor when it has reached full burn-up. Because it had to be shut down for refuelling following problems with its fuel handling equipment, Berkeley power station is refuelled on a batch basis. Refuelling (of reactor 1) last took place between 4 April and 17 July 1988 and was at the minimum level required to avoid excessive power loss during its remaining planned period of operation. Reactor 2 was shut down on 27 October 1988.

Radiation (Yorkshire)

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has in regard to recent reports of a cloud of irradiated material passing over Yorkshire.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) to the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Fearn) on 11 November 1988.

British Nuclear Fuels Ltd.

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy which countries and organisations have signed contracts with British Nuclear Fuels Limited for the reprocessing of nuclear fuel which do not include options for the return of the waste; what are the approximate volumes of low intermediate and high level waste material which are expected to arise from each of these contracts; and whether the Government proposes to dispose of all such waste in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Since 1976, BNFL's contracts for the reprocessing of overseas spent fuel have contained options for the return of wastes. The Government intend that reprocessing contracts with overseas customers should continue to contain such options, that the options should be exercised and that the wastes should be returned.

BNFL's overseas reprocessing contracts before 1976 did not contain such options. These contracts were signed with utilities in Canada, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, Japan, Spain, Sweden and Switzerland. The volume arising from each country is commercially confidential.

The total volumes of waste which are likely to arise from BNFL's pre-1976 contracts are:

	Cubic metres
High-level waste	100
Intermediate-level waste	3,000
Low-level waste	20,000

These wastes will represent only a small proportion of total wastes arising in the United Kingdom. They will be disposed of along with other United Kingdom waste but will not require extra disposal facilities to be provided here.

European Community (Energy Policy)

18. Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on progress towards the development of a European Community energy policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Parkinson [pursuant to the reply 7 November 1988]: Baroness Hooper, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Energy, and Sir David Hannay KCMG, permanent representative to the European Communities represented the United Kingdom at the Energy Council on 8 November 1988.

The Council adopted a recommendation on co-operation between public electricity supply companies and auto-producers using new and renewable and certain other sources of electricity. It agreed conclusions on the Commission's review of progress made by Member states against the 1995 Community energy objectives. On the Commission's internal energy market paper the Council agreed broad conclusions on an initial approach and also noted the Commission's programme to the end of 1989 on some priority areas. These three matters had been held over, since the Council had been unable to reach agreement at the last meeting in June because of policy considerations as reported by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State in his answer to the House on 20 June 1988 at column 411. Draft recommendations in the oil market and refinery sector were remitted to officials for further consideration.

EC (Local Government)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) whether Her Majesty's Government will be carrying out opinion No. 138 (1988) based on the text adopted by the Standing Committee of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe on 30 June, which sets out the Parliamentary Assembly's views on resolutions adopted by the Standing Conference of Local and Regional Authorities of Europe in October 1987, and March 1988, in respect of the resolution on the European Charter of Local Self-Government and the European Communities;

(2) whether Her Majesty's Government will be carrying out opinion No. 138 (1988) based on the text adopted by the Standing Committee of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe on 30 June which sets out the Parliamentary Assembly's views on resolutions adopted by the Standing Conference of Local and Regional Authorities of Europe in October 1987 and March 1988 in respect of the resolution on the structures, management and finance of rural authorities.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I have been asked to reply.

Opinion No. 138 (1988) expressed the views of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe on a number of resolutions adopted by the Standing Conference of Local and Regional Authorities of Europe. It is addressed to institutions of the Council of Europe and does not call for direct action by Her Majesty's Government.

SCOTLAND

Tourism

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what selective investments in developments at seaside resorts in Scotland have been made from Government tourism finance; and how much.

Mr. Rifkind [holding answer 7 November 1988]: Since 1 April 1987, assistance offered by the Scottish tourist board and the Highlands and Islands Development Board to capital projects in seaside localities has totalled £3,634,443.

Rating Reform

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he intends to introduce legislation to provide that those individuals who consistently refuse to pay the community charge will be ineligible for election to the House of Commons or the European Parliament.

Mr. Rifkind: I have no plans to do so.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) whether he will introduce regulations to stop access to an extract of the community charge register by debt-collectors and mail order companies; and how he intends to protect the privacy of an individual when the extract of the register is available for public inspection for purposes not connected to the community charge;

(2) when he now proposes to introduce regulations to restrict the sale of an extract of the community charge register.

Mr. Rifkind: Under section 20(4) and (5) of the Abolition of Domestic Rates Etc. (Scotland) Act 1987, as amended by the Local Government Finance Act 1988, extracts from the community charges register consisting only of addresses and names (and in the case of certain collective community charge premises, the multiplier) will be prepared for public inspection on 1 April and 1 October each year, beginning in 1989. I have no plans to restrict the availability for inspection of these extracts. The 1987 Act as amended, however, no longer provides for the sale of such extracts.

Liver Transplants

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he is having concerning liver transplantation; and if he will make a statment.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The National Specialist Services Advisory Committee has been asked to consider the matter and report in due course to me.

Single Parents

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list in the Official Report the total amount of funding made available by Social Work Services Group to the Scottish Council for Single Parents in each of the past five years;

(2) What is the projected level of funding to be made available to the Scottish Council for Single Parents by Social Work Services Group in each of the next three financial years.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Funding under section 9 of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 (for training purposes) and under section 10(1) (for headquarters expenses) has been provided as follows:

	Section 9	Section 10(1)		Total
		Current	Capital
	£	£	£	£
1984-85	15,164	23,475	5,872	44,511

It is not possible to indicate future levels of support at this stage.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what additional funding has been made available by the Scottish Office to reduce waiting lists for cardiac surgery in the Grampian health board area following the announcement of 27 April that the cardiac surgery unit at Aberdeen royal infirmary was to be extended and centrally funded.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: An additional sum of £370,000 has been made available in 1988/89 to fund cardiac surgery operations at Aberdeen royal infirmary. Capital funding of £224,000 is also being provided.

Unleaded Petrol

Sir Philip Goodhart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what instructions he has given for the modification of cars used by his Department so that they can use unleaded petrol.

Mr. Rifkind: The Scottish Office has a policy for the progressive conversion of its official car fleet. To date some 60 per cent. of our vehicles have been modified; we shall ensure that all new cars have engines which can use unleaded petrol.

Greater Glasgow Health Board (Catering)

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) on what date the details of the in-house bid for the catering contract at Greater Glasgow health board were first examined;

(2) on what date Greater Glasgow health board received the bids from (a) Sebhexo, (b) the in-house team; and (c) any other bidders for the catering contract at Glasgow royal infirmary;

(3) what information he has as to the purpose of the recent visit to Boston by the Greater Glasgow health board managers and as to who took part; and what companies or people they met.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not held centrally.

Water Pollution

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many cases during each of the last nine years were found of contamination or pollution of water used by the whisky and other drink industries in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not collected centrally in that form.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which are the pollutants of drinking water in Scotland; and which are the sources of drinking water most affected.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The quality of drinking water is regulated by EC directive 80/778/EEC which sets maximum (or minimum) admissible concentrations for about sixty substances in drinking water. The directive makes provision for departures from these standards.

Article 9 makes provision for derogations from the directive to take account of situations arising from the nature and structure of the ground of the supply source and from exceptional meteorological conditions. Such derogations may not relate to toxic or microbiological factors or constitute a public health hazard. In Scotland 148 supplies carry derogations mostly relating to colour, pH, iron or manganese.

Article 20 makes provision for a delay in complying with the directive's standards provided that an action programme and appropriate timetable to improve the quality of water are put forward. 154 supplies in Scotland are at present subject to delays in respect of aluminium, iron, manganese, lead and coliforms.

If the hon. Member is concerned about the quality of particular drinking water supplies, specified details can be given.

Housing (Public Expenditure)

(2) what research is currently being conducted into the effectiveness of video surveillance of the general public by the police forces in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Scottish Home and Health Department's advice to chief constables is that visual surveillance equipment should be used only when essential for the efficient conduct of police operations. The use of such equipment is an operational matter for chief constables, and there is no central record of its use. No Scottish force has undertaken research on this matter.

VAT (Ancillary Service Contracts)

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether health boards will have to pay value added tax on those contracts for ancillary services which, as a result of competitive tendering, have gone to private companies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: There are provisions allowing for the recovery of VAT in circumstances where boards would otherwise be penalised financially for putting services out to tender.

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had concerning the payment of value added tax on private contracts for the provision of National Health Service ancillary services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: VAT policy is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

House Repossessions

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information is available to him on the number of houses repossessed in Scotland for each year since 1974 by (a) building societies and (b) other mortgage lenders.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Building Societies Association publishes statistics on the number of repossessions by building societies in the United Kingdom as a whole. No corresponding information is available for Scotland only. No information is held centrally on other mortgage lenders.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report a list of those centres which operate needle exchange schemes for drug addicts.

providing a right of access by parents and older pupils to education records will include the records maintained on pupils by the education welfare service of local education authorities.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. and learned Friend will consider this in the light of responses to the consultation paper on access to school records which he will issue shortly.

Court Cases

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether his Department has any information of any case which was marked for no proceedings by reason of resources not being available to deal with them within the judicial system in any fiscaldom in Scotland between 1984 and 30 June 1988; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 11 November 1988]: Some minor cases have been marked for no proceedings for this reason although no detailed analysis is available.

Royal Ordnance Centre, Clydebank Business Park

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assistance has been received from the Scottish Development Department by the royal ordnance centre in Clydebank business park.

Mr. Rifkind [holding answer 7 November 1988]: The centre received direct assistance in the form of regional development grant.

Private Medical Insurance

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will give the estimated number of people who have taken out private medical insurance in Scotland;

(2) if he will give the estimated number of persons, including dependants, in Scotland who have some form of private medical insurance through their employers.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 27 June 1988]: It is estimated that 96,000 people (210,000 including dependants) in Scotland have some form of private medical insurance. Of the 96,000 subscribers, 60,000 hold medical insurance purchased through companies.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Abortion

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if in view of the recommendation in the recent independent report of the multidisciplinary committee, "The Nation's Health, A Strategy for the 1990s," he plans to seek to extend the Abortion Act 1967 to Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: No. The Government believe that legislation to reform the abortion laws should not be introduced unless it is likely to command broad support in the Province. This policy has been followed by successive Governments and up to the present it has been concluded that support for a change in the law does not exist. The Government will keep the situation under review and will be prepared to modify their policy to take account of any significant shift in public opinion which may occur.

Government Departments (South Down)

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans have been made to decentralise Government Departments to South Down.

Mr. Ian Stewart: No plans have been made to decentralise Government Departments to South Down.

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received about decentralisation of Government Departments to South Down.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The hon. Member wrote to me on 27 July opposing the planned closure of the Downpatrick valuation and lands office in the South Down constituency, and advocating that public offices should be decentralised from the Greater Belfast area and from larger towns in Northern Ireland. I replied on 31 August.

One of these persons was subsequently rearrested by the police under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 and was charged with scheduled offences. Statistics are not available to show the number of persons who were released without charge or were subsequently rearrested by the police under other powers. One person was arrested under section 13 of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 and was released without charge.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons were detained in connection with terrorist-type offences under Acts other than the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Acts and the Emergency Provisions (Northern Ireland) Acts in the current year.

Mr. Ian Stewart [holding answer 1 November 1988]: This information is not available from existing records without incurring disproportionate cost.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give separately for magistrates' courts and crown courts for 1986, 1987 and the first six months of 1988, the number of cases involving non-scheduled offences in which pleas of not guilty were entered; in how many of these cases verdicts of not guilty were returned; and in how many of these cases trial was by jury.

Further data will be published in the Northern Ireland "Annual Abstract of Statistics" as they become available.

Fugitive Offenders

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will itemise the ways in which the rules of evidence and court procedure in the Republic of Ireland make it difficult to use the Criminal Law (Jurisdiction) Act 1975 and its Irish counterpart, the Criminal Law (Jurisdiction) Act 1976, to have fugitive offenders tried in the Republic of Ireland, rather than seek their extradition.

Mr. Ian Stewart [holding answer 4 November 1988]: I have nothing to add to my reply of 27 October. Since each case is different and gives rise to different considerations it is impossible to provide an itemised list.

Disabled People

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on his policy with regard to the proposal from the Northern Ireland Council on Disability that a working group be established representing all Government Departments with an interest in the second action programme for disabled people and the voluntary sector, to co-ordinate and represent the interests of Northern Ireland.

59. Mr. Ray Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many applications have been made by 16 and 17-year-olds to be granted income support on grounds of severe hardship.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: During the eight-week period since general entitlement to income support was withdrawn from 16 and 17-year-olds, 943 applications for a direction by the Secretary of State under the severe hardship provision have been received. In 607 cases (64 per cent.) a direction was given to enable payment to be made and in 336 cases (46 per cent.) a direction was refused.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how and why the income support personal allowance differs from the illustrative rates in the technical annex to "Reform of Social Security" (Cmnd. 9691), uprated to take account of changes in the Rossi price index for the periods taken into account in the 1986, 1987 and 1988 benefit upratings and increased in respect of the 20 per cent. rates contribution.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The income support personal allowances quoted in the technical annex to "Reform of Social Security" (Cmnd. 9691) were for illustrative purposes only. Comparisons between those and the rates of income support are not, therefore, appropriate.

14. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he last met representatives of war widows and pensioners; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. Friend discussed a wide range of matters with representatives of war pensioners and widows at a reception given for them on 21 September. Mr. Peter Lloyd: None.

34. Ms. Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in what ways the planned closure of 20 of his Department's offices, including the Finsbury Park office, will improve the quality of service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: There are no plans to close 20 DSS offices in London but some will be replaced with improved premises, including Finsbury Park office.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he intends to increase the social fund budget in line with inflation.

20. Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he intends to increase the social fund in line with inflation.

Mr. Scott: The total sum available for payments from the social fund in 1989-90 will be the same as for 1988-89. The budget for community care grants will be £60 million and the gross budget for loans will be £143 million.

19. Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the operation of the social fund.

Mr. Scott: My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State made a full statement in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk North, (Mr. Howell) on 9 November at columns 223-4.

Efficiency Measures

22. Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action the Government are taking to increase the efficiency of the social security system.

Mr. Scott: We are making very good progress in improving the efficiency and effectiveness of the social security system. The new benefits we brought in in April have simplified the system and made it easier to understand, both for claimants and for staff. As a result fewer people are finding it necessary to visit their local social security offices and the time taken to clear benefit claims has been reduced, from a national average of six days for the last year of supplementary benefit to five days for the first six months of income support. Similarly, national error rates have also improved from 11·6 per cent. to 9·7 per cent. We recognise that further progress still needs to be made and to help with this we are setting improved targets and standards of service. For example, a comprehensive system of quality assessment of local office contacts with the public has been developed.

These changes are complemented by our huge computerisation programme which is transforming the administration of social security, bringing major benefits for the taxpayer and all who use the social security system. Following the successful computerisation of the family credit system in April, trials of the initial version of the new pensions system and the central index system are now under way in the first local offices. A new microcomputer-based system has also recently been brought into operation for the retirement pension forecast service, providing a quick, personalised reply to most inquiries. The public reaction to this has been overwhelmingly favourable. We are also taking further steps to provide a better and more efficient service to the public by relocating some work away from some of our most hard-pressed local offices. I have also asked officials to advise whether social security operations could with advantage be run as a next steps agency or agencies and to report by the end of the year. There is also an active, and ongoing, programme of efficiency scrutinies which has today yielded savings of over £80 million and over 4,000 posts.

Our staff are themselves taking an active part in helping to improve efficiency, by making increasing use of the Department's suggestions scheme which has saved at least £5 million this year alone.

Invalidity Benefit

23. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what information he has about the take-up of invalidity benefit amongst patients discharged from long-stay hospitals.

Mr. Scott: No such information is held, but there is no evidence to suggest that former patients in long-stay hospitals with a contributory benefit entitlement fail to receive the full invalidity benefit due to them on discharge.

Cold Weather Payments

24. Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received concerning his Department's arrangements for cold weather payments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I have received no recent representations. I would like to remind the hon. Member about the significant improvements to the cold weather payments scheme announced on 3 November 1988 in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) at column 752. First, eligibility was extended to families on income support with a child under age five rather than under age two. Secondly, the rules for measuring periods of cold weather were altered so that any spell of seven consecutive days when the temperature averages 0 C or below will trigger a payment.

These changes roughly double the potential for making cold weather payments and are in addition to the improvements announced on 7 October whereby, for the first time, eligibility was extended to income support pensioners age 60 to 64 and non-householders receiving income support who fall into the eligible categories.

Child Benefit

25. Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the value, in 1988 prices, of the child benefit allowance, had it since its inception been increased annually by the equivalent of the rise in the value of (a) the retail prices index, and (b) average earnings.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Child benefit was phased in between April 1977 and April 1979. Taking the April 1979 rate of £4 per child, the value at April 1988 would have been (a) £7·79, based on the general index of retail prices and (b) £9·64, based on the index of average earnings: whole economy (seasonally adjusted).

26. Mr. Allen Adams: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy to publish a long-term strategy for child benefit.

Mr. Moore: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) earlier today.

55. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what recent representations he has received concerning the level of child benefit.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We received a number of representations from organisations and individuals about child benefit in anticipation of the annual review of social security benefit rates.

58. Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the percentage take-up of child benefit.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: 98 per cent.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the cost of (a) doubling child benefit and (b) doubling the benefit and making it taxable.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 7 November]: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) today. The reply to this question provides broadly similar information.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the gross cost of raising child benefit to £20 for the first and £15 for subsequent children, the net cost after making the benefit taxable, and the saving in each of the other allowances for children on the assumption that these are reduced by (a) 50 per cent. and (b) 100 per cent. of the increase in child benefit.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 9 November 1988]: Raising the weekly value of child benefit to £20 for the first child and £15 for subsequent children might increase gross annual expenditure by £6·6 billion at 1988-89 prices. Increased income tax revenue and reduced expenditure on the main income-related benefits might imply a net cost of £2·8 billion. The additional net saving, if the child dependancy increases to the national insurance benefits were reduced by 50 per cent. of the increase in child benefit, might be of the order of £40-£45 million. If child allowances were reduced by 100 per cent. of the child benefit increase, the net extra saving might be around £70 million.

Benefits (Uprating)

27. Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received on the recent uprating of social security benefits.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We receive a variety of representations on many issues concerning the uprating of social security benefits.

Social Fund

29. Mr. Eastham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he intends to increase the social fund budget in line with inflation.

39. Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he intends to increase the social fund budget in line with inflation.

43. Mr. Boyes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he intends to increase the social fund budget in line with inflation.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I refer the hon. Members to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell) on 3 November at column 752.

Social Fund

30. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of social fund benefits to date has been used.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: As at 30 September 1988 gross expenditure on the discretionary part of the social fund was 34 per cent. of the budget for budgeting loans and crisis loans and 18·5 per cent. of the budget for community care grants.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he will list in the Official Report the reallocations of local office social fund budgets that have taken place since the budgets were announced on 4 November 1987 and the periods to which the reallocated budgets relate.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The following changes to local office social fund budget allocations for 1988-89 have been announced since 4 November 1987.

Occupational Pensions

32. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps he has taken to encourage people to make greater provisions for their old age through occupational pensions.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Since October 1987 everyone in an employer's pension scheme has been able to pay extra contributions to a separate pension plan of their own. From April this year all employers' schemes have to accept extra contributions from members who wish to make them. Employers who want to provide a contract-out pension scheme can now choose between a salary-related scheme, where the rules have been simplified, and a money purchase scheme where employers wish to keep their pension commitment to a known level. This will also encourage employers to come together and set up industry-wide schemes. In addition, a special incentive payment worth an extra 2 per cent. of that part of the employee's earnings on which national insurance contributions are paid at the lower contracted-out rate, is payable until 1993 for both money purchase and salary-related schemes.

Mr. Conway: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action the Government have taken to encourage employers to set up occupational pension schemes.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Since April employers have been able to use a money purchase scheme for contracting out of SERPS, thereby keeping their pension commitments to a known level. As further encouragement, the 2 per cent. special incentive payments will be made to new occupational pension schemes, both salary-related or money purchase, which have been set up for the first time since 1 January 1986. These payments will be made until April 1993. Some 5,000 new contracted-out money purchase schemes have already been set up since April.

Income Support

35. Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the number of persons claiming income support in the Brent area.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The London borough of Brent is served by the Cricklewood, Neasden, Harlesden, Hendon, Harrow, Edgware, Notting Hill and Ealing local offices of the Department although the boundaries are not conterminous. The total number of persons claiming income support in these offices as at 31 August 1988, the latest information available, is 79,566.

[Source: 100 per cent. count of cases in action, which may include a small number of cases not actually in receipt of income support. This figure is provisional and subject to amendment.)

Independent Living Fund

36. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claims have been made for assistance from the independent living fund; and how many payments have so far been made.

48. Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claims have been made for assistance from the independent living fund; and how many payments have so far been made.

Mr. Scott: As of 8 November 1988 the fund had received 2,203 applications. Some 123 awards were in payment and a further 134 offers had been made to applicants. Some 1,380 applications were in the course of assessment by the fund's office and its visiting social workers.

Stutterers (Telephone Bills)

38. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will arrange for assistance to be given to stutterers with their telephone bills; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: It is the responsibility of individual local authorities to decide whether they need to provide assistance to disabled people living within their area for the costs of installation and rental of a telephone.

Housing Benefit

40. Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will review the operation of housing benefit as it affects single parents.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Government have announced that they will monitor the effects of the recent social security reforms and monitoring the operation of the new housing benefit scheme is part of that exercise. However, the new scheme does already recognise the specific needs of lone parents through the premium and disregard structure and by the fact that the system gives more help than the old where rents are unavoidably high. The effect of the new system on individuals will vary widely, but transitional protection is available for lone parents where they saw a sharp drop in their benefit at the point of change in April.

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what steps he is taking to clear the backlog of outstanding applications for transitional housing benefit payments;

(2) how many applications for transitional housing benefit assistance have been received; how many have been approved; and how many were still outstanding at the most recent convenient date.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The transitional payments unit has received 370,138 applications up to 8 November. Of this total 128,529 have been assessed as successful for payment and 117,818 applications are outstanding; 91,447 of these on 8 November are waiting on the return of inquiry forms from local authorities. The transitional payments unit is writing to or telephoning local authorities in all cases where inquiry forms should have been returned by October.

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) when an application for transitional housing benefit payments was received from Mrs. Irene Towndrow of 108 John Wilson street, SE18; why it has been delayed; and when it will be processed;

(2) when an application for transitional housing benefit payments was received from Mrs. M. Dales of 6 Queensborough House, Felixstowe road SE2; why it has been delayed; and when it will be processed.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Mrs. Towndrow's application was received on 11 July and Mrs. Dale's on 21 June. The delay in these cases has been caused by the local authority's failure to return the inquiry forms issued by the transitional payments unit. The applications were processed on 10 November when the unit obtained the necessary information by telephoning the London borough of Greenwich.

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when an application for transitional housing benefit payments was received from Mrs. E. Braithwaite of 29 Marshall Path SE28; why it has been delayed; and when it will be processed.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Mrs. Braithwaite's application was received on 13 June. The delay in this case was caused by a delay in the local authority referring the inquiry form to the agency which administers housing benefit for its private sector tenants. The application was processed on 7 November.

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when an application for transitional housing benefit payments was received from Mrs. Preates of 46 Malthus Path SE28; why it has been delayed; and when it will be processed.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Mrs. Preates' application was received on 13 June. In this case the inquiry form, issued by the transitional payments unit on 7 July was sent to the wrong local authority. It was redirected to the correct local authority on 7 September but was not returned until 10 November because of a delay in the local authority referring the inquiry form to the agency which administers housing benefit for its private sector tenants.

The application was processed on 10 November.

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Members for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett), for Livingston (Mr. Cook) and for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) of 7 November, on what basis the estimate was given in a written answer to the hon. Member of Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs) of 16 June, Official Report, column 280 that some 350,000 people could benefit from the housing benefit transitional payments.

Mr. Nicholas Scott: The original published estimates for the number of possible beneficiaries from the transitional payments scheme were derived mainly from the same model that produced the tables in the "Impact of the Reformed Structure of the Income Related Benefits", published in October last year, and assumed that all those entitled would claim. To the extent that they were an over-estimate this could be due to a number of factors such as improved employment opportunities and an actual take-up rate of less than 100 per cent.

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been the average value of payments made by the housing benefit transitional payments unit.

Mr. Scott: Of the housing benefit transitional payments made to date the average weekly value is a little over £4.

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of applications to the housing benefit transitional payments unit have been assessed as ineligible for payment.

Mr. Scott: Of the 370,138 applications received at the transitional payments unit 252,320 have so far been processed. Up until 8 November 123,791 cases had been assessed as ineligible for payment.

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will place in the Library the housing benefit expenditure returns from local authorities.

Mr. Scott: I have placed in the Library local authorities' latest estimates of their housing benefit expenditure for 1987-88 and 1988-89.

Personal Pensions

41. Mr. Bright: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what incentives are being provided for people to take out personal pensions.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Department will pay for people who take out personal pensions "minimum contributions", which are made up of a partial rebate of national insurance contributions and, until April 1993, a special incentive payment. In most cases the payments by the Department will include tax relief on the employee's share of the minimum contribution. People taking out a personal pension before 6 April 1989 will be able to backdate membership to 6 April 1987 and claim an extra year's minimum contributions, including the incentive.

Benefits (Computerisation)

42. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what progress has been made on the computerisation of the benefits system.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have made very good progress over the last year with the operational strategy, our programme to computerise the administration of social security benefits. After several years of intense groundwork this ambitious programme is now coming to fruition. Implementation of the first systems is now beginning and over the next few years they will transform social security operations, bringing substantial benefits to taxpayers and clients alike.

The major achievements of the last year have been:—

(a) the development of new systems, based on the microcomputers already installed in local offices, to help administer income support and the social fund;

(b) the development and implementation of a wholly new mainframe computer system to administer the new family credit. This success is particularly significant since the system was built to full operational strategy standards in face of an ambitious timetable and is now proving technically first-rate. It is the first system automatically to assess claims, issue payments, keep records and provide direct "on-line" access for staff enabling them to deal rapidly with inquiries;

(c) the completion of phased implementation of the terminal replacement and inquiry service project which provides unemployment benefit offices with direct access to computer records for inquiry and update purposes. TRES is now working in all unemployment benefit offices and has brought major improvements in efficiency, service to the public and job satisfaction for staff. Work is now under way on the project to replace the existing national unemployment benefit system with an upgraded system built to operational strategy standards;

(d) the implementation last month in the first two pilot local offices of the departmental central index and an early version of the new pensions system. The DCI provides a central index of all clients and represents the first step towards the "whole person" approach whereby each clerk will be able to deal with all aspects of an individual client's social security business. The pensions system currently being piloted is the forerunner of a larger system which will automate the assessment and payment of pensions and provide staff with direct access for inquiries;

(e) the completion of the bulk of design, programming and initial testing on the local office project which will provide assessment, payment, record-keeping and inquiry services for staff dealing with income support. The system is currently undergoing final testing before beginning live operations in the first pilot offices at the end of February 1989.

The new pensions, DCI and LOP systems will be run in a number of pilot local offices in Scotland and the north-west until next autumn. During this period they will be monitored and evaluated before they are gradually extended to all local offices during the period 1989-92. Overall, the implementation of the operational strategy will represent one of the most radical improvements in the history of social security.

Mr. Terry Fields: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he last discussed with trades unions representatives of social security staff the question of computerisation within his Department's offices and the resolution of any problems associated with changed work practices; if he will take steps to ensure that evaluation will have a scientific basis and that the system will not mean any deterioration of service to the public or conditions of staff; and if he will ensure that any trials of computers in local offices are done over an acceptable period of time after consultation with representative organisations.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Department is currently engaged in a large-scale computerisation programme designed to transform the administration of social security. The primary objectives of the programme are to improve service to the public, provide more satisfying jobs for our staff and to reduce administrative costs by improving efficiency. This programme has been discussed with trade union representatives throughout its development and these discussions, which include issues associated with changes in working practices, are continuing on a regular monthly basis. The new computer systems are being extensively tested prior to their release and are then being run in a limited number of pilot offices prior to national implementation. This period of pilot running began last month and will continue until the middle of next year. During this period we will be carefully monitoring and evaluating the systems using an objective evaluation package which is currently being developed.

Among the criteria covered will be the need to maintain standards of service to the public.

Retirement Provision

44. Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what new choices his Department has now made available for people to provide for their own retirement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Instead of remaining in SERPS or in an employer's pension scheme, employees are now able to choose their own personal pension scheme. For those who are in an employer's scheme there is the opportunity to make extra contributions to a separate pension plan of their own (a freestanding additional voluntary contribution), or to make such contributions to an employer's scheme, which is obliged to accept them. We have also made it easier for employers to set up pensions schemes for their employees, including a new money purchase scheme.

Community Care

45. Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he intends making a statement on his policy on the social security implications of community care.

Mr. Scott: The social security implications of community care policies are being taken into account as part of the Government's consideration of the recommendations in Sir Roy Griffiths' review of community care.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will ensure that, when the community care grants awarded in a month, shown in the tables placed in the Library, are deducted from the outstanding budget balances at the end of the previous month, the result is the same as the outstanding balance at the end of the month in question; and why this had not been the case to date.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The outstanding balance at the end of a particular month will frequently not be equal to the outstanding balance at the end of the preceding month after deducting the amount of awards made in the month in question. That is because the outstanding balance figure takes account not only of awards made in the month but also of awards which have been cancelled or returned and of additional amounts paid following a review. I shall ensure that this is made clear when the tables for October are placed in the Library.

Claimants

46. Mr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what special arrangements are made for social security claimants who move around the country in convoys.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: People who move around the country in convoys may be claiming any one or more of a number of social security benefits. Special arrangements are occasionally made to deal with their claims for income support and unemployment benefits.

Those who claim income support and/or unemployment benefit are bound by the same rules as other claimants, one of which is that they must either be available and registered for work at an unemployment benefit office or be sick or otherwise not required to register as unemployed.

When claimants from a convoy arrive at a local DSS office the manager may request the help of a small mobile regional team to deal with the claims. Usually staff from the local unemployment benefit office attend the DSS office in order to speed the process of the convoy claimants registering for work and claiming income support and unemployment benefit. Such extra help is instrumental in minimising the disruption to claimants who live in the area and use the local DSS and unemployment benefit offices. It also enables the convoy claimants to be dealt with swiftly and with due regard to the propriety of their claims.

Pensioners (Income)

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the average income of a single pensioner in 1979 and 1986.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The average total net income of a single pensioner in 1979 was £55·42 (at 1986 prices) rising to £69·73 in 1986. These figures represent an increase in real terms of 25·8 per cent.

52. Mr. Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the average income of a pensioner couple in 1979 and 1986.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The average total net income of a pensioner couple in 1979 was £103·09 (at 1986 prices) rising to £123·76 in 1986. These figures represent an increase in real terms of 20·1 per cent.

Benefits System

49. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what progress has been made in making the benefits system easier for the public to understand and for his Department's staff to administer.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: One of the main aims of the social security reforms introduced in April of this year is to simplify the income-related benefit system both for the public and for staff. The previous benefits were based on independent, and often conflicting, rather than complementary principles. The new benefits structure is more coherent and comprehensible. Income support is based on a simple system of personal allowances, topped up with special premiums for those in a number of priority groups. The premiums provide automatic extra help to these groups and avoid the necessity for intrusive questioning which many seeking additional help found distasteful. The rules for income support form the basis of the rules for both housing benefit and for family credit.

Through the Department's communications strategy, benefit leaflets have been redesigned to make them more easily understood. They now describe benefits and the claims procedure in a clearer and more straightforward manner. Some leaflets are also available in translation for ethnic minority groups.

50. Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people were in receipt of supplementary benefit in 1987-88; and how many people are currently in receipt of income support.

Mr. Scott: I refer the hon. Member to my reply earlier today to the hon. Members for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd), Burnley (Mr. Pike) and Carmarthen (Mr. Williams).

Benefits (Take-up)

51. Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received regarding changes in the level of take-up of benefits since April.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We receive a variety of representations on many issues concerning take-up of benefits. It is not possible to specify all the representations received since April.

Disregards

53. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many representations he has received about raising the level of disregards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I regret that this information is not held.

Leaflets

54. Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will revise leaflet FB23 and remove the words on the YTS reading

"This is a real chance for you to make a good start in life and to get training for skills and a recognised qualification."

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No. Recent surveys have shown that 75 per cent. of young people leaving YTS go into jobs, further education or training. They have also shown that 80 per cent. of those young people consider that they have benefited from their YTS training.

YTS has developed as an attractive and effective initial training scheme which is becoming the normal route into work for young people aged 16 and 17 leaving school. It provides the modern skills and qualifications that help young people get the jobs that the country needs to compete internationally.

Housing Benefit (War Widows and Pensioners)

56. Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the effect of the 1988 housing benefit regulations on war widows and pensioners.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The April 1988 housing benefit reforms have provided for a system that is beter targeted, simpler to understand and to administer, and which provides for a greater degree of accountability in local government. Special treatment within the system which continues to be provided for war widows and war pensioners was increased by 25 per cent. in April by means of the £5 disregard which applies across the income-related benefits. Local authorities continue to have a discretion, as they had under the old scheme, to disregard further amounts of these pensions. The effect of the changes in individual cases will vary widely, but transitional protection is available in those cases where individual war pensioners or war widows saw a sharp drop in their housing benefit as a result of changes to the statutory national scheme.

Community Care Grants

60. Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will initiate a take-up campaign for community care grants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for North Norfolk (Mr. Howell) on 9 November at columns 223-4.

Expenditure

61. Mr. Alison To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security by what percentage expenditure on social security has increased in real terms since 1979.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Expenditure on the social security programme in Great Britain has increased by 33 per cent. in real terms between 1978-79 and 1988-89. This percentage increase reflects the latest estimated outturn for the current financial year announced in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's autumn statement on 1 November 1988.

Transitional Help

4. Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people have applied for transitional help in respect of the changes introduced in April 1988.

Mr. Moore: A total of 373,823 applications for housing benefit transitional payments had been received up until Friday 11 November.

Child Allowances

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the gross and net cost would be of raising the child allowances for income support and family credit by 10p in April 1989.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: In broad terms, the net cost of raising the child personal allowances in the main income related benefits by 10p a week might approach £15 million in a full year. The gross cost might be about £17 million.

Retirement Pensions

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish a table showing the current level of retirement pension for a single pensioner and a pensioner couple if uprated by prices or earnings, whichever was the higher, each year since 1980.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information requested is as follows:

	Single pensioner £	Pensioner couple £
November 1980	43·00	68·85
November 1981	43·48	69·60
November 1982	45·17	72·32
November 1983	46·75	74·86
November 1984	46·80	74·93
November 1985	48·29	77·32
July 1986	49·60	79·40
April 1987	50·15	80·29
April 1988	52·04	83·31

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the value of the basic retirement pension for a single person and a married couple in 1958 and November 1979, at April 1988 prices.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information requested is as follows:

	Single pensioner £	Pensioner couple £
[1]1958	21·75	34·80
[1]1979	40·91	65·50

[1] At April 1988 prices.

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his latest estimate of the percentage of people retiring now who will receive, in addition to the basic state pension (a) a state earnings-related pension and (b) an occupational pension.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Of the people retiring in the six months ending 31 March 1988, approximately 55 per cent. were in receipt of a state earnings-related pension. Information regarding occupational pensions is not available.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when, pursuant to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's remarks of 7 November, Official Report, columns 21-27, he will give details about help to pensioners, the net cost of the new scheme, estimates as to how many pensioners will benefit, what extra cash benefit they will receive and when the new scheme will start.

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners will be covered by his new proposal announced on 7 November, Official Report, columns 21-27.

Mr. Scott: I confirm that extra resources will be available to help poorer pensioners. Details of the proposals are under consideration. We shall make an announcement in due course.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, prior to the social security changes of April 1988, how many people were claiming the long-term rate of supplementary benefit; of these how many have lost or will lose in real terms following the abandonment of that rate; and how much he estimates his Department will save over the next two years as a result.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: There were 2·61 million people getting the long-term rate of supplementary benefit in May 1987. How many of these have lost in real terms, and the overall financial effects of the April 1988 changes would require an extensive computer analysis which could be done only at disproportionate cost.

Pensions (Statistics)

Mr. Fry: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many are currently receiving the state retirement pensions; and of them, how many (a) are in receipt of income support, (b) are in receipt of income support but do receive some housing benefit, (c) pay no income tax but receive no income support and (d) pay income tax on declarable incomes of less than £1,000 above their tax threshold.

Mr. Scott: Nearly 9·8 million pensioners are currently in receipt of the state retirement pension. As at May 1987 there were approximately 1·8 million people of pensionable age in receipt of supplementary benefit. (Income support replaced supplementary benefit in April 1988 and figures relating specifically to income support are not yet available). As at September 1987 there were approximately 1·5 million people of pensionable age in receipt of both supplementary benefit and housing benefit.

Approximately 2·5 million retirement pensioners pay no income tax and are not entitled to income support. Approximately 0·5 million pensioner units (A pensioner unit is a single person over state pension age, or a couple where the husband is aged over 65) pay income tax on declarable incomes of less than £1,000 above their tax threshold.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is, for each year since 1974, the total number of pensioners in the United Kingdom; and how many of them live in Scotland.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information requested is as follows:

Numbers of pensioners resident in (i) United Kingdom and (ii) Scotland in receipt of a basic retirement pension.

1974	8,098	718

1987	9,553	816
1988	9,539	815

Note: The figures exclude pensioners overseas and those in receipt of graduated pension and additional pension only.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is, for each year since 1974, the number of pensioners who received (a) only the basic pension and (b) more than one pension.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Record of pensioners in receipt of basic pension only are available from 1986. For each year since 1986, the information is as follows:—

	Number
September 1986:	2,225,700
September 1987:	2,422,840
March 1988:	2,294,570

The table shows the numbers of pensioners who in addition to their basic pension have a guaranteed minimum pension, additional pension or graduated pension. However, there will be a number of pensioners who will appear in more than one category, eg a pensioner with graduated pension may also have entitlement to additional pension and/or guaranteed minimum pension.

Year	Graduated pension (thousands)	Net additional pension (thousands)	Guaranteed minimum pension (thousands)
1974	2,873	—	—
1975	3,225	—	—
1976	3,578	—	—
1977	3,892	—	—
1978	4,201	—	—
1979	4,501	81	50
1980	4,841	277	165
1981	5,149	477	283
1982	5,386	660	392
1983	5,622	883	516
1984	5,773	1,010	581
1985	6,124	1,435	839
1986	6,382	1,788	1,022
1987	6,575	2,077	1,188
1988	6,649	2,204	1,267

Note: Overseas cases are included.

Mr. Graham Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate (a) the number of pensioners in Nottingham, (b) the number and percentage of those who have no income apart from the state pension and (c) the number and percentage of those who have no income apart from the state pension and income support.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Information is not available about the number of pensioners in any particular locality, nor about the other income of beneficiaries receiving retirement pension only. Information about the number of pensioners in Nottingham who have no other income apart from retirement pension is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Sheerman To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make the level of payment of retirement pension independent of the day in the week on which pension is drawn.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Pensioners receive the full amount of their pension entitlement regardless of the day of the week on which payment is made.

Disabled Persons

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish a table showing the average income of disabled persons as a proportion of general average income for each year since 1975.

Mr. Scott: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what further plans he has to reduce poverty among disabled people;

(2) if he has any plans to introduce a comprehensive national disability income; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: We shall use the data obtained from the surveys of disability undertaken by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys to help judge how the substantial existing resources are targeted and to see whether there are better ways of providing help to those who need it most.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to implement any of the recommendations of the committee on restrictions against disabled people report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The Government have implemented a number of the committee's recommendations. Its report identified lack of access as a major concern, and recommended the establishment of an access committee for England, which was done in 1984. We are also making staged amendments to the building regulations to ensure that the needs of disabled people are taken into account.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what funds he has allocated during each of the past five years for the specific purpose of combating discrimination against disabled people.

Mr. Scott: We have not allocated funds explicitly for this purpose. We believe that the best approach in the interests of disabled people is to take practical measures to encourage their integration into society. A key example is the substantial financial support we have given since 1984 to the access committee for England, which aims to achieve an accessible environment for people with all types of disability.

National Insurance Fund

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security by how much the surplus of income over expenditure in the national insurance fund is expected to increase in the current financial year and in 1988-89; what is the purpose of the increase; and what action has been taken to protect the value of the contributions in real terms.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Government actuary will publish his estimates of the national insurance fund's surplus in the current year and in 1989-90, in his report on the draft re-rating orders, which will be laid before Parliament shortly. These estimates will be based on the economic assumptions published in the autumn statement. The real value of contributions has been protected by appropriate changes to rates and earnings limits but since 1985 the reduced rates have cut contributions paid by lower paid workers and their employers.

Disabled Persons Act

Mr. Irving: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the Government's latest timetable for implementation of section 11 of the Disabled Persons Act.

Mr. Scott: The first report requested under section 11 is expected to be laid before the House before the end of 1989.

Fraud

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will describe facilities provided to him by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre in Swansea, to enable his fraud officers to trace vehicle numbers of claimants; whether he has any figures for the number of such inquiries made by any of his fraud officers; and what controls he has established to ensure that such information is used only for legitimate purposes.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Department's fraud officers in the investigation of suspected benefit fraud use the same facility afforded to local authorities to make inquiries at the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre in Swansea on a non-fee-paying basis. In 1987-88 about 30,000 inquiries were made. All investigations undertaken by fraud officers are subject to managerial control and checks and all inquiries are channelled through a single office. Departmental officers are subject to the normal rules of confidentiality.

Social Security Office (Shettleston)

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security on what date work will commence on the construction of the new social security office in Shettleston; and what is the estimated completion date.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Present indications are that work will start on site in January 1989 and be completed by January 1990.

Christmas Bonus

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he has any plans to increase the Christmas bonus; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have no plans to do so.

Benefit Changes

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will meet representatives of Nottingham city council to discuss the impact of the recent social security and housing benefit changes on the citizens of Nottingham.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We do not consider such a meeting would be productive.

British Shipbuilders plc

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the total number of former employees of British Shipbuilders plc who have received 13 weeks arrears of supplementary benefit following the test case in Southampton involving a former employee of the company; what the average payment was; what was the total amount of money paid to successful applicants; and from which local offices of his Department these payments were made.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I regret that this information is not available.

Unleaded Petrol

Sir Philip Goodhart: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what instructions he has given for the modification of cars used by his Department so that they can use unleaded petrol.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: There are approximately 400 official vehicles operated by the Department of Social Security. The vast majority of these are incapable of running on or being converted to run on unleaded fuel. However instructions have been issued for the necessary work to be done to convert such vehicles where this is possible. Vehicles which cannot run on unleaded fuel will gradually be replaced by those which can, as they come to the end of their economic life.

Computers (Safety)

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action he is taking to ensure the safety of his Department's computer system from penetration by computer hackers.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Most of the Department's existing computer systems are batch processing systems and are therefore not susceptible to hackers in the same way as on-line systems. However, the Department has now begun to implement the operational strategy, a major programme of computerisation which will provide on-line services for all social security offices. In devising the strategy, great care has been taken to ensure the security of data within the systems. Access will be limited to authorised users by means of passwords and personal identification devices. Further protection against hackers, who normally attempt to enter a system by trying a series of passwords, will be provided by an additional security device which will "lock-out" the terminal after three unsuccessful attempts to enter the correct password. External users are unable to dial directly into a system. A dial-back facility is imposed which will prevent access from unauthorised terminals.

A system of access permission has also been built in which will limit the data to be accessed by authorised users and a record of transactions will be made enabling management to monitor access to data.

Higher Pensioner Premiums

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he intends to reduce the qualifying age for the higher pensioner premium from 80 to 75 years; and what will be the cost, assuming no change in the amount of the premium.

Mr. Scott: To reduce the qualifying age for the higher pensioner premium from 80 to 75 years, assuming no change in the amount of the premium would have an estimated cost, at 1989-90 benefit rates, of £80 million for income support and £25 million for housing benefit. There has been no decision to change the qualifying conditions for any income support premium. If such a decision were to be made, it would be announced at the appropriate time.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people receive the higher pensioner premium and how many more would receive it if the qualifying age were reduced to 75 years.

Mr. Scott: At present, an estimated 550,000 people get the higher pensioner premium. Latest estimates indicate that if the qualifying age for the premium were reduced to 75, and additional 445,000 income support recipients would receive it.

Social Security Tribunals (Bradford)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action he intends to take to ensure appellants to Bradford social security tribunals who are represented by staff of Bradford benefit advice shops, which are to be closed, are represented at social security tribunals.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Although the Department provides lists of local advice agencies which are willing to represent social security appellants, it is the appellant's responsibility to decide whether he wishes to be represented, and if so, to arrange it.

Family Credit (Nottingham)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what efforts he is making to increase the take-up of family credit in Nottingham; and how much will be spent on this by his Department.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) on 4 November at column 810 regarding the action being taken on a national basis. The Department's regional information officer is involved in a wide range of local initiatives being taken in Nottingham to publicise family credit, including contacts with trade unions and talks to other organisations and on local radio. It is not possible to identify separately the amount being spent on family credit publicity in Nottingham.

Elderly People

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many elderly single and married persons are aged over 75 years; what proportion in each case now claim (i) income support (ii) housing benefit or (iii) rate relief; how many are likely to be able to claim relief from payment of the poll tax in whole or in part and how many are likely to be worse off than at present when the poll tax is introduced.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Pensions and Contributions

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government on the harmonisation of the rates of pension contribution and rates of pension payable in the European Economic Community; and if he will publish in the Official Report details of pension provision in other European Economic Community countries for industrial workers together with a table showing the current number of pensioners as a percentage of the working population and the forecast for the years 2000 and 2025.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: It is simply not possible to compare validly the basic pension with pensions in other EC countries, which are generally based on personal earnings, and to ignore the state earnings-related pension and occupational pensions, of which the latter are much more widespread here than in most European countries. For details of pension provision in other EC countries, I refer the hon. Member to the "Tables on Social Benefit Systems in the European Communities", a copy of which is available in the Library.

The current number of pensioners expressed as a percentage of the working population is about 35 per cent. On our best estimates, the corresponding figures for the years 2000 and 2025 will be about 36 per cent. and 47 per cent. respectively.

Benefits and Allowances

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the saving in other forms of direct and indirect state benefits and allowances as a result of an increase in child benefit to (a) £10, (b) £15 and (c) £20 by adding the benefit to income for tax purposes.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Precise costs and savings would depend on the assumptions made for the calculation of social security benefits other than child benefit. In broad terms, the orders of magnitude might be as follows:

£ billion
1988-89 levels

	Child benefit increased to
	(a) £10 per week	(b) £15 per week	(c) £20 per week
Child benefit cost	1·7	4·8	8·0
Saving in income-related benefits and child dependency increases	0·4	1·0	1·7
Increase in income tax revenue	1·4	2·1	1·7
Net Cost	nil	1·7	3·5

Attendance Allowance

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when Mrs. P. J. Tennant of 50 Kirkland avenue, Tranmere, Birkenhead will receive a final decision from the attendance allowance board on the claim in respect of her daughter Dawn (Ref. 417027W) on which the last payment was received on 14 December 1987.

Mr. Scott [holding answer 8 November 1988]: The attendance allowance board hopes to conclude its review of this case shortly and send its decision to Mrs. Tennant within the next seven days. I am writing to the hon. Member.

Public Spending

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what (a) amount and (b) proportion of total public spending on social security is accounted for by local authorities for each year since 1967-68 projected to 1990-91 in 1987-88 prices.

Mr. Scott: Expenditure on housing benefit and its administration is the sole area of local authority spending within the social security budget. This expenditure became part of the social security programme from 1982 with the introduction of the housing benefit scheme. The table gives information on the programme in the form in which it was presented in the 1982 public expenditure White Paper, and subsequently.

£ million at 1987-88 prices, Great Britain

	Amount of local authority expenditure	Proportion of total social security expenditure Per cent.
1976-77	540	1·8
1977-78	590	1·9
1978-79	540	1·6
1979-80	530	1·6
1980-81	580	1·7
1981-82	790	2·1
[1]1982-83	1,300	3·2
[1]1983-84	3,060	7·3
1984-85	3,320	7·6
1985-86	3,460	7·7
1986-87	3,620	7·8
[2]1987-88	3,760	8·1

[2]1989-90	3,920	8·3
[2]1990-91	4,020	8·4

[1] These increases reflect the introduction of the housing benefit scheme, which transferred responsibility for the housing costs of supplementary benefit claimants from central government to local authorities.

[2] Figures for 1987-88 to 1990-91 are based on those published in January 1988 in the public expenditure White Paper, Cm. 288.

TRANSPORT

Orange Badge Scheme

92. Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on his review of the orange badge scheme for the disabled.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We are considering with the disabled persons transport advisory committee and others a number of possible changes to the scheme in the light of our consultation exercise. We shall make an announcement as soon as possible.

PSV Licences (Cost)

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will outline the reasons for a 125 per cent. increase in the PSV licence.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It is Government policy that the vocational driver licensing system should be financially self-supporting. The five-year PSV licence now costs £22·50. The PSV drivers' licence fees have never covered the cost of providing the service. The previous fees, which were set in 1985, were not designed to recover the costs in full. It was recognised at the time that further substantial increases would be needed in order to achieve full recovery. The new fee levels should put these services on to a sound financial footing in the coming years.

Her Majesty's Coastguard

Mr. Mudd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that the manpower ceiling imposed on Her Majesty's coastguard is adeqate to realise maximum benefit from increased communications and technological equipment being installed in operations rooms around the coast; and to what extent funding to the coastguard, in real terms, has risen to meet the increase in recorded incidents.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he has taken to ensure that the manpower ceiling imposed on Her Majesty's coastguard is adequate to realize maximum benefit from the communications equipment and new technology being fitted in operations rooms; and whether the funding of Her Majesty's coastguard has risen in real terms.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Coastguard manpower is kept under constant review, taking account of developing technology. As regards funding I refer to the answer given today to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Mudd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give details of the expenditure incurred by Her Majesty's coastguard over each of the last five financial years; and what percentage of his Department's budget that involved in each of those years.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give details of the expenditure incurred by Her Majesty's coastguard over the past five years and the percentage of his Department's budget that represented.

Mr. Portillo: Since 1983-84 expenditure on Her Majesty's coastguard has increased by some £9·9 million or 70·59 per cent. In the same five-year period expenditure by the Department overall has increased by £516·8 million or 26·35 per cent. The proportion of the Department's expenditure devoted to Her Majesty's coastguard has therefore increased from 0·72 per cent. to 0·97 per cent. Fuller details are given in the following table:

	(a) HM Coastguard expenditure (£ million)	(b) Department of Transport expenditure (£ million)	(c): (a) as a proportion of (b) (per cent.)
1983/84	14·06	1,960·95	0·72
1984/85	18·66	2,031·50	0·92
1985/86	21·57	2,446·05	0·88
1986/87	21·80	2,376·59	0·92
1987/88	23·99	2,477·76	0·97

Mr. Mudd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will detail the anticipated cost of overtime working in Her Majesty's coastguard in the financial year 1988-89; what percentage increase this represents over 1987-88; and what percentage of his Department's total overtime bill this represents.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will give details of the cost of overtime working by civil servants in Her Majesty's coastguard between 1979 and 1988 and of the percentage of his Department's total overtime bill this represented in each year;

(2) if he will give details of the anticipated cost of overtime working in Her Majesty's coastguard in the financial year 1988-89 and the percentage change this represents over the financial year 1987-88; and what percentage of his Department's overtime bill this represents.

Mr. Portillo: The information is as follows:

Overtime working: percentage increase, and percentage of total departmental overtime bill

	1985-86 £	1986-87 £	1987-88 £	1988-89 (Outturn forecast)
HMCG	648·011	699·792	714·049	789·000
DTp total (including DVL)	1,375·397	1,538·851	1,545·074	n/a
Percentage change over previous year	—	+8·0	+2·0	+10
Percentage of Departmental total	47	45	46	—

Figures before financial year 1985-86 are not readily available.

Mr. Mudd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will detail, in the Official Report, the recruitment procedure used by Her Majesty's coastguard to replace essential staff when, in the case of such staff, the retirement date is known in advance.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will provide details of the recruitment procedures used by Her Majesty's coastguard to replace essential staff whose retirement date is known in advance.

Mr. Portillo: All recruitment into Her Majesty's coastguard occurs in the basic grade of coastguard officer. Recruitment campaigns are, as far as possible, linked to projected vacancies and advertisements are placed in appropriate newspapers and journals which set out the qualifications and experience required. Following interview successful candidates are offered posts accordingly.

Mr. Mudd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if, following the introduction of the CG66 scheme encouraging small boatmen and yachtsmen to equip themselves with VHF radio, he plans to withdraw travel routing and weather forecasting services on request as currently provided by Her Majesty's coastguard.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether, following the introduction of the CG66 scheme encouraging small boatmen and yachtsmen to fit VHF radio, it is his intention to withdraw the travel routing and weather forecasts on request currently provided by Her Majesty's coastguard.

Mr. Portillo: The travel routing is provided by the coast radio stations operated by British Telecom. There are no plans to withdraw any of the radio services currently provided by Her Majesty's coastguard, including weather forecasts.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give details of the number of incidents handled and the number of lives saved over the past five years by the coastguard stations at Hartland, Ramsey and Peterhead.

Mr. Portillo: Statistical records kept by Her Majesty's coastguard express casualties as persons assisted rather than lives saved. Details are as follows:

	1983	1984	1985	1986	1987
Hartland
Number of incidents	195	219	175	214	157
Persons assisted	341	311	235	324	198
Ramsey
Number of incidents	92	118	136	106	126
Persons assisted	144	151	185	182	185
Peterhead
Number of incidents	52	91	77	92	109
Persons assisted	104	213	124	141	192

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give details of the amount and cost of overtime worked by coastguards at Hartland, Ramsey and Peterhead and at Swansea, Liverpool and Aberdeen over the past five years; and whether his Department has assessed what increased overtime working will be necessary at Swansea, Liverpool and Aberdeen if the proposed changes are implemented.

Mr. Portillo: Records of overtime working at individual coastguard stations are not available. No increase in overtime at Swansea, Liverpool and Aberdeen is anticipated because of the redeployment of staff to those stations.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give the cost of non-SAR services, those listed as miscellaneous in the duties appropriate to Her Majesty's coastguard; who will carry out such community responsibilities if they are withdrawn from Her Majesty's coastguard; how they will be funded; and if he will make it his policy to ensure that such costs will not fall on coastal authorities.

Mr. Portillo: The costs of those services known as miscellaneous duties provided by Her Majesty's coastguard are small and not separately identified. There are no plans to change coastguard responsibilities in this respect.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will provide details of the numbers, grades and experience of the coastguards who are to augment the district staffing levels at Swansea, Liverpool and Aberdeen if the proposed closures of Hartland, Ramsey and Peterhead are implemented.

Mr. Portillo: Following is the information:

Coastguard district	Staffing levels	Experience
Aberdeen	1 Station officer	10 years
	5 Coastguard officers	Ranging from 16 years to new entrants
Swansea	2 Senior coastguard officers	13 and 8 years
	4 Coastguard officers	Ranging from over 3 years to 1 year
Liverpool	1 Senior coastguard officer	10 years
	1 Coastguard officer	2 years

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give a precise breakdown of the cost savings which will be achieved by the proposed closures of Hartland, Ramsey and Peterhead stations and the offsetting costs resulting from augmenting SAR resources at Swansea, Liverpool and Aberdeen.

Mr. Portillo: A breakdown of the continuing cost savings on Her Majesty's coastguard's budget is:

Salaries	387,000
Overtime	60,000
Auxiliary coastguard payments	52,000
Private wires and BT rental/call charges	65,000
Miscellaneous, (training, postage etc.)	45,000
	609,000

This takes into account the additional posts at Swansea, Liverpool and Aberdeen. In addition, other savings to the Department of Transport generally, will include:

Common Services	91,680
Accommodation	44,000
	135,680

There are certain once only costs associated with transfer of resources, which cannot be finalised at this stage.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how any safety recommendations arising from the Piper Alpha inquiry that require improved manpower, equipment and other resources for Her Majesty's coastguard will be implemented.

Mr. Portillo: Until the results of the inquiry are known, it is not possible to state how any recommendations might be implemented.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give details of the procedure for consultation with local Members of Parliament, local councils, fishermen, the Royal National Lifeboat Institution, tourist authorities, coastguard unions and others, before any decision is taken to close a coastguard station.

Mr. Portillo: There is full consultation with the organisations referred to about the implications of any significant charges proposed for coastguard service.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give details of power failures and total communications breakdowns, such as those at Liverpool and Oban coastguard stations recently, over the past five years; and if he will take steps to ensure that similar occurrences in the future will not result in more deaths in coastal waters.

Mr. Portillo: The rescue centres at Liverpool and Oban suffered partial breakdown in communication facilities which were quickly restored. No coastguard rescue centres have suffered power and total communication failures over the past five years. Essential systems are duplicated. Fail-safe line systems, overlapping radio cover, emergency power supplies at remote sites and in operations centres complement contingency plans which seek to cater for any disruption of SAR tasks.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether, since his announcement concerning closures of coastguard stations, Official Report, 21 March, columns 42-43, he has met representatives of the coastguard's trade union and the National Union of Civil and Public Servants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: No, but several meetings between union representatives and officials of the Department have taken place.

Unleaded Petrol

Sir Philip Goodhart: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what instructions he has given for the modification of cars used by his Department so that they can use unleaded petrol.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

North-East England (Channel Tunnel Link)

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to ensure that a direct high-speed rail line from the north-east of England to the Channel tunnel is constructed and in operation by the date that the tunnel opens.

Mr. Portillo: The responsibility for planning Channel tunnel rail links rests with British Rail, not the Government. I understand that BR considers that the newly electrified east coast main line will be more than adequate so far as the stretch between London and the north-east is concerned, and that freight services from the tunnel to the north-east can begin as soon as the tunnel opens in 1993.

London Transport (Attacks)

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many people have been (a) attacked, (b) injured and (c) killed inside (i) London Underground premises and trains, and (ii) buses in London, for each year since 1975.

Mr. Portillo: The information is as follows:

British Rail (Catering)

Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will direct British Rail to have due regard in selling its catering services to the interests of the consumer, with particular reference to pricing policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: These are commercial matters for the Railways Board and for the catering businesses concerned.

Lorry Safety

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what safety studies his Department has undertaken into the fitting of reversing bleepers on lorries; whether this practice has been introduced in other countries; and if he has any plans to introduce legislation to make them compulsory in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Statistical evidence shows very few road accidents involving reversing vehicles. For this reason we have no plans to make the fitting of reversing alarms compulsory. The primary responsibility for reversing safely rests with drivers. The Highway Code contains comprehensive advice about this. Reversing alarms are an aid to reversing safety. That is why we permit them to be used on certain categories of vehicle, including heavy lorries.

We have the benefit of advice from Mr. C. P. Hanson-Abbott of Brigade Electronics Ltd. and his "National Reverse in Safety" campaign. His company is the market leader in reversing alarms in this country. He has been pushing Ministers to make the alarms compulsory for heavy goods vehicles.

London Regional Transport (Central Line)

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has concerning proposals by London Regional Transport to improve the service and introduce new rolling stock on the Central line to West Ruislip.

Mr. Portillo: On 11 October 1988 my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced the approval of London Regional Transport's plans to modernise the Central Line at the cost of over £700 million. As part of that modernisation, 85 new trains will be introduced, the first of which are expected to run in passenger service between West Ruislip and Northolt by the end of 1991.

Light Dues

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has any proposals for collecting light dues from (a) pleasure craft and (b) fishing vessels under 10 m giving his estimate of the revenue which would accrue at current levels.

Mr. Portillo: As regards pleasure craft I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) on 7 November at columns 71-72. If subsequently it were decided to apply light dues to pleasure craft the revenue would depend on the level of charge to be levied. I have no plans for charging light dues on fishing vessels of less than 10 metres.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give an estimate of the cost of collecting light dues from fishing vessels; and how much has been collected to date from (a) British and (b) foreign vessels.

Mr. Portillo: Payments to date of light dues in respect of United Kingdom-registered fishing vessels amount to some £45,000. Information about the value of payments in respect of foreign-registered fishing vessels is not readily available. Nor is it possible to identify separately the cost of collecting light dues in respect of fishing vessels.

M40 (Oxford—Birmingham Extension)

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on what evidence he bases his assumption that about 13,000 to 15,000 vehicles per day will transfer from the M1 to the M40 when the M40 extension between Oxford and Birmingham is fully opened to traffic in 1991.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Our estimates of the traffic effects of building the M40 extension, including the transfer of traffic from the M1, are based on forecasts derived from the Oxford to Birmingham traffic model developed by the Department for use in designing the scheme.

East Midlands (Channel Tunnel Interchange)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received regarding the electrification of the midland main line and the Channel tunnel interchange to serve the east midlands; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: We have received 13 representations since the beginning of this year. It is for British Rail to plan its future investment programme.

British Transport Police

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many employees of the British Transport police were made redundant consequent upon the privatisation of Sealink.

Mr. Portillo: None.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to when the communications programme will be completed to allow British Transport police to deploy officers underground.

Mr. Portillo: The British Transport police already deploy officers throughout the London Underground system, but the improvements to communications currently under way will increase their effectiveness below the ground. The installation of leaky-feeder cable equipment to allow the use of radios at 42 key deep-level stations will be completed by February next year. The full radio strategy extending the use of leaky-feeder facilities to other stations and allowing police radios to operate in running tunnels will be in place by 1993.

Sealink

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much was spent on policing Sealink in the last full year prior to privatisation; and what information he has on spending by Sealink in the last 12 months.

Mr. Portillo: I understand that the cost to BR of policing Sealink in the last full year prior to privatisation was £2,062,000. In 1987-88 Sealink paid £2,102,000 to the British Transport police for policing Sealink.

London Underground (Crime)

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will direct London Underground Ltd. to display posters on underground stations and trains advising travellers on the action they should take if they observe the committing of crimes.

Mr. Portillo: I have no powers to give London Regional Transport directions of this kind, but I will draw the attention of the chairman to the hon. Member's suggestion.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many indictable crimes were committed on the London Underground in the last year.

Mr. Portillo: The number of indictable crimes recorded on the London Underground from 1 October 1987 to 30 September 1988 was 18,383.

Coastguard Rescue Centre

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will indicate the estimated daily coastguard manning levels, excluding casual auxiliary coastguards, in Scottish coastguard rescue centres, in the 1988-89 financial year;

(2) if he will indicate the estimated daily coastguard manning levels, excluding casual auxiliary coastguards, in Scottish coastguard rescue centres, in the 1987-88 financial year.

Mr. Portillo: The average manning levels at Scottish rescue centres was, or is estimated to be, as follows:

Grade	1987-88	1988-89
Principal Inspector	2	2
Inspector	2	2
District Officer	8	8
Station Officer	17	14
Senior CG Officer	32	28
CG Officer	61	65
	122	119

Auxiliary Coastguards

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give details of the position of auxiliary coastguards at Hartland, Ramsey and Peterhead if the proposed closures are implemented and of the compensation that will be provided to individuals.

Mr. Portillo: The Isle of Man Government have agreed to take on the responsibility for the auxiliaries on the island. At Hartland those auxiliaries on the watchkeeping panel, who are able and wish to do so, have been offered the opportunity to continue their membership of the coastguard auxiliary service, albeit in a different capacity. At Peterhead, the same offer will be made in due course. As auxiliaries are not employees, the question of compensation does not arise. The organisation and deployment of all the auxiliaries who form the coast rescue companies remains unchanged.

Motorways (Lighting)

Sir Anthony Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to see that all motorways are adequately lighted; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department keeps the lighting requirements of all motorways in England under constant review and provides lighting wherever justified. Each assessment takes safety, environmental and economic factors into account. Some 400 miles of motorway are already lit and a further 100 miles are likely to be lit by 1995.

National Traffic Club

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made since March 1986 in the formation, long-term organisation, financing and promotion of a national traffic club for pre-school children along the lines developed by the transport and road research laboratory.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: A traffic club could make a significant contribution to reducing road accidents involving children and remains a firm objective. We have considered various proposals but none of them would have reached enough of the children concerned. We are now considering further suggestions. I hope to make an announcement shortly.

DVLC (Information)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will publish the latest information that he has readily available listing the names or types of organisations to which information from the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre in Swansea has been disclosed in order to trace the owner of a vehicle and the numbers of such disclosures.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In 1987 there were in all, about 8·4 million disclosures of names and addresses of vehicle keepers from the records at the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre. A detailed breakdown of the names of the recipients is not available. Over 6·7 million of the disclosures were to the police, central ticket offices, local authorities, other Government Departments, and other enforcement agencies, for use in connection with the investigation of offences. In some 1·6 million of these cases, information was supplied to vehicle manufacturers for the purpose of safety-related recalls. The remaining 150,000 disclosures were to individuals or companies who demonstrated reasonable cause, as specified in regulations, for needing the information.

Airports (Passengers)

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many passengers passed through (a) Heathrow, (b) Gatwick, (c) Manchester, (d) Cardiff (Rhosse) and (e) Glasgow airports in 1986 and 1987.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department of Transport does not systematically collect such data. 1986 and 1987 figures are available in the Civil Aviation Authority's annual statement of movements, passengers and cargo 1987 for United Kingdom airports (CAP 536). A copy is in the Library.

Road Network (Backlogs)

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what have been the effect of recent restrictions in the programme for the maintenance of the national road network between June and September of the current year on his aim to eliminate the backlog of motorway and trunk road renewal work by 1992.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The restriction on maintenance was temporary. The allocation of £20 million from the reserve this year, followed by the 40 per cent. increase in proposed future expenditure, announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on 1 November, will enable progress towards the 1992 target to be resumed.

Extended Range Operations

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what steps have been taken to ensure that EROPS in and out of the United Kingdom are conforming to ICAO guidelines;

(2) whether any comparison has been made between the actual failure rates in EROPS and those which were predicted.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Civil Aviation Authority is responsible for the regulation of safety in respect of operations by United Kingdom-registered aircraft. The CAA's requirements in respect of EROPS operations conform with ICAO standards. Regulation of operations by foreign-registered aircraft is the responsibility of the state of registry, which is also expected to observe ICAO standards. If the hon. Member requires more information I suggest he approaches the CAA.

HEALTH

Community Care

89. Mr. McKelvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will make a statement on the implications for community care policy of the Griffiths report.

90. Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will make a statement on the implications for community care policy of the Griffiths report.

91. Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will make a statement on the implications for community care policy of the Griffiths report.

Mr. Mellor: I refer the hon. Members to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury (Mr. Goodlad) on 24 October at column 66.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the actions taken by each health authority to follow the advice on community care issued in DHSS circular HC(88)43.

Mr. Mellor: The circular provides guidelines for health authorities in formulating their short-term programmes for 1989-90. Reports from regional health authorities on their programmes will be submitted to the Department in 1989. These reports will describe action on the specific service objectives detailed in the circular: this will not cover all action in relation to community care.

Acetylcysteine

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish in the Official Report those substitutes available for Acetylcysteine on the limited list.

Mrs. Currie: No. The prescribing of substitutes is a matter of clinical judgment but alternative treatment might include simple inhalations, or an oral or nasal decongestant, an antihistamine or an expectorant.

The advisory committee on National Health Service drugs has reviewed the position of Acetylcysteine and confirmed the recommendation of the Chief Medical Officer's working group which drew up the original selected list, that oral mucolytics such as Acetylcysteine are of no proven therapeutic value in the treatment of respiratory conditions.

We have, however, accepted that Acetylcysteine should be available for the management of those conditions where some benefit might be obtained, and it may be prescribed for any patient who has abdominal complications associated with cystic fibrosis.

Medical Treatment (British Dependencies)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will take steps to entitle British citizens in the British dependencies to medical treatment in the same way as other British citizens.

Mr. Mellor: No. Entitlement to free National Health Service hospital treatment is based not on citizenship but on residence. Dependent territories are responsible for their own internal arrangements, including health care. Whether, within their provision for health care, resources should be devoted to referring patients overseas, if specialist facilities are unavailable locally, is a matter for the individual territories themselves to determine.

National Health Service (Expenditure)

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will state the total National Heath Service budget for 1970, 1979, 1984 and 1988 and the percentage change relative to the gross domestic product and public expenditure for each of those years;

(2) if he will state the amount spent on the National Health Service as a percentage of public expenditure and gross domestic product for 1976, 1979, 1984 and 1988, respectively.

Mr. Mellor: The following table shows United Kingdom gross expenditure on the National Health Service (ie the preferred measure of total resource used by the service) in money terms and as a percentage of GDP for the years requested. It also shows the yearly growth in gross expenditure on the National Health Service and of money GDP for the same years.

Suicides

Sir Anthony Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what statistical information is collected on the employment or profession of suicides.

Mrs. Currie: The occupation of the person who has died is recorded on the death certificate in accordance with instructions issued by the Registrar General. The occupation entered on the form refers to the latest full-time gainful employment followed. In the case of the unemployed or retired people, the last occupation is still to be recorded with, for the retired only, a note to that effect. The occupation of a woman should be recorded only when she was in paid employment most of her life.

These data are then coded by OPCS in accordance with the OPCS "Classification of Occupations", a copy of which is in the Library. Data on the occupation of suicides may be found in "Decennial Supplement Series DS No. 6 Occupational Mortality 1979-1980, 1982-83 Parts 1 and 2", copies of which are also in the Library.

Abortion

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how his Department controls the disposal of foetuses and foetal tissue following abortion procedures; and what information he has as to how the foetus which hon. Members were invited by the Society for the Protection of Unborn Children to view during the past Session was obtained.

Mrs. Currie: We have no information concerning the specific foetus to which the hon. Member refers; she might like to put her question to the society. Within the National Health Service, proper arrangements for the disposal of foetuses and foetal material are the responsibility of individual health authorities. In the private sector, places approved under the Abortion Act 1967 may not supply foetuses or foetal material to any organisation or institution without the express approval of the Secretary of State, nor change the method(s) of foetal disposal approved by the Secretary of State without prior consultation.

Registered Homes Act 1984

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he intends to publish the report of the study by the social service inspectorate of the implementation of the Registered Homes Act 1984.

Mrs. Currie: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Monklands West, (Mr. Clarke) on 15 March at column 554.

Schizophrenia

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the work on the three research projects commissioned by his Department at Charing Cross and Northwick park hospitals and the Institute of Psychiatry, relevant to an examination of the effectiveness of community care for sufferers from schizophrenia, will be completed.

Mrs. Currie: The research projects listed below were directly commissioned by the Department of Health.

Title	Researcher	Planned completion date
Research on the management of Schizophrenia in the community.	Dr. Wilkinson/Dr. Fallon Institute of Psychiatry	30 June 1989
Assessment of needs of Schizophrenics living in the health district of Harrow	Dr. Hershon Northwick Park Hospital	30 June 1989
Compulsory treatment of Psychiatric patients in the community.	Dr. Hirsch Charing Cross and Westminster medical school	Research finished. A report is expected soon.

Dental Practice Advisers

Mr. Sean Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what discussions he has had with the British Dental Association and the General Dental Practitioners Association on the pilot schemes relating to dental practice advisers;

(2) whether he will list the pilot scheme areas in respect of dental practice advisers; and when the study will be completed;

(3) what are his Department's criteria for the appointment of dental practice advisers; and what will be the main requirements of such advisers in respect of professional qualifications;

(4) what is his best estimate of the costs involved in respect of each individual dental practice adviser; and how these costs will be funded in aggregate;

(5) whether he will list the expected functions of the proposed dental practice advisers; and whether any extra resources will be provided for their remuneration and training.

Mrs. Currie: The dental practice adviser (DPA) pilot scheme will cover England and Wales and arrangements for its introduction have been discussed with the General Dental Services committee of the British Dental Association as representative of the profession; it will run until early 1991. Guidance has been issued to those family practitioner committees (FPCs) listed who will be responsible for making appointments—on the criteria for selection and proposed functions of DPAs. The cost of the scheme, including training, will be met partly from the additional funds made available for primary care initiatives outlined in the White Paper "Promoting Better Health" and with the agreement of the profession, in respect of DPAs' expenses, partly from a small adjustment in the fees payable to general dental practitioners. During the current financial year each DPA will be paid a sessional fee of £68·27 and an allowance of £42·80 in respect of continuing practice expenses. The participating FPCs are: Avon, Barnet, Bradford, Buckinghamshire, Cheshire, Cleveland, Dorset, Dudley, Dyfedd, Essex, Gwent, Gwynedd, Hampshire, Kensington, Chelsea and Westminster, Lambeth Southwark and Lewisham, Leeds, Lincoln, Manchester, Solihull, South Glamorgan, Staffordshire, Wolverhampton.

I am placing a copy of the guidance to FPCs in the Library.

Free Dental Examinations

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people had free dental examinations in each of the calendar years 1978 to 1988.

Mrs. Currie: Information on the number of dental examinations, all of which were free, is available up to 1985 by calendar year, and by financial year from 1986-87 to 1987-88.

Chronic Mental Illness (Seminars)

Mr. Irving: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the seminars he has funded to spread knowledge, among both psychiatric professional staff and planners, of the best ways of meeting the needs of those people chronically disabled by mental illness who may need long-term in-patient care, whilst avoiding the institutional environment of traditional long-stay wards, are being held.

Mrs. Currie: I presume that my hon. Friend is referring to a series of seminars, financed by the Department of Health, to publicise research that has been completed on hospital hostels for the chronically mentally ill. Five seminars were held between 16 October 1987 and 17 June 1988.

Long-stay Patients

Mr. Irving: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects a decision to be made about the need for data on the provision of places in accommodation in an informal domestic environment providing long-stay patients with 24-hour medical and nursing supervision, in each district health authority; and how this will be monitored in conjunction with the National Health Service.

Mrs. Currie: Subject to consultation with the Health Service we anticipate collecting this information during 1989. We are currently working on clear definitions to enable authorities to make reliable returns.

Community-based Services

Mr. Irving: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, in the light of the undertaking given to the Committee of Public Accounts that health authorities would be asked to provide more information about local authority plans for community-based services and how these mesh with those of the National Health Service, when he expects this information to be available; and if he will publish it in the Official Report.

Mr. Mellor: We are seeking constantly to refine the information collected in the course of the National Health Service planning and review process and the data available to monitor social services provision. The proposals for further improvements in monitoring community care plans at the local level in Sir Roy Griffiths' report are being considered along with his other recommendations.

Foetal Survival

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has concerning the number of foetuses born during the past five years which have survived for more than one month (a) without subsequent handicap and (b) with subsequent handicap at 21, 22, and 23 weeks' gestation, respectively; and whether he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: I regret that the data requested are not available from the registration of livebirths. Information on gestation period is collected at the registration of stillbirths only.

Prescription Charges

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each year since 1970 and his estimate for the current financial year the number of prescriptions paid for by the patient under the National Health Service by the non-aged together with the number in the population liable to the charge; and if he will provide an estimate of the average number and cost of prescriptions charged each year to a married manual worker with two children.

Mrs. Currie: The table gives the numbers of prescriptions dispensed by pharmacies which attracted a prescription charge for each year since 1970. This excludes prescriptions dispensed to people who purchased pre-payment certificates and prescriptions dispensed by doctors. For the current financial year we estimate that about 58·3 million prescriptions will attract a prescription charge. I regret that we are unable to give an estimate for each year of the numbers in the population liable for prescription charges, and we are unable to provide an estimate of the average number and cost of prescriptions charged each year to a married manual worker with two children.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish a table showing how many people have been exempt from prescription charges, in each of the last 10 years, by virtue of being (a) over pensionable age, (b) a child, (c) pregnant, (d) in receipt of qualifying benefit, (e) on low income and (f) other exempted conditions.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 11 November 1988]: The table shows the estimated numbers (in millions) of people who have been exempt from charges in each of the last 10 years because they were (a) over pensionable age (b) aged under 16, (c) an expectant mother, or a mother who had given birth to a child in the last 12 months, (d) in receipt of supplementary benefit or family income supplement (or were an adult dependent of such a person), (e) on a low income. Some people were exempt for more than one reason. The information on categories (a) to (c) is for England, on categories (d) and (e) for Great Britain.

I regret that information is not available on the numbers of people exempt from charges for other reasons.

Cook-chill Catering

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health why new guidelines on cook-chill catering, which his Department's chief environmental health officer said should have been published in August, have not yet been published.

Mrs. Currie: Because they are not yet ready.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will take steps to introduce legislation limiting the length of retention and storage of cook-chill food products.

Mrs. Currie: No. Food legislation already places on those who sell or produce food a responsibility to ensure that the food is fit for human consumption and it is for them to make sure that their production and handling procedures are within the law.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when his Department is planning to undertake an in-depth assessment of the microbiological safety of cook-chill catering with particular reference to listeria; and whether, in view of the alleged risks with this catering system, he will suspend its implementation in the National Health Service while this assessment takes place.

Mrs. Currie: Microbiological studies of food produced by the cook-chill process have been carried out within the public health laboratory service and are continuing. We keep the need for further action under review. Current guidance stresses the need for health authorities to seek appropriate professional advice when planning to introduce cook-chill catering.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many full-time scientific officers employed in the public health laboratory service are also running private laboratories engaged in research into cook-chill catering.

Mrs. Currie: None.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what previous involvement Mr. Brian Hayward, the newly-appointed chairman of the Wakefield health authority, had with the expert group investigating the introduction of cook-chill catering during his membership of the Yorkshire regional health authority.

Mrs. Currie: Mr. Hayward chaired the group of experts set up by Yorshire regional health authority to investigate the safety and implementation of cook chill catering. We are grateful to Mr. Hayward for his service in this respect.

Committee on Medical Aspects of Food Policy

Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to publish the third report from the sub-committee on nutritional surveillance of the Chief Medical Officer's committee on medical aspects of food policy.

Mrs. Currie: Copies of the full text of the third report of the sub-committee on nutritional surveillance have been placed in the Library and a summary is being published today.

The committee on medical aspects of food policy (COMA) has advised that the expense involved in publishing in full this lengthy scientific report, which mainly consists of papers that have already appeared in the scientific journals, would not be justified. However we have thought it right to make a summary available to the general public, both as a record of British achievement in nutrition science and to maintain public awareness of the valuable work that the Government are sponsoring to increase scientific knowledge about nutrition and health.

Babies

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will give for each district health authority, for the latest three-year period for which figures are available, the number of children dying within a month of their birth, giving for each district health authority its ranking in England;

(2) if he will give for each district health authority, the number of babies weighing 2,500 grams or less at birth per 1,000 live births, of all weights to mothers resident in the district, giving for each district health authority its ranking in England.

Mrs. Currie: The information requested has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give, for each district health authority, the number of registered nurses in special care baby units per 100 low birthweight births, giving for each district health authority its ranking in England.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is available in the package of health service indicators produced by the Department. The latest information for 1986-87, is in the Library.

Crown Immunity

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if there are any plans to remove Crown immunity from National Health Service properties.

Mrs. Currie: Crown immunity has already been removed from the National Health Service in respect of food legislation and health and safety legislation, as defined by the National Health Service (Amendment) Act 1986. New controls on emissions to the atmosphere are expected to come into force next year. The Department will be neither seeking nor would expect Crown immunity for health authorities from them.

Incinerators

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what proportion of hospital incinerators are estimated to be operating to standards which would not be permitted by institutions not protected by Crown immunity;

(2) what action has been taken to ensure that all hospital incinerators meet the standards that have to be met by institutions not protected by Crown immunity and what would be the resource implications of taking such action;

(3) how many district health authorities have received complaints about air pollution from hospital incinerators.

Mrs. Currie: Health authorities are required to comply with statutory standards on emissions to the atmosphere and the operation and maintenance of hospital incinerators notwithstanding Crown immunity. There is an established procedure whereby local authorities can raise instances of non-compliance with health authorities and bring the matter to the attention of the Department if it cannot be resolved locally. The Department then asks the appropriate regional health authority to investigate and ensure that appropriate remedial action is taken. Seven such referrals have been made in the last twelve months.

Information is not held centrally on the number of complaints made direct to district health authorities or the overall cost of improvements made to incinerators in response to complaints.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the estimated cost of upgrading National Health Service incinerators to meet the emission limits proposed by the European Economic Community draft directive on municipal waste incinerators.

Mrs. Currie: To comply with the anticipated new controls on emissions, health authorities will need to upgrade or replace the majority of hospital incinerators. If these were immediately replaced the cost would be in the region of £50 million, but it is anticipated that there will be a transitional period allowed for the replacement of existing installations. Many incinerators will therefore be upgraded or replaced at the end of their useful lives as part of the normal cycle of planned equipment renewal. Authorities will also be expected to review their waste disposal services taking account of the scope for rationalising and reducing the number of incinerator facilities and the contribution which the private sector can make to the disposal of clinical waste.

Fluoridation

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of households receive fluoridised mains water; and what information he has as to the difference in dental health between such households and those in other parts of the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Currie: I regret that we do not hold information in the precise form requested. Some 5·5 million people in Britain benefit from fluoridated water (185,000 of these where the optimum level of fluoride occurs naturally in the water supply.).

Evidence in this country of the efficacy of fluoridation is well documented. For example, a study in fluoridated Newcastle and non-fluoridated North Manchester, (Duxbury et al 1985), showed that five-year-olds in Newcastle had approximately 60 per cent. less dental decay compared with their counterparts in Manchester. A similar study of 14-year-olds compared the levels of decay in fluoridated south Birmingham and non-fluoridated Bolton (Mitropoulos et al 1987). This showed that 32 per cent. of children in Birmingham were free of caries compared to only 19 per cent. in Bolton.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he has any information concerning the comparative average waiting times and numbers of patients currently on the waiting lists for ophthalmological procedures at present in (a) the Macclesfield health authority, (b) the Crewe health authority and (c) on average in England and Wales.

Mr. Mellor: I shall let my hon. Friend have as much information as can be obtained without incurring disproportionate cost as soon as possible.

Unleaded Petrol

Sir Philip Goodhart: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what instructions he has given for the modification of cars used by his Department and the National Health Service so that they can use unleaded petrol.

Mrs. Currie: There are approximately 60 official vehicles operated by the Department of Health. Instructions have been issued to have work done to convert the vehicles to run on unleaded fuel where it is technically possible to do so.

Vehicles which cannot run on unleaded fuel will gradually be replaced, as they reach the end of their economic life, by vehicles which can.

We are offering similar guidance to health authorities which are responsible for some 14,000 Crown cars and approximately 7,000 ambulances, many of which already run on lead free diesel, petrol or LPG fuel.

South Western Regional Health Authority

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the present establishment of the South Western regional health authority; and if he will set out in tabular form the categories of staff and the total running costs of the regional authority.

Mr. Mellor: The manpower establishment of South Western regional health authority on 30 September 1988 was 756 whole time equivalent staff. The categories are set out in the table. Net revenue expenditure in 1987-88 was £12 million, and the equivalent budgeted figure for 1988-89 is £13·1 million.

SWRHA Manpower Establishment Staff category	September 1988 Numbers (WTE)
Administrative and clerical	419·5
Ancillary	60·7
Maintenance	2·0
Nurses and Midwives	81·2
Medical	11·4
Professional and Technical (Works)	125·0
Other Professional and Technical	54·2
Pharmacists	2·0
Total	756

The figures include 285·5 WTE staff employed in the regional computer centre and the regional design service, which are both self-financing; and 244·6 in the blood transfusion centre.

Nurses

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) which health authorities stipulate the continual presence of G grade nurses and over on high dependency units;

(2) whether his Department has any intention of stipulating that nursing staff of G grade and above must be on duty at all times in high dependency units.

Mr. Mellor: It is for health authorities to determine, in the light of the clinical needs of patients in individual units, the level of staffing, the grade mix and the working patterns needed in each clinical setting, and information of the kind requested is not held centrally.

Vaccination

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many doses of measles, mumps and rubella vaccine have been received by Bradford health authority in conjunction with the publicity campaign to promote vaccination, to the most recent practicable date; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: Up to 10 November, 3,360 doses of MMR vaccine had been sent to Bradford health authority in response to orders placed. On provision of the vaccine to the country as a whole, I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave on 31 October to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Hicks) at column 491.

Elderly People

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received about the operation of privately rented homes for the elderly in Liverpool; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: We have received in the last six months one letter from the hon. Member dated 2 November, to which I will be replying shortly; and one other on the same subject to which my officials will reply shortly.

These letters concern the inspection of homes by the Liverpool city council as the registration authority. The council has however acted properly under the Registered Homes Act 1984.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the social services inspectorate will be in a position to report on its first national inspection on the standards of local authority aged persons' homes.

Mrs. Currie: The social services inspectorate is inspecting the arrangements in selected social services departments for managing the provision of residential care for elderly people. A sample of homes is being visited in the course of this inspection. The report on this study is expected by the summer of 1989. This is part of a national programme of work in support of the inspectorate's continuing task of monitoring local authority personal social services including residential care.

Smokeless Tobacco Products

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library the written representations he has received in response to the proposed ban of certain smokeless tobacco products.

Mrs. Currie: I will write to my hon. Friend.

Dental and Eye Testing Charges

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will exempt students in full-time higher education from charges for dental treatment.

Mrs. Currie: Full-time students under 19 are already exempt from dental charges. Others on a low income can get free treatment or help with the cost depending on their circumstances. We have no plans to extend these arrangements.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people in (a) Nottingham and (b) Nottinghamshire will now be eligible to pay charges for (i) dental examinations and (ii) eye tests.

Mrs. Currie: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects that the proposed charge for eye tests will be introduced.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I expect that free sight tests under the National Health Service will be confined to certain groups from 1 April 1989. From that date, the level of any fees for those ceasing to be entitled to an NHS test will be entirely a matter for the practitioner's own commercial judgment.

Hospital Closures

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has any plans to issue directives to regional health authorities to halt the closure plans for hospitals for the mentally handicapped until a review of their programmes and the availablility of alternative methods of care has been conducted.

Mr. Mellor: The guidelines for health authorities' short-term programmes (HC(88)43) clearly directs authorities to develop a comprehensive and integrated range of services for mentally handicapped people giving good quality care for them in all settings. The closure of hospitals is not a primary aim and should come about as a consequence of all authorities' abilities to provide appropriate care in other ways, not for its own sake.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what effect circular HC (88) 43 has had on regional health authorities plans and action of running down and closing hospitals for the mentally handicapped.

Mr. Mellor: The circular provides guidelines for health authorities in formulating their short-term plans for '989-90, that is, the next financial year, not the current one. Reports from regional health authorities on their plans for 1989-90 will be submitted to the Department in 1989 and will include information on a wide range of services for mentally handicapped people.

Young People (Support Teams)

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many local authorities currently employ after-care support teams working with young persons who are leaving care.

Mr. Mellor: We do not hold information in the form requested. However all local authorities have a general duty to safeguard and promote the welfare of children in their care throughout their childhood, which includes preparing them for leaving care, and specific powers and duties for certain groups of young people on leaving care.

Proposals to enhance the powers and duties of local authorities for children leaving care were contained in the Government's White Paper "The Law on Child Care and Family Services" (Cmd. 62).

Leukaemia

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the levels of leukaemia in children in the Fareham/Gosport area of south Hampshire; what are the figures for comparable areas in the south; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 2 November 1988]: A comprehensive reply, based on registration of newly diagnosed cases of leukaemia over a sufficient time period, could be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, the table shows mortality data for the counties and county districts of Hampshire, Dorset and West Sussex which are readily available for the period 1979 to 1987. Care should be taken in interpreting the mortality rates as these are based on small numbers of events.

Number of deaths and equivalent annual mortality rates (per million population) from leukaemia (ICD 204-208), age 0-14, England and Wales, selected counties and county districts (1979-1987).

Ethnic Minority Population

Mr. Dicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimates he has of the ethnic minority population in the year 2000 as a proportion of (a) the United Kingdom as a whole, (b) Birmingham, (c) Bradford, (d) Bristol, (e) Manchester, (f) Wolverhampton, (g) Halifax and (h) each of the London boroughs; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 10 November 1988]: The latest figures, published in "Population Trends 46", suggested that the total size of the ethnic minority population of Great Britain in the year 1991 would be about 3 million, or 5·4 per cent. of the total population of Great Britain. This is broadly in line with earlier projections, published in "Population Trends 16", which indicated that by the end of the century this population might be about 7 per cent. of the total. No projections of the ethnic minority population for local areas are available.

Mr. Dicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many United Kingdom resident women born to parents from the new Commonwealth and Pakistan are now of child-bearing age; and what estimates he has of that figure by the year 2000.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 10 November 1988]: I regret that the precise information requested is not available. It is estimated that for all ethnic minority groups combined during the period 1984 to 1986, there were about 618,000 women of childbearing age resident in Great Britain. Details are given in an article by Christopher Shaw included in "Population Trends 52".

Mr. Dicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, in the latest year for which figures are available, what percentage of births were to mothers from the new Commonwealth and Pakistan in each of the following areas: (a) Birmingham, (b) Bradford, (c) Bristol, (d) Manchester, (e) Wolverhampton, (f) Halifax and (g) each of the London boroughs.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 10 November 1988]: The information requested is as follows:

Mental Health Services

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his policy as to whether a mentally-ill person in residential care needing 24-hour nursing should be the responsibility of the National Health Service and whether such persons should be under the care of a consultant psychiatrist; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 11 November 1988]: Patients are usually the clinical responsibility of their general practitioner. In the case of those who are mentally ill the management of their illness in the short term and the long term is initiated by referral to psychiatric services often by the general practitioner. At times during their illness the care may be met by the psychiatrist alone (as an in-patient in hospital for example); at times by the psychiatrist and the general practitioner sharing the care (as for example when the patient is living in the community and seeing his general practitioner but still seeing the psychiatrist for out-patient follow-up); and ultimately when the patient has made a full recovery from his illness it is often the case that the patient is referred back to the care of his general practitioner.

Medical Negligence

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what amount was paid out by (a) each regional health authority and (b) the family practitioner service in out-of-court settlements to the pursuers of claims alleging medical negligence for the years 1984-85, 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(2) if he will list, for each regional health authority in England and Wales, the total payments made in compensation to victims of medical accidents in each of the years 1984-85, 1985-86 and 1986-87.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 11 November 1988]: I regret that the information is not available in the form requested. Questions about health authorities in Wales are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

The information held centrally is given in the table which shows compensation payments made by health authorities as recorded in their annual accounts. However, this information does not distinguish between compensation payments in respect of medical accidents and other compensation payments, for example, those in respect of damage to property or for unfair dismissal. Nor does it distinguish between payments made as a result of court decisions, out of court settlement or legal advice.

In the case of family practitioner services, general medical practitioners and other family practitioners are independent contractors and are individually responsible for any actions or claims arising from the services that they provide. Any costs arising from out of court settlements related to such actions are, therefore, a matter for the practitioner concerned.

CIVIL SERVICE

Non-smoking Areas

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service by what date arrangements will be made for non-smoking members of the Civil Service to work in conditions free from tobacco smoke.

Mr. Luce: It is for individual Departments to determine what arrangements they wish to make to allow non-smoking civil servants to work in conditions free from tobacco smoke, and when they wish to introduce such arrangements. The Government's policy on smoking in the Civil Service aims to create a non-smoking environment, with facilities for those who wish to smoke.

An increasing number of Departments have made steady progress in establishing smoke-free areas in their premises. My own Department, the Cabinet Office, has already begun to introduce a no-smoking scheme. We are always keen to share the lessons learnt from our experience and publicise the initiatives taken by others.

THE ARTS

London Museums Education Service

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Minister for the Arts what arrangements have been made to secure the future of the London Museums Education Service.

Mr. Luce: The Inner London boroughs will take over responsibility for education services in Inner London from 1 April 1990. Future arrangements for services which are now provided by the Inner London education authority on a London-wide basis are for discussion between interested organisations, including the London boroughs.

Collections (Disposal)

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Minister for the Arts how many representations he received, prior to the publication of his consultative paper "Powers of Disposal from Museums and Gallery Collections", from directors of national museums and galleries requesting a widening of powers of disposal.

Mr. Luce [holding answer 7 November 1988]: The directors and trustees of the national museums and galleries are considering the adequacy of their powers of disposal in the light of the consultative paper. Two institutions had already indicated prior to the publication of the paper that they would welcome some widening of the powers.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Minister for the Arts whether he will list separately the present powers of disposal enjoyed by each of the national museums and galleries.

Mr. Luce [holding answer 7 November 1988]: The powers of disposal available to the trustees of the national museums and galleries for which my Department is responsible are laid down as follows:

British Museum
British Museum Act 1963 Section 5
British Museum (Natural History)
British Museum Act 1963 Sections 5 and 8
Imperial War Museum
Imperial War Museum Act 1920 Section 2
National Gallery
National Gallery and Tate Gallery Act 1954 Sections 2 and 6
National Maritime Museum
National Maritime Museum Act 1934 Sections 2 and 6
National Museums and Galleries on Merseyside
The Merseyside Museums and Galleries Order 1986 Article 6
National Portrait Gallery
Treasury Minutes of 2 December 1856 et seq appear to preclude disposals
Science Museum
National Heritage Act 1983 Section 14
Tate Gallery
National Gallery and Tate Gallery Act 1954 Sections 1, 2, 5 and 6
Victoria and Albert Museum
National Heritage Act 1983 Section 6
Wallace Collection
Deed of Trust of 27 July 1899 appears to preclude disposals

National Portrait Gallery

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Minister for the Arts whether he has taken legal advice on the powers of disposal of the national portrait gallery.

Mr. Luce [holding answer 7 November 1988]: The national portrait gallery, unlike most of the other national museums and galleries, is governed by a series of Treasury minutes rather than by statute. The trustees' powers of disposal are not made explicit in the Treasury minutes but the legal advice I have is that they very probably do not have any such powers.

I am intending to introduce legislation which will, among other things, grant corporate status to the national portrait gallery trustees. The legislation will make clear what the board's powers and duties are to be, on this and other matters.

ENVIRONMENT

Wales

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those aspects of his responsibilities which include a functional responsibility within Wales.

Mr. Ridley: Normally my responsibilities cover England alone, but in some cases they entail a functional responsibility within Wales. These are as follows:—

1. Property Services Agency
Responsibility for the functions of the Property Services Agency: providing, managing, maintaining and furnishing property used by the Government througout the United Kingdom and abroad.

2. Conservation and wildlife
(a) Registration and inspection of birds listed under schedule 4 of the 1981 Wildlife and Countryside Act.
(b) Registration and inspection of sellers of dead birds.
(c) Licensing of various activities relating to birds, as specified under the 1981 Wildlife and Countryside Act.
(d) Issuing reports to the EC on the UK implementation of and derogation from the EEC birds directive and reports relating to the United Kingdom's obligations under the Berne, Bonn and other international agreements.
(e) Issuing import and export licences under the convention on international trade in endangered species to applicants from Wales.
(f) Supporting the commons commissioners who adjudicate in disputes over the registration of common land and village greens in England and Wales under the 1965 Commons Registration Act.
(g) Representing the United Kingdom at international fora covering wild life matters.

3. Environmental Affairs
Covering the Welsh interest in the United Kingdom's international dealings on the environment.

4. Local Government Affairs
(a) Responsibility for the local government superannuation regulations and for related appeals by local government staff.
Similar responsibilities in respect of compensation for local government staff made redundant or retired early.
(b) Responsibility for most functions relating to the rating system throughout England and Wales, and for regulations as to the form of mortgages and the terms of issue of stocks and bonds entered into or issued by local authorities for the purpose of borrowing and connected matters. However, under the new local government finance system, these functions will be transferred to my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Wales.

5. Water Services
Sponsorship and regulatory functions in respect of the Severn Trent water authority, part of whose area lies within Wales.

6. Housing and Construction Industry
(a) Responsibility for making regulations relating to building control in England and Wales. The administration of the regulations in Wales is, however, a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.
(b) Responsibility for general sponsorship of the construction industry throughout the United Kingdom relating to:
— policy on construction codes and standards
— EC matters
— export promotion
— public purchasing policy affecting the construction industry — collection of statistics from private contractors
(c) Responsibility for the administration of the homeloan scheme and the option mortgage guarantee scheme both in England and Wales, except where the head offices of participating institutions are in Wales.

7. In addition I sponsor a number of public bodies whose remit includes Wales. My responsibilities in these cases extend to such matters as the appointment of members and the provision of grant-in-aid.

Mr. Heddle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to request each of the regional water authorities in England and Wales to prepare a detailed schedule of their land and property holdings prior to privatisation.

Mr. Howard: Information on the assets which will pass to the companies succeeding the regional water authorities is being assembled by the firms appointed as reporting accountants for each authority.

Housing

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the current total expenditure on housing services for (a) those in the public sector, (b) those in the private sector and (c) other housing which cannot be allocated to one of the above categories, excluding any money paid out under the housing benefit scheme.

Mr. Trippier: The forecast outturn of public expenditure within programme 7 (DOE—Housing) for 1988-89 is as follows:

	£ million
[1] Support to the public sector
gross capital	2,638
current	1,286
[2] Support to the private sector
gross capital	1,526
current	43

Notes:

[1] Includes local authority and new town capital expenditure on housing for rent; central Government housing subsidies to local authorities and new towns; rate fund contributions; and other central and local government current expenditure.

[2] Includes the capital expenditure of housing associations on provision for rent and on low-cost home ownership initiatives; central Government current subsidies to housing associations; and home improvement grants and other grants to private individuals for the improvement and renovation of their homes.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has to reduce the shortage of low-priced housing in Nottingham.

Mr. Trippier: With its big housing investment programme and the wide range of Government initiatives, Nottingham city council has unrivalled scope for enabling housing associations and the private sector to produce low-priced housing.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the number of council houses built in Greater London in each of the last three years.

Mr. Trippier: The total number of dwellings completed by London boroughs and the Greater London council in each of the years 1985 to 1987 appear in table 6.4(b) of "Housing and Construction Statistics 1977-1987", a copy of which is available in the Library.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will discuss the level of housing investment programme finance for Nottingham with local councillors.

Mr. Trippier: My officials have made arrangements to discuss Nottingham's housing investment programme for 1989-90 with the city council on 29 November. This is an opportunity for councillors to bring any particular problems to my notice.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is, for each year since 1974 and in 1988 money, the total amount of public funds spent in England and Wales on housing (a) maintenance, (b) repairs and (c) building.

Mr. Trippier: This information is not readily available in the form requested.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total, or actual and in real terms, of total expenditure on local government in 1970, 1979, 1984 and 1988.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Local authority expenditure in the United Kingdom in cash and real terms is as follows:

	£ million cash	real[1] (1987-88 prices)
1970-71	6,759	37,477
1979-80	24,740	43,438
1984-85	38,730	44,408
1987-88	44,484	44,484

Note:

The 1988-89 figures are not yet available.

[1] Using the GDP deflator to convert cash values into constant prices.

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average cost of a local government employee; and if he will break down the average cost into pay, national insurance, superannuation and other costs, respectively.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The available information is as follows:

Cost of full-time equivalent (FTE) posts in local for 1987-88[1]

Average of FTEs (over 4 quarters)	Annual cost	Average Annual Cost per FTE[3]
	£ million	£
1,925,800	[2]23,750	12,300

[1] Figures shown are for England and include agency staff.

[2] Includes—

gross pay, together with payments and allowances, compensation for loss of office and redundancy payments; employers share of national insurance contributions; contributions to superannuation funds and beneficiaries under pension schemes—eg. police and firemen; payments made to staff which are later reimbursed by central Government, MSC etc.

but excludes—

payments for training expenses, removal expenses etc;
transfer values on superannuation funds;
allowances paid to councillors.

[3] A breakdown of the costs is not available.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will meet Nottingham city council in the near future to discuss local government finance for the area.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has published his proposals for the 1989-90 rate support grant settlement on 11 November 1988. Any representations from Nottingham city council will be taken into account and any request for a meeting will be considered.

Stamford Bridge Stadium

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is now able to confirm the planning consent in respect of the Stamford Bridge stadium granted by Hammersmith and Fulham borough council in December 1987.

Mr. Chope: No. The report of the inspector has just been received. The decision will be issued as quickly as possible.

Bed-and-Breakfast Accommodation

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the latest figures for households in bed-and-breakfast accommodation (a) in Nottingham and (b) in England as a whole.

Mr. Trippier: Latest estimates of households temporarily placed in bed and breakfast accommodation by English local authorities appear in table 4(a) and numbers reported by individual authorities in table 7 of "Local authorities' action under the homelessness provisions of the 1988 Housing Act: England. Results for the second quarter 1988. Supplementary Tables", which is available in the Library.

Rating Reform

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what financial and other assistance his Department will offer to promote public understanding of the poll tax (a) in Nottingham and (b) in England and Wales as a whole.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: As explained in the answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) on 21 October at column 1034, local authorities will be receiving in 1989-90 specific Government help with the capital and revenue costs of preparing for the community charge. Between now and April 1990 the Government will be publishing material to help public understanding of the community charge; we are considering what form this material might best take. It will be for individual authorities to consider whether to provide additional material.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his assessment of the expected effect of the introduction of the unified business rate in (a) Nottingham and (b) the east midlands region.

Mr. Gummer: On the basis of present rate poundages, business rates would fall on introduction of the uniform business rate in 1990 by 15 per cent. (£10 million) in Nottingham and by an average of 13 per cent. (£86 million) in the east midlands region; thereafter, they will rise by no more than the retail price index. These figures take no account of the revaluation of business property which is to take place in 1990.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply of 28 October, Official Report, column 426, whether the regulations will prescribe a penalty if an individual attempts to make a copy of the extract of the register; and whether he will outline the advice that will be given to community charge officers if they suspect a person of taking an unauthorised copy of the extract of the register.

Mr. Gummer: The regulations will not prescribe a penalty, since there is no power to do so. We are advising registration officers that, should they find a person attempting to copy the extract, they should take appropriate preventive action.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his latest estimate of (a) the average community charge payment in 1990-91, (b) the community charge payment in Nottingham in 1990-91 and (c) the average community charge payment for those on income support in 1990-91.

Mr. Gummer: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has received any representations on the poll tax from the Nottingham city council.

Mr. Gummer: Nottingham city council has made no representations about any poll tax. It has, however, written letters dated 30 July 1986 and 15 April 1987 about the Government's rate reform proposals.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether his Department has conducted any studies into the likely effect in recruitment of (a) student nurses and (b) nurses following the introduction of the community charge in areas of above average projected levels of community charge; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: I have been asked to reply. I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Environment on 28 October at column 426. We have decided that the definition of "full-time students" for community charge purposes should not be widened to include student nurses who continue to be trained under the existing pre-Project 2000, arrangements and have average earnings of between £5,400 and £6,200. Qualified nurses are about to receive pay increases averaging 17·9 per cent.; the level of community charge will doubtless be determined by local authorities with full regard to the likely effect on employment with all local employers, not just the National Health Service.

River Trent

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the condition of the Trent and its tributaries in (a) Nottingham and (b) Nottinghamshire.

Mr. Moynihan: The quality of the Trent has been improved significantly in recent years. It now fully meets its quality objective of class 2 (fair) quality as it flows through Nottingham and Nottinghamshire and supports good coarse fisheries.

I understand from the Severn Trent water authority that most of the main Nottinghamshire tributaries of the Trent also now meet its quality objectives. The main exceptions are the rivers Erewash, Maun and Idle which are still below standard. Planned improvements to the authority's sewage treatment works should result in these rivers generally achieving their quality objectives by the mid-1990s.

Competitive Tendering

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will visit Nottingham city council to discuss the effect of competitive tendering in local government.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: My right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government visited Nottingham on 19 October and discussed with Nottingham city council a range of local government issues, including competitive tendering.

Pollution

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the action taken by his Department to monitor pollution in waters around the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: Primary responsibility for monitoring coastal and estuarial waters in England and Wales rests with the regional water authorities. The Department is not directly involved but does periodically review the authorities' monitoring programmes. The results of monitoring river and estuarial water quality are published every five years by the Department and the Welsh Office in the river quality survey of England and Wales. A copy of the 1985 survey report is available in the Library.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what factors he will take account of in setting the rate support grant for Nottingham city council for 1989-90.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Secretary of State's proposals for the 1989-90 RSG settlement are set out in the consultation paper issued on 11 November. Copies have been sent to all local authorities, and have been placed in the Library.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment by what percentage rate support grant (a) to Nottingham city council and (b) to Nottinghamshire county council has changed relative to the rate of inflation for each year since 1979; and what are the reasons for the difference in each year.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley The information requested is listed below:

Percentage change in rate support grant relative to the rate of inflation[1]

	Nottingham city council	Nottinghamshire county council
1979-80—80-81	−7·1	0·9
1980-81—81-82	—[2]	—[2]
1981-82—82-83	−0·9	−12·3
1982-83—83-84	4·4	−8·7
1983-84—84-85	−3·5	6·4
1984-85—85-86	10·0	−9·7
1985-86—86-87	9·8	−16·0
1986-87—87-88	−13·1	+9·7
1987-88—88-89	−1·4	−6·2

Notes:

[1] Percentage changes have been calculated after converting cash values of the rate support grant into constant prices using the GDP deflator.

[2] Not available, as the basis for the rate support grant was different in 1980-81 and in 1981-82.

The percentage changes are based on latest grant entitlements. These are final for the years 1979-80 to 1984-85. The changes in grant from each year to year reflect changes in the total amount of grant available and changes in the distribution of that total between authorities. Changes in grant distribution in turn reflect changes in GRE methodology and data, changes in grant mechanisms—such as the abolition o. targets and holdback and steeper slopes of the poundage schedule introduced in the 1986-87—and authorities' spending decisions.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much Government grant in total has been lost by (a) Nottingham city council and (b) Nottinghamshire county council as a result of penalties imposed because of over-spending in each of the years since 1979.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State issued expenditure guidance to local authorities only for the years 1981-82 to 1985-86: those authorities that spend above their guidance figure were subject to grant abatement. The figures requested are set out in the table below. They are based on the latest information available.

Block grant abated due to expenditure in excess of guidance 1980-81 to 1985-86

£ thousand

	Nottingham City	Nottinghamshire
1981-82	0	19
1982-83	0	15,210
1983-84	30	22,072
1984-85	0	2,147
1985-86	0	0

Unleaded Petrol

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will arrange for regular monitoring and publication of the uptake of unleaded petrol.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We monitor closely the uptake of unleaded petrol. Regular reports from the industry and Her Majesty's Customs and Excise are provided at meetings of the unleaded petrol group which I chair. We are considering ways in which this information might usefully be published more widely.

Sir Anthony Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the progress being made in changing from leaded to unleaded petrol; what representations he has received on the subject; and what steps are being taken to increase the rate of take-up of unleaded fuel.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Encouraging progress is being made with the introduction of unleaded petrol. It is now available at some 2,300 petrol stations. The number is continuing to grow rapidly. The obstacles are no longer availability or the price of unleaded petrol. The Chancellor's action in the last Budget ensured that unleaded petrol is now on sale some 6p per gallon below the price of 4-star petrol and comfortably below that of 2-star.

Soon, new models of cars (from October 1989) and new cars of any model (October 1990) will have to be able to run on unleaded petrol. The task in the next few months is to overcome ignorance and apathy. For every motorist now saving 4-6p a gallon while protecting the environment, there are 30 other motorists wasting money and needlessly damaging the environment.

I have received a number of representations on the subject. I chair regular meetings of the unleaded petrol group, at which the oil and motor industries, CLEAR (the Campaign for Lead-Free Air), motoring organisations and consumer bodies are represented.

We have taken steps to encourage the uptake of unleaded petrol including providing publicity material in the form of a general information leaflet, a list and chart of cars which can run on unleaded petrol without adjustment, a map of unleaded petrol stations, posters for display in garage service areas encouraging motorists to have their cars adjusted to run on unleaded petrol, unleaded petrol stickers, information about every new car's capability of using unleaded petrol, general information about unleaded petrol in the Department of Transport's new car fuel consumption booklet which is published twice a year and agreement with the Department of Transport to distribute a leaflet on unleaded petrol with vehicle licence reminders. In addition, there is publication of a DOE guidance note on the appropriate labelling of vehicles; and funding of CLEAR to provide a general information service.

Sir Anthony Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what further studies his Department is undertaking into catalytic converters for vehicles; and if he will make a statement of Government policy on such research.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It is for industry to develop products which meet standards laid down. The Government's aim in setting vehicle emission standards is to achieve effective reductions, based on the best technical and scientific understanding of abatement technology and impact on the environment.

To this end the Warren Spring and Harwell laboratories, under the Department's air pollution research programme, have studied the emissions of vehicles equipped with catalytic converters and their potential effects on air quality. In conjunction with the Department of Transport, the Department plans next year to carry out a further study of pollutant emissions from vehicles in use. Consideration is being given to how this might include vehicles equipped with catalysts. New information on the actual performance in use of catalytic converters and other approaches to vehicle emission control will be used, as it becomes available, to refine estimates of the potential impact on air quality.

Sir Philip Goodhart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what instructions he has given for the modification of cars used by his Department so that they can use unleaded petrol

Mr. Chope: The Crown Suppliers (a trading fund of the Property Services Agency) have issued instructions to their regional transport managers that all vehicles which can be converted to run on unleaded petrol should be so converted at the earliest opportunity and no later than the next scheduled service. It is also the Crown Suppliers' policy to replace vehicles with those capable of running on unleaded petrol whenever possible.

Housing Departments (Staff)

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total number of staff employed in local authority housing departments in 1979 and at the present date.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The total number of staff employed in the administration of housing matters in local authorities in England was 47,305 full-time equivalents in June 1979 and 60,563 full-time equivalents in June 1988.

Council Houses

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total number of council-owned houses (a) in England and (b) in the United Kingdom in 1979 and at the present date.

Mr. Trippier: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Waste Management Paper 27

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to publish Waste Management Paper 27.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The waste management paper on the control of landfill (Waste Management Paper 27) will be published in January 1989.

Acids and Alkalis (Disposal)

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to publish a paper on the disposal of acids and alkalis; and when publication was originally expected.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Air Pollution

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what statements have been made by his Department regarding the effect of Crown immunity on air pollution.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The 1986 Consultation Paper "Air Pollution Control in Great Britain: Review and Proposals" stated that Crown immunity does not imply lower standards than elsewhere. Where atmospheric emissions are judged to be a statutory nuisance the Secretary of State has the power under the Clean Air Act 1956 to require the use of best practicable means to abate the nuisance.

Welcoming the third report of the hazardous waste inspectorate my hon. Friend, the Member for Lewisham, East (Official Report, 22 June 1988, column 626) reported that health authorities no longer have Crown immunity from the requirements of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 and that it was intended that the new controls on incinerator emissions associated with the proposed new air pollution legislation would apply to health authorities as to all other operators.

Housing (Consultative Document)

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place copies in the Library of all the responses his Department has received to the consultation document on houses in multiple occupation which he issued in July.

Mr. Trippier: A list of the responses received to date has been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. Copies of the responses are available in the library at the Department of the Environment, 2 Marsham street, SW1.

Green Belt

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the advice contained in circulars 42/55, 50/57 and 14/84, and in planning policy guidance note 2, applies equally to green belts across the United Kingdom.

Mr. Chope: The advice in these documents applies equally to all green belts in England. There is no green belt in Wales. Green belt policy in Scotland and Northern Ireland is the responsibility of my right hon. Friends.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the advice contained within planning policy guidance note 2 on the need to maintain the green belt boundaries in the long term overrides the requirement for a five-year housing land supply contained in planning policy guidance note 3.

Mr. Chope: PPG2 advises that established green belt boundaries should be altered only in exceptional circumstances. PPG3 makes clear that the absence of an indentified five year's supply of land does not in itself create a presumption in favour of development "where there are clear planning objections which in the circumstances of the case outweigh the need to make the land available for housing".
The relative weight to be accorded to advice in PPG's will depend on the particular circumstances of each case.

Council Employees (Manchester and Stockport)

Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many borough council employees there are per thousand head of population in (a) Manchester and (b) Stockport.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The number of staff per thousand is 88 in Manchester and 44 in Stockport according to latest available figures.

Radioactivity

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has received any reports of abnormally high levels of atmospheric radioactivity in the Greater Manchester area on the night of Friday 28 October; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department monitors levels of radioactivity in the Nottingham area.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution carried out monitoring with respect to premises authorised under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960 where this is deemed necessary to confirm that radioactive discharge levels are environmentally safe. In addition a RIMNET monitoring station has been set up at Watnall in the Nottingham area.

Planning (Berkshire)

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many planning appeals relating to Berkshire were made to his Department in 1987; and how many were approved.

Mr. Chope: A total of 707 appeals were received; 520 were determined; and 292 were allowed.

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to publish his final decisions about the proposals in the review of the Berkshire structure plan.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend's final approval of the Berkshire replacement structure plan was published on Friday 11 November.

City Technology College (Bradford)

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has received any application under the provisions of the Local Government Act 1972 for the sale of land in Bradford for the site of a city technology college; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: No such applications have been received.

RIMNET

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many personnel are employed by RIMNET.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The core of the RIMNET team consists of three people. Other managerial staff are involved as appropriate.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many incidents have been detected by RIMNET;

(2) how serious an incident has to be before RIMNET makes it public;

(3) to whom RIMNET reports;

(4) what parts of the United Kingdom come within RIMNET's monitoring remit; and which areas are excluded;

(5) what action is taken by RIMNET when an abnormally high level of radiation is detected;

(6) what level of radiation is regarded by RIMNET as being abnormally high.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to my answer to his request for a general statement regarding RIMNET.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is RIMNET's budget.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The provision for RIMNET in the current financial year is £2 million.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the work of the radiation incident monitoring network.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: My right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for the Environment is responsible for the operation of the national radiation incident monitoring network, designed to handle future overseas nuclear incidents.

As I stated in my previous reply of 28 October at column 428, the 46 monitoring stations throughout the United Kingdom, became operational in June and are now feeding data to London. We hope to accept the associated computer and telecommunications system for phase 1 of RIMNET from the contractor shortly. RIMNET will automatically trigger an alert if radiation rises above the normal background level at one or more of the monitoring stations. This background level will vary from station to station. No incidents have yet been detected. The procedures for responding to an alert, which involve informing interested organisations and the public, are included within the national response plan details of which are set out in the Department of the Environment booklet. "The National Response Plan and Radioactive Incident Monitoring Network (RIMNET). A Statement of Proposals" published by the HMSO, copies of which have been placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Terry Fields: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has ascertained the sources of reports of a radioactive cloud over the north-west of the United Kingdom on Friday 28-29 October; what steps were taken to check any probable source of radiation; what level of monitoring is currently undertaken in this as against other parts of the country; if he will consider 24-hour monitoring as an alternative to the Government's RIMNET system; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No releases of radioactivity to the environment have been either notified to or detected by the Department. When operational, phase 1 of the RIMNET system will provide 24-hour monitoring at some 40 sites. Abnormal levels of radiation in the environment reported to Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution are always investigated.

Pollution (Greater Manchester)

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what atmospheric monitoring facilities exist in the Greater Manchester area for the detection and measurement of pollution; who is responsible for the operation of such facilities; and to whom they report.

Mr. Ridley: The table below gives details of the air pollution monitoring undertaken on behalf of his Department and, so far as can be ascertained, on behalf of other bodies.

Number of monitors for specified pollutants	Operator of monitor	Recipient of data

Water Supplies (Palace of Westminster)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether any of the water supplied to Parliament comes via lead pipes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: None of the water to taps within the Palace of Westminster which are labelled for drinking purposes is supplied through lead pipes. The position regarding other taps not so labelled is less clear and some supplies may still pass through sections of lead pipes.

Development Corporations

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report the grants made to development corporations at the latest date.

Mr. Trippier: The Supply Estimates for 1988-89 (Cm. 339) set out the allocation of grants to urban development corporations. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State proposes to make some adjustments to those figures; the proposed amendments will be set out in the Winter Supplementaries which will be laid before the House shortly.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he has taken to monitor the working of development corporations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State continuously monitors the working of urban development corporations. Each UDC brings forward annual plans which are reviewed by and discussed with Ministers; the implementation of the UDC's programme is monitored during the year; and each UDC is required by statute to make an annual report to the Secretary of State, incorporating its audited accounts. The Secretary of State is required to lay the annual report before the House.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much public money has been spent on the Merseyside development corporation to the latest date.

Mr. Trippier: To date Merseyside development corporation has invested £180 million of public sector funding in its area.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representation Liverpool city council had on the board of the Merseyside development corporation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: Liverpool city council has had no member on the board since 1983 when the new Labour Council decided not to nominate a successor to Sir Trevor Jones. In January this year the council was invited to nominate a member but it has not done so.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the sale of 30 acres of development corporation land by the Merseyside development corporation for housing purposes, detailing the type of housing, its anticipated cost, the mix of housing and its proposed control.

Mr. Trippier: I am not sure which particular land the hon. Member is referring to. However, there is a planning permission for residential development of 27 acres of land at Dingle lane in Merseyside development corporation's riverside development area. The information I can give is limited because MDC is negotiating the sale of the land with a housebuilder and details have not been finalised. I understand that the present plans are for about 180 houses for sale ranging from terraced to detached, at a broad range of prices. The form of development will be controlled by the development corporation as planning authority and through the covenants contained in the building licence/sale documents.

Water Industry

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what restrictions will be placed on current water gathering grounds in terms of use and resale in order to secure public access to environmental amenities after privatisation of the water industry.

Mr. Moynihan: The Government propose that the present duty of the water authorities to have regard, in discharging their functions, to the desirability of preserving public rights of access to catchment land in their ownership should apply after privatisation to both the NRA and the privatised water undertakers.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what restrictions are envisaged in order to prevent or regulate planning applications for permanent structure on current water authority holdings after privatisation of the water industry.

Mr. Moynihan: No special restrictions are contemplated. Development on land owned by the water authorities is governed by the general planning legislation relevant to the area in question and the circumstances of the particular proposal. This will be unaffected by changes in the ownership of the water industry.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what valuation has taken place so far in terms of land holdings and assets of each regional water authority in preparation for the privatisation of the water industry.

Mr. Moynihan: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) on 31 October at column 538.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he proposes that the privatised water companies will be open to purchase by a consortium of local authorities.

Mr. Moynihan: I know of no powers under which a consortium of local authorities could do so and I have no proposals to enable them so to do.

Housing (Nottingham)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make supplementary capital allowances available to bring up to standard BISF-style homes in Bilborough, Nottingham.

Mr. Trippier: If Nottingham city council has proposals to aid owners of BISF houses through home improvement grants, it will no doubt wish to bring these forward at its discussions with the Department's regional office later this month, on the 1989-90 HIP allocation.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has written to those building societies which are currently refusing to lend on BISF homes in Bilborough, Nottingham; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: We have taken this matter up with the Building Societies Association, which has been in touch with the societies concerned; and we hope to enter into further discussions very shortly.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if, pursuant to his statement on 27 June, Official Report, columns 162-63, he will meet the hon. Member for Nottingham, North and a delegation of BISF home owners from Bilborough, Nottingham, to discuss the designation of their properties under section 28 of the Housing Act 1985;

(2) if, pursuant to the answer of 27 October, Official Report, column 406, he will make it his policy to write to Nottingham city council and to the Bilborough BISF group to seek their views on the housing defects legislation.

Mr. Trippier: I have writen to the hon. Member proposing a meeting to discus the morgageability of BISF houses in Nottingham. This could provide an opportunity for home owners and the city council to put forward their views, although I have to say that we do not consider this to be a case where use of the housing defects legislation would be appropriate.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will consider additional assistance to Nottingham city council to relocate those elderly people who wish to move from three-bedroom council homes to smaller housing;

(2) if he will publish in the Official Report the housing investment programme bids and the allocations for Nottingham for each year since 1979-80 in constant terms; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give figures showing the average discount on sales of Nottingham city council properties and the England and Wales average for each year since 1980.

Mr. Trippier: Figures for English local authorities and for Nottingham city council are given below. For Welsh figures I refer the hon. Member to the Secretary of State for Wales.

Notes:
[1] Indicates figures are not available.
[2] Indicates averages exclude block sales of dwellings in these years.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has had from local authorities regarding demands for rent arrears arising from changes in housing benefit levels; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. Friend has recieved no such representations directly. The subject has, however, been raised by several Members and with my officials in various discussions with local authority officers. I have nothing to add to what I told the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) on 25 October.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the average price of a house in Nottingham available for each of the years since 1979.

Mr. Trippier: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much housing benefit has been paid in Nottingham in the months since April; and what was the figure for the comparable period in 1987.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I have been asked to reply.
I regret that this information is not available centrally.

Mortgages

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to how many people are currently paying off a mortgage; how many of those have their mortgage repayments adjusted monthly, quarterly, or yearly; and, of those, what is the average increase in repayments by region in relation to that date at which interest rates were at their lowest since June 1987.

Mr. Trippier: At 30 June 1988 there were 7,230,000 building society outstanding mortgages in the United Kingdom. Since June 1987, the interest rate for the top 14 building societies was at its lowest on 1 May 1988. I regret that the remainder of the information is not available to the Department.

Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is his Department's estimate of the cost to the London borough of Bexley of providing mortgages for residents of Thamesmead in accordance with the London Government Reorganisation (Mortgages) Order 1988;

(2) what additional funds are being made available to the London borough of Bexley for the provision of mortgages in accordance with the London Government Reorganisation (Mortgages) Order 1988.

Mr. Trippier: Our estimate of the cost is minimal, but we shall take any cost into account in the context of Bexley's annual housing investment programme bid.

Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to introduce an order to amend the provision of the London Government Reorganisation (Mortgages) Order 1988.

Mr. Trippier: No.

Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received concerning the operation of the London Government Reorganisation (Mortgages) Order 1988.

Mr. Trippier: My Department received seven responses to the consultation letter of 5 July on the proposals for the London Government Reorganisation (Mortgages) Order 1988. Since laying the order further representations have been made by the London boroughs of Bexley and Greenwich.

Local Government Expenditure

Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on what steps he proposes to take in the light of the proposals by Ealing, Hammersmith and Fulham and Brent councils to use housing investment programme allocations for public housing on a rotation basis to avoid proposed capital controls on council expenditure.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to make illegal arrangements whereby councils rotate public housing built out of housing investment programme allocations on an ownership—leave basis; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: No proposals for such arrangements have been made to my right hon. Friend, but I understand that they involve the successive short-term leasing of properties for periods of up to three years. The Government propose, subject to the approval of Parliament, to replace the present capital controls with a new system of capital finance which will take effect from 1990-91. We are considering the appropriate treatment for forward commitments entered into by local authorities between the publication of our proposals on 7 July and the commencement of the new system. Authorities entering into forward commitments must of course be satisfied that they have powers and that it is reasonable and justifiable so to do.

Garden Festival Site, Liverpool

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to the proposal to designate the Liverpool garden festival site as a royal park; and if he will make a statement about its future.

Mr. Trippier: The royal parks are of special origin and special significance. They were once going back mainly to Tudor times—private lands in the personal possession of the Sovereign. They still belong to the Sovereign although the public now use them freely. My Department's responsibility is restricted to managing the historical royal parks on behalf of the Crown. There is no intention to add to their number.

As far as the future of the festival park is concerned, the Merseyside development corporation has now agreed draft terms with a commercial leisure park operator who intends to take a long lease on the festival park, and operate this throughout the year.

I am very hopeful that this arrangement will secure the future maintenance of this high-quality park for the people of Liverpool without additional public expenditure. The disposal of the park to the commercial leisure park operator has received the support of the Liverpool city council.

Water Supplies (Nottingham)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to collect information on the number of houses in (a) Nottingham and (b) other cities which have water supplied through lead pipes.

Mr. Moynihan: No. It is more important to know the plumbo-solvency of the water, and to that end surveys have been carried out by water undertakers.

Right to Buy

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how long applicants wait on average to exercise their right to buy (a) in Nottingham and (b) in England as a whole.

Mr. Trippier: The performance of certain local authorities is formally monitored by the Department, but information on the time taken to deal with individual applications is not collected. I am not aware that tenants of Nottingham city council are experiencing delays in exercising the right to buy.

Homelessness

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many people per thousand population are currently in bed-and-breakfast accommodation paid for by local authorities (a) in Nottingham and (b) in England and Wales.

Mr. Trippier: Nottingham city council reported that 0·24 per 1,000 of households in their area were homeless and temporarily placed in bed-and-breakfast accommodation at 30 June 1988. The corresponding estimate for all English authorities is 0·65 per thousand households. Some of the cost of providing this accommodation may be offset by contributions from household or by DHSS allowances. For Welsh figures I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Housing (Repossessions)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give information available to him on the total number of repossessions by building societies for each of the years since 1979 in (a) Nottingham, (b) the east midlands region and, (c) nationally.

Mr. Trippier: The information of repossessions is not available to the Department for Nottingham or the east midlands region. For the national figures, I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) to the hon. member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) on 27 June 1988 at columns 149-50.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will henceforth collect and publish information showing the number of former council houses repossessed each year.

Mr. Trippier: For the latest information on repossessions, I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) to the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) on 27 June at columns 149-50. Information separating repossession of ex-council houses from other repossessions is not available.

Rates

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average rate bill (a) in Nottingham and (b) in England and Wales for the latest years for which figures are available.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information requested is shown below:

	Nottingham £	England and Wales £
1986-87	375	392
1987-88	391	420
1988-89	418	459

Land Disposal (Nottingham)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all applications made by the city of Nottingham for consent to the disposal of land under section 123 of the Local Government Act 1972 which have been made since May 1987 to date, stating whether his consent has been given in each case.

Mr. Chope: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Football Clubs (Nottingham)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last visited the city ground, Nottingham Forest, and Meadow lane, Notts County; and when he next plans to do so.

Mr. Moynihan: My right hon. Friend has yet to visit the city ground, Nottingham Forest, or Meadow lane, Notts County, and has no immediate plans to do so. I would be happy to consider an invitation to visit either of these clubs.

Housing Bill

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from Nottingham city council on the terms of the Housing Bill.

Mr. Trippier: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Water Rates

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average cost per household for water rates in the current year (a) nationally and (b) in Nottingham.

Mr. Moynihan: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell) on 3 November 1988 at column 729. Information on average household bills for sub-divisions of water authority areas is not held centrally.

Mr. Boyes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether water rates currently paid by council tenants through the agency of local authorities will be waived for the duration of the domestic water metering trials.

Mr. Howard [holding answer 11 November 1988]: Yes. Council tenants in these areas will pay their measured water charges direct to the water undertaker, and not with their rent via their local authority.

Mr. Boyes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he intends to take to ensure that the water rate element of the rent paid by private tenants to their landlords is eliminated for those private tenants participating in the domestic water metering trials.

Mr. Howard [holding answer 11 November 1988]: Private tenants living in separately rated hereditaments in the trial areas, who currently pay their water charges with their rent, will pay their measured water charges direct to the water undertaker, unless the landlord enters into an agreement with the water undertaker to be responsible for these charges. The new arrangements will be carefully explained to every tenant and landlord concerned, so that everyone is aware of the change and how it will work.

Dog Wardens

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to provide all local authorities with powers to appoint dog wardens; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Rent Rebates

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the average unrebated rent and the average rebate for (a) Nottingham and (b) the United Kingdom as a whole, for each year since 1979.

Mr. Trippier: The average weekly unrebated local authority rents and rebates for Nottingham (reported) and England (estimated) are:

	Nottingham		England
	Rent £	Rebate £	Rent £	Rebate £
[1]1979	6·28	0·72	6·41	0·67
1980	7·49	0·89	7·70	0·85
1981	11·72	1·89	11·42	1·45
1982	14·27	2·29	13·48	1·87
1983	14·39	8·14	13·97	6·44
1984	14·25	8·15	14·66	7·30
1985	15·68	8·69	15·54	7·90
1986	16·66	9·70	16·36	8·47
1987	17·16	10·30	17·20	8·95
1988	19·01	10·45	18·75	..

[1] April-May.

Notes:

1. Average rent rebate is the total rent assistance divided by the total number of tenants, whether or not in receipt of benefits.
2. Prior to 1983, average rebates exclude rent assistance to those tenants in receipt of supplementary benefit.
3. Average rebates 1983-87 exclude small amounts of housing benefit supplement.
4. New housing benefit legislation was introduced in April 1988. National estimates are not yet available.

For information relating to Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland I refer the hon. Member to the appropriate Secretary of State.

Water Pollution

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he receives reports of major pollution incidents at water treatment works in (a) Severn Trent region and (b) other regions.

Mr. Moynihan: Yes. Arrangements exist for water undertakers to inform the Department of any significant pollution incidents which affect public water supplies.

Financial Assistance (Nottingham)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations have taken place between his Department and Nottingham city council since 3 November regarding the provision of services and further financial assistance to the city.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: None.

River Aire

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on causes for the downgrading of the River Aire from class two to class four.

Mr. Moynihan: Sections of the River Aire have been classified as class 4 since the inception of the present river quality classification scheme. I am not aware of any downgrading to class 4. Major improvement works, particularly at the Esholt and Knostrop sewage treatment works, which are in the Yorkshire water authority's capital programme, should result in the Aire achieving its long-term quality objectives of class 2 by the mid-1990s.

Pollution Control

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many pollution control officers will be employed by the proposed National Rivers Authority; and how many are presently employed by water authorities.

Mr. Moynihan: Excluding laboratory staff and others who also deal with other functions, approximately 450 staff who currently work in water authorities on pollution control functions are likely to transfer to the National Rivers Authority.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the environment what is the total number of pollution control staff employed by water authorities for each year since 1979.

Mr. Moynihan: This information is not readily available.

Effluent (Sewage Works)

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many applications for the relaxation of local controls on the discharge of effluent from sewage works have been received by his Department so far in 1988; which water authorities have made such applications; which sewage works are concerned; and what are the reasons given for the application.

Mr. Moynihan: During the period 1 January to 11 October 1988 the Department has received the following numbers of applications from water authorities in England under the Control of Pollution Act 1974: Anglian—65; Northumbrian—13; North-West—57; Severn Trent—77; Southern—18; South-West—44; Thames—36; Wessex—37; Yorkshire—40.

The majority of these were in respect of either new or previously unconsented storm and emergency overflows. A number of those submitted by the Anglian and Wessex water authorities were in respect of relaxations. Those for Anglian consisted of a backlog of applications from the review of consents undertaken by water authorities in 1985 as part of the process of implementing the Control of Pollution Act 1974. Those from the Wessex water authority are still being considered. Readily collatable records are only kept of applications received and consents issued so it is not possible to give the reasons for each application. However, water authorities maintain public registers which include details of applications made and consents issued.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received regarding the adequacy of the standard set by his Department on the maximum levels of solid matter and oxygen burning effluent permitted to be discharged into the river system by sewage workers.

Mr. Moynihan: Consent conditions for discharges from water authority works are set by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution on a case by case basis. There is no general maximum level. No representations have been received regarding the adequacy of the conditions set.

Lead Pollution

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what contribution his Department made to the week of action on lead pollution.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: National lead-free petrol week, which I launched on 28 October, is part of the information campaign supported by a DoE special grant and run by CLEAR charitable trust. I refer the hon. Member to the reply I today gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant) for details of the other actions the Department has taken to promote the use of unleaded petrol.

Competition Legislation

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has for applying the competition legislation to the functions to be transferred from the inner London education authority to the inner London boroughs and the City of London.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department is today issuing a consultation paper which sets out proposals for the introduction of the competition provisions of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 and the Local Government Act 1988 in respect of these functions. A copy of the paper has been placed in the Library.

The paper proposes a phased implementation programme for the introduction of competition under the 1988 Act with the first round of contracts to be let by 1 August 1991. Competition under the 1980 Act would apply from 1 April 1990. Comments on the proposals are to be sent to the Department by 31 January 1989.

Butterflies

Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to reach a decision on the conservation status of the 22 species of butterfly, recommended for protection by the Nature Conservancy Council in the quinquennial review of schedules 5 and 8 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have decided to add the 22 species of British butterfly to schedule 5 to the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 as recommended by the Nature Conservancy Council. This means that these species will be protected under the sale licensing provisions of section 9(5) of the Act. The necessary instrument to bring this amendment into force will be laid before the House shortly.

Housing Subsidies

Mr. Heddle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has decided what increases will be assumed, for housing subsidy purposes for 1989-90, in reckonable expenditure on maintaining local authority dwellings and in the deemed rent.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Secretary of State for Wales have decided that for 1989-90 the increases in reckonable expenditure and income to be used in calculating housing subsidy should, as for the current year, be some 5 per cent. higher than the general level of increases in costs and prices. We are therefore proposing that the amount of management and maintenance expenditure to be treated as reckonable for housing subsidy for 1989-90 should be increased by 10·25 per cent. The increase in income which authorities are deemed to find from their own resources in 1989-90 be £1·95 per dwelling per week. Consultation papers have been issued to the local authority associations today and copies have been placed in the Vote Office and in the Libraries of both Houses.

Competitive Tendering

Mr. John Carlisle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to begin consultation on the terms of the order which will bring the management of local authority sport and leisure facilities within the competitive tendering regime provided for in the Local Government Act 1988.

Mr. Moynihan: A draft order has today been sent to the English and Scottish local authority associations, national sports organisations and other interested bodies for comment. Copies have also been placed in the Library. Consultees are asked to respond by 13 January. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales is undertaking separate consultation with the appropriate Welsh organisations.

Right-to-buy Discounts

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to raising the present maximum ceiling figure for right-to-buy discounts.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 2 November 1988]: I shall write to the hon. Member.

UK 2000

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the projects that have been established to date by UK 2000, showing how many jobs have been created of a paid and voluntary nature, how much business sponsorship has been raised to date by UK 2000 and how much grant has been paid by his Department; and if he will make a statement on the future funding of UK 2000.

Mr. Ridley [holding answer 2 November 1988]: About 500 projects have been supported to date by UK 2000 in England. It would entail disproportionate expense to list them all. In June this year some 9,000 community programme trainees were employed on these projects; 15,000 volunteers have so far been involved in projects in the current year; and some 100 long-term jobs have been, or will be, created through these projects.

My Department's grant to UK 2000 was £597,685 in 1986-87, £1,381,137 in 1987-88 and £1,805,000 in 1988-89. UK 2000 has matched this grant with private sponsorship in each year. I consider this an impressive achievement.

It is my intention to continue funding UK 2000 at the same level in 1989-90 as in 1988-89. Accordingly I expect that the Department's grant will be a declining share of the overall budget for the initiative. I have undertaken to consider funding beyond 1989-90 later this year.

Acid Emissions

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to join the other ten European nations in agreeing a 30 per cent. reduction in acidic emissions; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 7 November 1988]: On 1 November in Sofia, my noble Friend the Minister for Housing Environment and Countryside signed, on behalf of the Government, the protocol to the 1979 convention on long-range transboundary air pollution concerning the control of emissions of nitrogen oxides or their transboundary fluxes (the "NOx Protocol"). This commits its signatories to halt the hitherto inexorable rise in NOx emissions (bringing emissions back to 1987 levels by 1994), to apply suitable standards to stationary and mobile sources, and by 1996 to have adopted control policies based on the "critical loads" which the environment can tolerate. Achieving an international commitment to putting policy development on to an explicit scientific footing is a major breakthrough. I am also pleased to say that the protocol commands widespread support from East and West Europe and North America. Twenty five countries signed the protocol and more indicated their hope to sign in the near future. This represents a major international commitment.

Soon before the protocol was due to be signed the Government received an invitation to sign a draft declaration to the effect that they would by 1998 achieve reductions in NOx emissions of at least 30 per cent. measured from a baseline of any year between 1980 and 1985. We did not however think it right to commit ourselves both to an arbitrary percentage target for 1998 and to the quite different "critical loads" approach of the protocol for the earlier date of 1996. At the last moment the draft declaration was reduced to a commitment to achieve reductions "in the order of 30 per cent. from a baseline of any year between 1980 and 1986. Twelve countries signed this version on 31 October, but it is uncertain from the final wording what action they mean to take, whereas the protocol is specific.

The United Kingdom is committed to taking action on the basis of scientific study of the problems caused by acid deposition and the implications of various possible solutions. The 1979 convention provides the right forum for advancing the international consensus which is essential if transboundary air pollution problems are to be successfully tackled.

Building Extensions (Appeals)

Mr. Hill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many applicants who have been refused local planning consent for additional stories on existing blocks of flats have gone to appeal and requested a public inquiry; what are these numbers by region; and what are the percentages of the successful outcome of such appeals by region.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 11 November 1988]: I regret that the information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Charitable Donations

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the cost to the Treasury of abolishing the higher rates relief limit for charitable convenants in 1986-87, 1987-88 and the first six months of 1988-89; and how much of the cost was attributable to such donations to professional arts organisations with charitable status in the same periods.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Information is not available in the precise form requested. The total cost of tax relief to individuals having separate or combined covenants in excess of £10,000 is estimated to be about £3 million in 1986-87, and £5 million in 1987-88. An estimate for 1988-89 is not available yet. Donations to professional arts organisations are not separately identified.

Farm Incomes

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, further to his reply dated 19 October concerning farm incomes for tax purposes, Official Report, columns 923-6, he will publish in the Official Report tables showing for each year since 1970 the information in tables 1 and 2 and the vertical totals in tables 3 and 4.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Information for years before 1981-82 is not readily available on a basis consistent with data for 1981-82 onwards.

The information for 1981-82 to 1985-86 is provided in the tables.

2. Gross profit includes balancing charges and stock relief withdrawn. It also includes any non agricultural/horticultural profits of individuals concerned.

Notes:
1. The number of cases is the number of married men and single people whose "main source" (usually but not always the largest source) of earned income is from self-employment in agriculture and horticulture; plus the number of married women whose largest source of self-employment income is from agriculture and horticulture.
2. Taxable profit is gross profit less losses and capital allowances so far as allowed for the income tax year.

Taxation Statistics

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish such figures as he has, comparing in local currencies and in pound sterling equivalent (a) gross domestic product per person, (b) average income tax paid per person and (c) average value added tax paid per person in each of the United Kingdom, Germany and France, during the latest year for which the figures are available.

Mr. Major: Comparisons of the United Kingdom, the German Federal Republic and France for 1986 may be made by reference to the relevant publications of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, namely OECD "National Accounts" volume 1 "Principal Aggregates" 1960 to 1986, and Revenue statistics of OECD member countries 1965-1987. Both these volumes are available in the Library of the House. It is recommended that comparison of GDP per head be made using the purchasing power parity figures (expressed in US dollars) published by OECD. Because numbers of taxpayers are not readily available, the comparisons requested on taxation per person cannot be derived. However some comparisons of taxation may be made by relating taxation statistics given in these volumes to measures of total economic activity, such as gross domestic product, both of which are available for 1986 expressed in the national currencies.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report figures showing the estimated revenue yield from abolishing the wife's earnings election and revoking the reductions in the rate of income tax on the wealthiest 1 per cent. of tax units.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him of 19 October at columns 934-36 and to my reply to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) on 9 May at column 30.

National Insurance

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the calculations in annex C of "Inland Revenue Statistics 1987" included the man's national insurance contribution, what was the change in the rate of contribution over the period; and if he will provide an estimate of the threshold figure for the current financial year.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Annex C of "Inland Revenue Statistics 1987" shows the income tax threshold and the break-even points since 1949-50 for different family types. The tax threshold is the personal allowance due, the break-even point (for families with children) is the value of earnings at which income tax paid is equal to the money received through child benefit or family allowance. National insurance contributions are not included.

For comparisons over a number of years, the annex gives the threshold as a percentage of average earnings, before deduction of national insurance contributions.

In 1949-50 employees paid flat rate national insurance contributions, and in 1988-89 the rate of contribution will depend on the level of earnings.

In 1988-89 the tax thresholds at current prices are equal to the personal allowances for single people and married men announced in the Budget.

Class 4 Contributions

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for 1978-79 and the current financial year the number of class 4 contributions, the amount collected, and the upper income limit compared to the median and the upper decile incomes of the self-employed.

Mr. Norman Lamont: About £118 million in class 4 contributions was collected in 1978-79, and about £435 million is expected in the current financial year. Estimates of the number of class 4 contributions and the deciles of self employment income were not compiled for 1978-79, and predictions for the current financial year have not been made.

Age Allowance

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the rate of income support for the elderly in the case of single persons and married couples with no other income; what is the basic pension; how much income tax would be payable in each case; and what would be the saving to the revenue if the age allowance for income tax were no higher than is required to relieve income support from liability to tax.

Mr. Norman Lamont: In April 1988, supplementary benefit was replaced by income support.

The rates of income support for the elderly who receive no other income are:

Single persons age 60 or over	44·05 or 46·45
Married couples age 60 or over	67·70 or 70·05

The higher rates are payable to certain disabled people and to those age 80 and over.

The basic retirement pensions in 1988-89 are:

Single person	41·15
Married couple	65·90

Income support paid to the elderly is not taxable and an elderly person with no income other than the basic retirement pension would pay no income tax.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the maximum value in cash terms per single person and married couple of the additional income-tax age allowance for those aged over 80 years; and what is his estimate of the cash and percenage increase in income support which could be paid in each case by abolishing the additional age allowance for such tax units and targeting it on those now drawing income support.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The age allowances for those aged 80 and over are worth a maximum of 63p per week for a single person and 82p per week for a married couple compared with the age allowances for those aged 65 to 79. The extra cost of these allowances is of the order of £10 million per annum. Expenditure on income support is currently in excess of £8·5 billion a year, and therefore the addition of a further £10 million would increase benefits payable by about 0·1 per cent.

Stamp Duty

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the yield from stamp duty on the sale of residential property in the current financial year and the proportion of the housing stock represented by those sales together with their implied capital value.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The information is as follows:

Estimated yield from residential property	£1,150 million
Proportion of housing stock in United Kingdom	7 per cent.
Implied capital value	£115 billion

Personal Tax Allowances

Mr. Sean Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is considering the abolition of any personal tax allowances.

Mr. Norman Lamont: From 6 April 1990, under independent taxation, the present single person's allowance, married man's allowance and wife's earned income allowance will be replaced by the personal allowance and the married couple's allowance.

Public Expenditure

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state the total public expenditure of (a) the EC and (b) the United Kingdom in actual amounts and at 1988 prices in 1973 and each subsequent year.

Mr. Major: The sum of capital and current expenditure of general Government on EC definitions and at current prices is given in the table below. EC definitions and calendar years have been used in order to provide figures on a consistent basis. It has not been possible to convert to 1988 prices.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state the total number of people employed in nationalised industries in 1979 and at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Major: At mid-1979 the figure was 1,849,000 and at mid-1988, 798,000. Of the fall of over 1 million, around 580,000 is attributable to the privatisation of either whole nationalised industries or various subsidiaries.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the revenue loss in (a) basic rate and (b) higher rate tax in the current financial year of allowing husbands to set off the wife's earned income allowance against her unearned income where her earned income is less than the allowance; and if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing by range of income the gain to one and two-earner families above and below pensionable age.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 3 November 1988]: The direct revenue cost of allowing wives' investment income to be set against the wife's earned income allowance would be about £200 million at current income levels. This estimate makes no allowance for any change in taxpayers' behaviour or for any consequent reduction in the composite rate of tax. Estimates of the distributional effects of the proposal are not readily available, but it is expected that just over a half of the cost would arise from income currently taxed as the higher rate.

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the tax threshold as a percentage of average earnings for 1979, 1984 and 1988 for a married couple with two children.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The information requested for a married man is given in the table. In the years shown, tax thresholds are unaffected by the number of children.

[2] Provisional, assuming male average earnings of £254·1 per week.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) whether he will bring up to date table 3 in annex 4 to the Green Paper on the "Reform of Personal Taxation" (Cmnd. 9756) to take account of his proposed modifications and current incomes and allowances, with the income bands in annual terms;

(2) whether he will bring up to date table 5 in annex 4 to the Green Paper on the "Reform of Personal Taxation" (Cmnd. 9756) to take account of his proposed modifications and current incomes and allowances, with the income bands in annual terms.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I regret that the information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many wives have claimed the whole or a part of their husband's (i) married man's and (ii) personal income tax allowances in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron), on 12 April at column 62.

VAT

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing, at current prices and for each of the years 1970, 1979, 1984 and 1988, the total revenue or total estimated revenue from value added tax.

Mr. Lilley: The information is as follows:

Year	Revenue from Value-added Tax £ billion
1970	[1]—
1979	[2]6·4
1984	17·1
1988	[3]27·3

Notes: [1]Value-added tax was introduced in 1973.
[2]The standard and higher rates of VAT were raised to 15 per cent. in June 1979.
[3]Estimate for financial year 1988-89.

Disaggregation of Income

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is proposed that when separate taxation of men and women is introduced in 1990-91 partners in a partnership shall be allowed to admit their spouses to the partnership on the same basis as themselves to reduce their liability to higher-rate tax even where the spouse is no more than a sleeping partner in the partnership.

Mr. Norman Lamont: When independent taxation is introduced in 1990-91 a partnership between husband and wife will in general be treated for income tax purposes in the same way as any other partnership. I announced during the Committee stage debates on this year's Finance Bill that the Government would be reviewing the existing provisions which are designed to ensure that individuals cannot obtain a tax advantage by arrangements designed to transfer income to others.

Pensions

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what is his estimate of the value of the pension contribution holidays which have been declared by public companies for the benefit of (a) their shareholders and (b) their employees in each of the past three years to date; and what has been the benefit to the revenue therefrom;

(2) what is his estimate of the amount which public companies have appropriated from their pension funds for the benefit of their shareholders in each of the past three calendar years and current year to date; and at what rate such appropriations are subject to tax having regard to the relief given in earlier years.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Full information in the form requested is not available. Information from large self-administered pension schemes taking action to reduce surpluses following the legislation in the Finance Act 1986 is given in the table. Refunds to employers are subject to a flat rate of tax of 40 per cent.

Note: The figures represent for each activity the total amount of surplus to be eliminated by schemes which have reported in each year. The contributions holiday or reduction may be spread across several years.

Taxation

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, further to his reply dated 29 July, Official Report, column 738, he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the percentage increase since 1978-79 in the combined amount of income tax, residential rates and employee's national insurance compared to (i) the percentage increase in personal incomes and (ii) the percentage increase in the average amount of income tax and the national insurance contributions paid by higher-rate taxpayers; and if he will add figures showing the combined amount as a proportion of total incomes in 1978-79 and as forecast for the current financial year.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Provisional estimates are as follows:

	Percentage increase 1978-79 to[1] 1988-89
Income tax, rates, and employee's national contributions	160
Total income of taxpayers	165
Average income tax and national insurance contributions of top 5 per cent. of taxpayers[2]	170

Income Tax

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, further to his replies dated 19 October, Official Report, columns 929-30 and 939-42, concerning income taxes in France, Italy and Germany, he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each country the average earnings of (i) adult male and (ii) adult female workers, or their nearest equivalent, in terms of its currency at the latest date for which figures are published locally.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The OECD publication "The Tax/Benefit Position of Production Workers 1983-1986" gives the following details of the earnings of "average production workers" in each of the countries mentioned for 1986 (the figures cover both male and female workers):

	Average earnings
France	F 86,970
Italy	L 17,659,727
Germany	DM 38,852

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, further to his replies dated 19 October, Official Report, columns 929-30 and 939-42, concerning income taxes in France, Italy and Germany, he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each country in terms of its currency the distribution of incomes for tax purposes at the latest date for which figures are published locally.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I am afraid that this information is not readily available. It may be obtainable from statistical publications, for example "Annuaire Statistique de la France", in the countries mentioned.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what percentage of the revenue from income tax will be paid by the top (a) 1 per cent. and (b) 5 per cent. of incomes in the current financial year compared to 1978-79; and what are the corresponding figures for income before tax;

(2) what is his estimate of the number of single parents and the number of their children; how many are widows and with how many children; how many are covered by one-parent benefit and the child dependency addition and at what cost to the revenue; whether either or both of these benefits are taxable; and how many single parents claiming the additional personal income-tax allowance do not claim one-parent benefit or child dependency addition, and at what saving to the Revenue;

(3) if he has come to a decision on the option in paragraph 4.15 of Cmnd. 9756 of converting the additional personal income tax allowance into increased social security provision; and if he will provide an estimate of (a) the amount of revenue which could be transferred to the social security budget in this way and (b) what increase in benefits would be required to ensure that nobody is worse off as a result of the change;

(4) whether he has come to a decision on the option in paragraph 4·16 of Cmnd. 9756 of restricting the additional personal income tax allowance to those in receipt of one-parent and other appropriate benefits; and if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing what the effect of such a change would be in terms of the number of allowances claimed and the savings to the reveue;

(5) what is his estimate of the amount of the mortgage taken out by the median mortgagee claiming mortgage interest relief, the increease since May in the rate of interest, the amount of interest payable in a full year, and the total amount of relief at the standard rate payable in a full year at the standard rate of income tax.

(6) what was the economic case for reducing income tax on investment income in the case of those with an income in excess of the ceiling below which there is an entitlement to income support; and if he will publish in the Official Report an estimate of the saving to the revenue from increasing the tax on investment income by eight percentage points;

(7) what is the percentage of the increase in tax relief in 1988 for people of working age which will go to two-earner married couples; and what is the corresponding figure in the case of his proposals for separate taxation of men and women on the present tax basis;

(8) what is the current married man's tax threshold as a percentage of adult manual workers' average earnings currently as calculated in chart 2·4 of Cmnd. 9756; and what is his latest estimate of the number of families who would now receive at least 80 per cent. of their present income if they did not work at all;

(9) in what respects his latest proposals for separate taxation of husbands and wives differ in principle from those given in paragraph 3·4 of Cmnd. 9756; and what is the gain-loss to the revenue from the change at current tax and allowance levels;

(10) whether he will publish in the Official Report the months since May 1979 in which average building society mortgage rates were below 10 per cent.; what has been the average charged in the previous two decades; and if he will consider imposing an upper limit to mortgage interest relief if and when the average rate falls below 10 per cent. to reduce the amount of relief by one fifth for each half per cent. fall in the rate of interest;

(11) if, further to paragraphs 12 and 13 of annex 4 to Cmnd. 9756, he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the changes in the number paying tax and average gain or loss in each case as a result his revised proposals at current rates of income and tax;

(12) what is the net gain or loss to the revenue from (a) reducing the standard rate of income tax by 5 pence (b) raising the ceiling for means-tested income support by 25 per cent. and (c) increasing the state pension by 10 per cent.;

(13) what relative priority the Government accords to (a) further reductions in income tax and (b) an increase in means-tested social security benefits as a means of reducing dependency;

(14) how many single parents are expected to claim the additional personal income-tax allowance for 1988-89 and how many are widows; how many single parents claim one-parent benefit and how many widows with children receive a child dependency addition in respect of how many children; to what extent these two benefits have been increased to take account of the reduction in the real value of child benefit and the effect of inflation on the amounts payable in March 1986; and if he will bring up to date the benefit figures quoted in paragraph 4.10 of Cmnd. 9756;

(15) whether he proposes to extend the proposed married couple's income-tax allowance to single parents in the form of an additional personal income-tax allowance when separate taxation of husbands and wives is introduced in 1990-91;

(16) how much is paid by the top 5 per cent. of taxpayers in employees' national insurance contributions; and what would be the gain to the revenue by removing the upper earnings limit;

(17) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table comparing the changes in the numbers paying tax and the average gain or loss in each case with his revised proposals at current rates of income tax along the lines of paragraph 9 and 11 of annex 4 Cmnd. 9756;

(18) whether he will publish in the Official Report the relevant allowances referred to in annex 7 of Cmnd. 9756 in each case in terms of local currency and as a percentage of average adult male earnings or the nearest available equivalent together with the marginal and average rates of tax for single persons and one-earner married couples with such earnings; and if he will add (a) the average and marginal rates for a two-earner married couple where the wife's earnings are the average for an adult female and (b) the amount of child benefit or child allowance;

(19) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the figures in table 11 of annex 4 of Cmnd. 9756 and those applicable under his revised scheme at current rates of income and tax; and if he will provide separate figures for (a) higher-rate taxpayers and (b) those who have opted for the wife's earnings election where neither spouse is currently subject to higher-rate tax;

(20) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the figures in table 10 of annex 4 of Cmnd. 9756 showing those applicable under his revised scheme at current rates of income and tax;

(21) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the figures in paragraph 19 and table 8 of annex 4 of Cmnd. 9756 and those applicable under his revised scheme at current rates of income and tax;

(22) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the figures in paragraph 20 and table 9 of annex 4 of Cmnd. 9756 and those applicable under his revised scheme at current rates of income and tax;

(23) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the figures in chart 6.1 of Cmnd. 9756 against the current position and that proposed for 1990-91 at present rates;

(24) if he will give a breakdown of the marital status of those caught in the poverty and employment traps; what effect his proposals for the separate taxation of husbands and wives will have on the numbers caught in each trap; and whether he will publish in the Official Report figures for his revised proposals corresponding to those in chart 3.2 of Cmnd. 9756 on the Green Paper basis and on the present basis together with the number of low-earning households which will be worse off than at present as a result of the restriction on the transfer of any part of the husband's personal allowance to the wife.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Given the short notice and imminence of prorogation, I am unable to reply to the hon. Member's questions in the time available.

Christmas Bonus

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the present cost of the Christmas bonus for retirement pensioners; and what is his estimate of the saving which could be made by restricting payments to pensioners who do not pay income tax.

Mr. Norman Lamont: In 1988-89, the cost of the Christmas bonus for retirement pensioners is estimated to be about £108 million. The saving from restricting payments of the bonus to pensioners who do not pay income tax would be about £28 million.

State Pension (Income Tax)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the yield from income tax on the state pension for (a) single persons and (b) married couples; and whether he has any plans to reduce the income tax ceiling for the age allowance to a means-tested level.

Mr. Norman Lamont: People receiving a state retirement pension will not pay income tax unless their total income for tax purposes, including the pension and all other sources of income, exceeds the appropriate age or other personal allowance. If total income is sufficient for income tax to be due, it would be inappropriate to attribute that tax to one particular source of income. There are no plans to reduce the income limit for age allowance.

London (Rents and Rateable Value)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for 1958, 1968, 1978 and the latest available date an index based on 1985 = 100 showing information available on the level of rateable values and the level of rents for offices in the City of London.

Mr. Norman Lamont: This information is not maintained centrally and could not be produced without a disproportionate expenditure of time and resources.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing information available on the aggregate rateable value of the 10 largest office blocks in the City of London in terms of their rateable value on 1 April 1986 together with the average rateable value per square foot; and if he will provide corresponding figures for 1978.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The aggregate rateable value at 1 April 1986 of the 10 largest office blocks in the City of London is £24,527,383. The average rateable value per square foot is £8·76. The corresponding figure for 1978 is not readily available and could not be produced without a disproportionate expenditure of time and resources.

Computers

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many computers were in use in the United Kingdom (a) in all Government Departments and (b) in each of the National Health Service, local government, central Governmentand the nationalised industries, for 1970, 1979, 1984 and 1988.

Mr. Brooke: The numbers of large and medium-sized computers in use in the United Kingdom in central Government Departments for administrative and scientific purposes, in the years concerned, are:

	Computers
1970	205
1979	530
1984	970
1988	1,428

In addition, it is estimated that about 25,000 microcomputers are currently in use in central Government Departments. No central records of these are maintained and figures are not available for past years.

Figures for the numbers of computers in the National Health Service, local government and nationalised industries are not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Graffiti

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will consider imposing a tax on the sale of spray paint cans sufficient to deter the sale of these products to those who would use them to cause graffiti.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I cannot anticipate my right hon. Friend's next Budget statement, but I have noted my hon. Friend's suggestion.

Civil Service (Cost)

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the (a) cost of the Civil Service and (b) average cost for each civil servant for 1970, 1979, 1984 and 1988, breaking down the average cost for each civil servant into pay, national insurance, superannuation, and other costs such as office space, heating, lighting, car allowance, travel allowance and telephone.

Mr. Major: Civil Service administrative costs have not been recorded in the manner described for all the years mentioned, and the current running costs control mechanism was only introduced in 1986-87. I am not therefore able to provide the detailed information in the form requested. Due to coverage changes, comparable figures prior to 1980-81 are not available, and those for that year have had to be estimated to the nearest £50 million.

Table 1 sets out total running costs on current coverage, the number of full-time staff covered and the cost per head for the year indicated.

Table 1

	1980-81	1984-85	1987-88
Departmental running costs in £m[1]	7,300	10,998	12,997
Average full-time staff included in running costs[2] of which	739,800	666,100	647,500
Civil Service	653,200	583,100	565,200
Armed Forces	58,000	58,000	57,000
Northern Ireland Civil Service	28,600	25,000	25,300
Running costs £ per head	9,867	16,511	20,072

Notes:

[1] Departmental running costs comprise pay and national insurance costs, personnel overheads (including travel allowances), accommodation costs, office and other services. They do not include notional accruing pensions liability, pensions in payment or capital expenditure.

[2] Figures for average levels of full-time staff in post across the year. They exclude staff in trading funds (e.g. HMSO) and other areas now exempted from gross running costs control (e.g. the Land Registry). Although most of Armed Forces are also outside running costs, those personnel engaged in headquarters and support activities are included.

Table 2 shows the average man-year cost in 1987-88 when casual staff and overtime are added, and then breaks this down by components:

Table 2

	1987-88 £
Running costs per man year	17,378

GDP (Taxation)

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of the gross domestic product taxation represented in 1970, 1979, 1984 and 1988.

Mr. Major: Information for 1988 is not yet available. Figures for other years are as follows:

Taxes as percentage of GDP[1]

Year	Per cent.
1970	31·8
1979	28·3
1984	31·2

[1] Taxes cover taxes on income, expenditure (including local authority rates) and capital. GDP is GDP(A) at market prices.

Earnings (Purchasing Power)

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish figures for 1960, 1970, 1979, 1984 and 1988 for a married man with two children earning average male annual earnings, showing the length of time, after taking into account income tax, liability and national insurance contribution, necessary to pay for each of the following items (a) one lb. sugar, (b) one lb. back bacon, (c) one lb. beef sirloin, (d) one lb. fresh cod fillets, (e) 14lb. potatoes, (f) 800g. sliced loaf, (g) one lb. butter, (h) one pint of fresh milk, (i) one dozen eggs, and (j) one lb. pork.

Mr. Major: The information requested is provided in the table, 1971 is the earliest year for which figures are available. The calculations are based on a married man, with a non-earning wife, on average hourly earnings of all males on adult rates of pay (not average male earnings). Income tax liability and national insurance contribution have been deducted. Child tax allowances have been taken into account in calculating net earnings in 1971 and so for the later years, child benefit has been added for consistency.

Working time (minutes)

	1971	1979	1984	1988
(a) One lb sugar	4	4	4	3
(b) One lb back bacon	30	34	27	21
(c) One lb beef sirloin	50	56	52	42
(d) One lb fresh cod fillets	24	32	24	27
(e) 14 lb potatoes (old whites loose)	24	26	37	23
(f) 800 g sliced loaf (white)	9	9	7	6

Government Expenditure

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was total Government expenditure for 1960, 1970, 1979, 1984 and 1988; and what percentage of the gross domestic product it represents for each of those years.

Mr. Major: The available information is given in the table. Corresponding figures for years before 1963-64 are not readily available on a consistent basis.

	General government expenditure[1] (£ billion)	Percentage of GDP
1963-64	11·3	36½
1970-71	21·6	40¾
1979-80	90·3	43½
1984-85	152·8	46½
1988-89	186·9	39¾

[1] Excluding privatisation proceeds.

Note: The full series is set out in table 1.1 of the 1988 autumn statement.

Cars (Writing-down Allowance)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report the writing-down allowances for cars against liability to corporation tax and the number of cars for which such an allowance was claimed in the latest year for which figures are available and in 1978-79.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The latest year for which a reliable breakdown of capital allowances is available is 1983. Figures are published in table 4.7 of "Inland Revenue Statistics 1987". The total shown under other allowances for plant, machinery and vehicles relates mainly to company cars. An equivalent estimate for 1978 is in table 3.6 of "Inland Revenue Statistics 1983". Information on the number of company cars for which capital allowances are claimed is not available.

Bracken House

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the rateable value of Bracken house, Cannon street, London EC4P 4BY.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The current rateable value of Bracken house is £479,250.

City Technology Colleges

Mr. Madden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what tax relief or other relief is available to companies wishing to sponsor city technology colleges.

Mr. Norman Lamont: City technology colleges have charitable status, so business donations to them may qualify for the tax reliefs which are available for charitable giving generally. Companies may claim tax relief for payments made under deed of covenant: if they are not close companies, relief is also available for single donations up to a yearly maximum of 3 per cent. of their dividend payments for that year.

Press Briefing

Mr. Madden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, following his comments on 7 November about the inaccurate reporting by journalists attending his briefing on 4 November, if he intends to make any complaint to the Press Council.

Mr. Lawson: I have nothing to add to what I said in the House on 7 November at column 21-27.

Unleaded Petrol

Sir Philip Goodhart: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what instructions he has given for the modification of cars used by his Department so that they can use unleaded petrol.

Mr. Brooke: The cars used by Her Majesty's Treasury are hired from the Crown suppliers. It is current Crown suppliers policy to convert all cars that can be so modified to run on unleaded petrol and to replace those that cannot.

Interest Rates

Mr. Wray: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what talks he recently had regarding the effects of high interest rates on industry and international trade competition with (a) the Trades Union Congress and (b) the Confederation of British Industry.

Mr. Major: None.

Airbus

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent loans have been given by the European Investment Bank to the British Aerospace company in connection with the Airbus project; and whether Her Majesty's Government have underwritten such loans.

Mr. Brooke: The board of directors of the European Investment Bank approved a loan to British Aerospace on 4 October, the details of which are a matter for the company and the bank alone. There is no United Kingdom Government guarantee for this loan.

Paris Club

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer why the United Kingdom, in implementing its rescheduling of the official debt of the poorest and most heavily indebted countries, had chosen only the option of lowering interest rates; and whether he will also consider exercising the option of writing-off one third of the debt service being rescheduled as is being done by other Paris club creditor countries.

Mr. Lawson: The Paris club has agreed that the options of reducing interest rates and writing off one third of the debt service being rescheduled are of comparable value. The United Kingdom favours reducing interest rates as Her Majesty's Government believe, in common with the majority of creditor Governments, that this is the best method of preventing the burden of debt from compounding.

Sir John Stauley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will list the countries to which he estimated Export Credits Guarantee Department's total exposure at around £1 billion in his reply to the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling on 4 November, Official Report, column 801;

(2) if he will list the poorest and most heavily indebted countries eligible for exceptional debt relief from the Paris club of Governemnt creditors provided that they are following an approved adjustment programme.

Mr. Lawson: The Paris club proceeds by consensus and on a case by case basis. It is therefore not possible to list the countries to which the Paris club will grant exceptional debt relief. The countries to which ECGD's exposure is estimated to be £1 billion are those which, when preparing estimates of costs to the Exchequer of exceptional debt relief earlier this year, were thought likely to be eligible. The criteria used in drawing up this list were poverty, indebtedness and the assumption that an internationally approved adjustment programme will be in place at the time of rescheduling.

Tax Fraud and Evasion

Mr. Wray: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many cases of tax fraud or evasion were uncovered by the Inland Revenue for each year since 1975; and how many such cases resulted in prosecution.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The numbers of completed Inland Revenue investigations resulting in additional liability in each year since 1975 are as follows:

Year	Number of settlements
To 31 October
1976[1]	13,561
1977	29,426
1978	50,719
1979	52,880
1980	53,214
1981	55,104
1982	63,305
1983	68,587
To 31 March
1983	66,809
1984	70,834
1985	70,606

Year	Number of settlements
1986	64,589
1987	61,656
1988	61,453

[1] The earliest year for which figures are available in this form.

The numbers of criminal prosecutions for tax fraud in each year since 1975 are as follows:

Year	Number of prosecutions
1974-75	220
1975-76	335
1976-77	324
1977-78	171
1978-79	188
1979-80	150
1980-81	188
1981-82	175
1982-83	142
1983-84	159
1984-85	238
1985-86	320
1986-87	325
1987-88	[1]213

[1] Includes three prosecutions for mortgage interest relief fraud omitted from the figures given in the reply on 17 June 1988 to the question from the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) at column 148-9.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is, for each year since 1975, the loss to public funds caused by tax fraud and evasion.

Mr. Norman Lamont: It is not possible to say how much revenue is lost through tax fraud and evasion.

Personal Equity Plans

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to improve the take-up of personal equity plans.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The scheme is kept under review.

Tax Incentives

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will consider new tax incentives for small investors, to assist them in investing in British industry;

(2) if he will take steps to provide tax incentives to encourage the purchase of shares in smaller British companies by non-institutional investors.

Mr. Norman Lamont: This area is kept under review and I have noted my hon. Friend's suggestions. He will be aware that the Government have already introduced the business expansion scheme to provide tax incentives for individual investors to purchase shares in unquoted United Kingdom companies, as well as personal equity plans to encourage individual investors to invest in United Kingdom companies.

Tobacco (Excise Duty)

Mr. Parry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what revenue has been raised in excise duty from the tobacco industry in each of the past five years.

Mr. Lilley: The information is as follows:

Tobacco excise duty

	£ million
1983-84	3,806
1984-85	4,140
1985-86	4,459
1986-87	4,755
1987-88	4,767

Mr. Parry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table in the Official Report for EC countries showing the level of excise duty on tobacco products in each member country over the past five years.

Mr. Lilley: The information for the years 1986 to 1988 inclusive is as follows. Information for previous years is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Freeports

Mr. Parry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he has taken to monitor the working of British freeports; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: As part of the evaluation of the freeports experiment, the freezones are being continuously monitored. But a full review of the designated freezones will not take place until 1989 when the experiment will have been in operation for a full five-year period.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list in the Official Report the profits of British freeports at the latest available date.

Mr. Lilley: The freezones are operated by private sector companies. Publication of this information is a matter for the individual companies.

Social Security and Health (Expenditure)

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what sum has been set aside in 1988-89 and 1989-90 in public expenditure plans for (a) social security and (b) health to fund the announcement he made on 7 November, Official Report, columns 21-27.

Mr. Lawson: The cost of extra help for poorer pensioners will be additional to the current plans for the social security programme and will be found from the reserves, within the planning totals published in the autumn statement.

Interest Rates

Mr. Wray: To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment has been made by the Treasury of the relative effect of the rise in interest rates on (a) the consumption of imported goods and (b) the consumption of British-made goods.

Mr. Lilley: A rise in interest rates is likely to have a greater immediate proportionate impact on the consumption of imported goods than on total consumers' expenditure, since expenditure on consumer durables, which is relatively sensitive to interest-rate changes, has a higher import content than the rest of consumers' expenditure.

Tape Recorders

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how often tape recorders used by his Department are sent away for servicing.

Mr. Lawson: As and when required.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many breakdowns of Treasury tape recorders have occurred in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Lawson: About one quarter of the stock of tape recorders including dictating machines developed faults at some point during the year 1987-88.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what training schemes exist for Treasury officials on the operation of tape recorders.

Mr. Lawson: Training in the operation of tape recorders and dictaphones is given as necessary.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the average age of tape recorders used in his Department.

Mr. Lawson: The information is not available.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what makes of tape recorders are used in his Department.

Mr. Lawson: The Treasury uses a variety of different makes, supplied by HMSO.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many tape recorders are available to his officials for use on official business.

Mr. Lawson: Including dictating machines about 1,000 in the central Treasury.

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his practice in relation to tape-recording meetings and briefings of journalists which take place in number 11 Downing street; how often in the past tapes have failed to work; where the tape of the briefing on 4 November is now; and whether any official has had discussions with the BBC or any experts on how to enhance the volume.

Mr. Anderson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) whether he is prepared to submit for independent analysis the actual tape which failed to record the conversation between himself and selected journalists on 4 November;

(2) on how many occasions over the past 12 months tape recorders drawn from the Treasury pool have proved so defective that conversations at non-attributable ministerial briefings have been totally erased; and what action he proposes to improve the efficiency of these machines.

Mr. Lawson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) on 11 November. There are no records on the performance of tape recorders at briefings of journalists in 11 Downing street. The tape at the briefing on 4 November which failed to record the discussion has since been re-used. There have been no discussions with the BBC or others.

Unit Trusts

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received about stamp duty levies on United Kingdom unit trusts and the ability of unit trusts from other European countries in the EC to be marketed in the United Kingdom without bearing this duty.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Treasury Ministers have received recent representations about stamp duty arising out of the transfer of units in United Kingdom unit trusts, including its alleged effect on their international competitiveness. I am currently in correspondence with my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) on this point.

Civil Service (Scotland)

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will list in the Official Report the total number of Civil Service jobs in central Government Departments which have been (a) created in and (b) transferred to Scotland in each of the past 10 years;

(2) if he will list in the Official Report current plans to decentralise Government Departments to Scotland.

Mr. Brooke [holding answers 11 November 1988]: Under the Government's 1979 programme a total of 2,050 posts are to be dispersed to Scotland. Some 1,930 posts have already been dispersed, and the remainder are due in the first half of 1989. Approximately 70 per cent. of these posts have been filled by local recruitment. The annual figures are:

	Created posts	Transferred posts	Total
1979	—	—	—
1980	—	—	—
1981	32	395	427
1982	—	167	167
1983	—	188	188
1984	—	75	75
1985	—	1,070	1,070
1986	—	—	—
1987	—	—	—
Totals	32	1,895	1,927

Details of posts created or transferred outside this programme and at Departments' own initiative are not held centrally, but Inland Revenue opened a new office in Cumbernauld in 1987 (32 posts) and earlier this year the Department of Social Security opened a new housing benefit unit in Glasgow which has created over 400 short-term jobs for school leavers who might otherwise have been unable to find work. In addition Inland Revenue expect to disperse a further small number of London posts to Glasgow in the first half of 1989.

Under the successor policy to the Government's dispersal programme which I announced on 31 March at columns 610-11, the onus is now on Departments to review the location of their work regularly and systematically with a view to finding locations offering advantages in terms of recruitment and retention of staff and better value for money. No areas of the country have been identified specifically as target location venues, but, where appropriate, Departments will take account of the Government's regional and urban policies when selecting the most appropriate location to suit their particular requirements.

The report published by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland in June confirmed the significant financial and other benefits achieved through the relocation of part of the Overseas Development Administration to East Kilbride in 1981, and this should encourage Departments to give Scottish venues due consideration when planning future relocations.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the revenue derived from taxing unemployment benefit, and that part of an unemployed claimant's supplementary benefit-income support, for each year since unemployment benefit was brought into tax.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 27 October 1988]: The latest estimates of the yield from taxing unemployment benefit and supplementary benefit or income support paid in lieu of unemployment benefit are as follows:

	£ million
1982-83	[1]300
1983-84	375
1984-85	400
1985-86	400
1986-87	400
1987-88	375
1988-89	300

[1] Unemployment benefits became taxable on 5 July 1982.

These estimates are based on national amounts of benefits paid each year to the unemployed and information on income of the unemployed derived from the results of the 1984 and 1985 family expenditure surveys. The figures are subject to revision when later information becomes available.

Civil Servants

Mr. Holland: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report (a) a table showing by standard planning regions for 1980 to 1986, the distribution of civil servants in Government Departments, and the total salary expenditure and (b) a breakdown by standard planning region of civil servants by grade for the years 1980 to 1986.

Mr. Brooke: Tables showing the distribution of civil servants in Government Departments by standard planning regions are published annually in "Civil Service Statistics" (Table 3 in each edition). Information in respect of total salary expenditure and a breakdown by standard planning region of civil servants by grade for the years 1980 to 1986 cannot be provided without disproportionate cost.

Drugs Trafficking

Sir Bernard Braine: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps have been taken, or are contemplated, to ensure there will be no loosening of control by Customs and Excise at ports of entry after the introduction of the single European market for as long as international trafficking in illegal drugs continues.

Mr. Lawson: I envisage a continuing role for Customs and Excise after 1992 in countering drugs smuggling through all ports of entry to the United Kingdom.

Sir Bernard Braine: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of amphetamines, cannabis, heroin, cocaine and other illegal drugs seized by Customs and Excise and the police in 1986, 1987 and to the latest convenient date in 1988 were transported from elsewhere in the EC; and if he will state the quantities seized in each case and the countries from which they had been shipped.

Mr. Lawson: The following table shows drugs seized by Customs and Excise at the internal frontier with other EC countries. A breakdown by specific country could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Comparable figures for police seizures are not available.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

South Africa (Conscription)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has received from the United Kingdom embassy in Pretoria as to the number of British nationals conscripted into the South African defence forces, pursuant to the South African Citizenship Amendment Act 1984.

Mrs. Chalker: Details are not available.

European Organisations (Costs)

Mr. Gorst: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much the Government have paid during each of the past five years towards the running of the European Commission and Court of Human Rights, the International Court of Justice, and the European Court of Justice; to which other international judicial or quasi-judicial organisations the Government contribute, and how much has been paid to each of them towards their running costs in each of the past five years.

Mrs. Chalker: The information is as follows:

European Commission and Court of Human Rights

1984	FF 1,336 million	For these years remuneration of staff was apportioned separately
1985	FF 1,452 million
1986	FF 1,834 million
1987	FF 5,400 million	Including staff remuneration
1988	FF 6,670 million
1989[1]	FF 7,248 million

[1] Estimated.

In April 1986 we agreed to the construction of a new human rights building in Strasbourg to house the Commission and Court of Human Rights. Ministers subsequently set the total expenditure at FF 240 million at October 1987 prices of which our share will be 15·42 per cent.

International Court of Justice
Our contribution is paid every two years:

For 1984-85	US$445,642
For 1986-87	US$558,200
For 1988-89	US$535,188

European Court of Justice (ECJ)
Our contribution towards the cost of running the ECJ is included in our contribution to the Community budget. Figures detailing ECJ running costs for the past four years are shown in the statement on the 1988 Community budget presented to Parliament by the Paymaster General, Cm 525. Similar figures for fifth year are available from last year's statement, Cm 194. Both Cm documents are in the Library of the House.

Other International Judicial or Quasi-Judicial organisations
There are a number of these organisations, for example, the permanent court of arbitration, to which we contribute £5,000-£6,000 per annum, but details of our contributions to them could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Gorst: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, what was the date of the last occasion on which Her Majesty's Government increased the British contribution towards the running costs of the European Commission, and Court of Human Rights; what the value of that increase was; what proportion of the total European Court of Human Rights budget that increase represented; whether he considers that any further increases are necessary; to what purposes additional increases should be directed; and at what regular intervals the Government review the level of their contribution to the European Court of Human Rights.

Mrs. Chalker: Our contribution to the running costs of these two organisations was increased on 3 December 1987, when the 1988 Council of Europe budget, which includes the costs of the European Commission and Court of Human Rights, was adopted. The increase to these two organisations was approximately FF 8 million of which we paid 16·71 per cent.—our share of the Council of Europe's budget. Of this sum FF 3·6 million was apportioned to the European Court of Human Rights. In agreeing this increase of approximately 25 per cent. on 1987 costs we were given an undertaking by the presidents of the court and the Commission that these bodies now had the staff and resources they needed to cope with their increased workload and would not seek further additional staff and resources for the next two years. We review our contribution to the European Court of Human Rights annually when its budget is discussed.

European Court of Human Rights

Mr. Gorst: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the size of the present backlog of cases awaiting a decision on admissibility at the European Court of Human Rights in Stratbourg; whether he is satisfied that it is now and will remain in the future at a reasonable level; whether he proposes that the United Kingdom Government should take any initiative to alter the present situation; what was the average backlog during each 10-year period since 1958; and if he will ascertain from the European Court of Human Rights what changes recent budgetary increases will make and how soon they will take effect.

Mrs. Chalker: At 31 December 1987 there were 1,208 applications awaiting admissibility decisions by the European Commission on Human Rights. Since the increases in staff approved at last December's budget meeting we are content with the assurance given by the presidents of both the European Commission and the European Court of Human Rights that these increases will enable them to cope with the increased workload and reduce the backlog to acceptable levels. The United Kingdom is chairing a working group which is considering the scope for improvement in present procedures. The statistics requested since 1958 are not available, but a "Survey of Activities and Statistics" of the European Commission and Court of Human Rights, a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House, provides more details on applications and decisions.

Mr. Gorst: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the average length of time it has taken for a complaint made to the European Court of Human Rights to be dealt with (a) from its first introduction until a decision on its admissibility has been made and (b) from that time until the case has been finally resolved for each 10-year period since 1958.

Mrs. Chalker: Statistics concerning cases before the European Commission on Human Rights are not available in the form requested. However, in mid-1988 the interval between the referral of a case to the European Court of Human Rights and delivery of judgment was between 15 and 18 months.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Radioactivity

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on what date and how the announcements were made, relating to each of the samples of sheep milk tested for radioactivity following the Chernobyl accident.

Mr. Ryder: The results of sheep milk monitoring in England were published in my Department's news releases on the following dates:

1986
30 May
20 June
18 July
28 August
18 November
16 December

1987
21 April
3 July
7 September

1988
8 January
1 June
1 August
30 September.

The results were also included in the two compilations of monitoring data, entitled "Radionuclide levels in Food, Animals and Agricultural products: Post-Chernobyl Monitoring in England and Wales" published by HMSO in February 1987 and April 1988 respectively.

Sheep (Scrapie)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what action he is taking to investigate the use of meat and bone meal from sheep infected with scrapie; and if he will make a statement;

(2) whether he will take any action to ensure that meat and bone meal from sheep infected with scrapie is not fed to cattle; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Legislation which prohibits the use of ruminant derived meat and bonemeal in feed rations for cattle and other ruminants came into force on 18 July this year, with the full co-operation of the United Kingdom renderers association. My officials are investigating the processes used by rendering plants in Great Britain to determine whether they may be capable of producing a product safe for use in ruminant feed. Meanwhile the ban remains in force.

Export Restitution Payments

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what delays are being experienced in the payment of export restitutions to the food industry; and what steps are being taken to expedite these payments.

Mr. Ryder: The intervention board has succeeded in restoring reasonable payment times for over 70 per cent. of claims by value. The board continues to take all possible steps to restore reasonable payment times for all claims and has set up an additional processing unit in Newcastle. Meanwhile payments are being made under the compensation scheme announced in July.

EC (Agricultural Exports)

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish a table showing the total exports of various agricultural items from the European Economic Community in each of the recent three annual periods for which figures are available.

Mr. MacGregor: I will write to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the estimate of common agricultural policy spending in 1988-89.

Mr. MacGregor: I will write to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Bovine Spongiform

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will make an urgent statement on methods of authorising and controlling the disposal of bovine spongiform encephalopathy infected carcases;

(2) if he will take steps to ensure that the storage, transport and disposal of bovine spongiform encephalopathy infected carcases be licensed and controlled by his Department.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I will write to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Honourable Members (Spouses)

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Lord President of the Council what action he intends to take during the lifetime of this Parliament to improve the facilities in the Palace of Westminster for spouses of hon. Members.

Mr. Wakeham: I refer my hon. Friend to the oral answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Butler) on Monday 31 October 1988, at column 665. I understand that facilities for hon. Members' spouses will be included in these deliberations. The exercise will begin in the near future. Progress thereafter will depend upon the decisions reached.

WALES

Compact Schemes

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the local education authorities in Wales which participate in compact schemes; and what is the total cost of the schemes funded by his Department.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: As far as we are aware, no local education authority is participating in a compact scheme in Wales although some are considering developing them with local industry. The Government are not funding any scheme in the Principality.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total amount, in cash terms, of his Department's general expenditure in 1987-88.

Mr. Peter Walker: In cash, outturn expenditure within my responsibility was £3,331 million in 1987-88 and outturn is currently expected to be £3,600 million in 1988-89, equivalent to a cash increase between the years of 8·1 per cent.

Planned expenditure provision for 1987-88 was £3,192 million and for 1988-89 it was £3,451 million, an increase of 8·1 per cent. Planned expenditure for 1989-90 is £3,790 million—9·8 per cent. higher than 1988-89 and 18·7 per cent. higher than 1987-88 on a like-for-like basis.

Outturn expenditure exceeded planned expenditure in both 1987-88 and 1988-89, as it has done in every year since 1979.

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the planned total sum of his Department's general expenditure as adjusted to 1987-88 price levels by excluding the effect of general inflation as measured by the gross domestic product deflation at market prices for the years 1988-89 and 1989-90.

Mr. Peter Walker: At 1987-88 price levels, the total of planned expenditure within my responsibility for 1988-89 was £3,248 million. The comparable figure for 1989-90 is £3,397 million. These sums have been derived by the application of the GDP deflators at market prices. They show that, in real terms, planned expenditure has increased by 4·6 per cent. between the two years. This is the equivalent of a cash increase of 9·8 per cent.

Northop Bypass

Mr. Raffan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how far the construction of the A55 Northop bypass is ahead of schedule; and when he expects it to be completed.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The contract completion date for Northop bypass is August 1989. I am advised that the works could be sufficiently advanced to enable the bypass to be opened to traffic in spring 1989. Actual completion is of course, subject to a number of factors not least of which are the weather conditions over the intervening period.

A55 Travellers Inn

Mr. Raffan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when work will start on the A55 Travellers Inn improvement; and when he expects it to be completed.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I hope that work will start on this scheme early in the next financial year. The scheme will take around two years to complete.

Paediatrics Cardiology Unit, Neath Hospital

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if it is proposed that the new paediatrics cardiology unit at the Neath hospital in Cardiff will provide a service for the newly born.

Mr. Grist: The paediatric cardiac unit currently under construction at the University hospital of Wales, Cardiff, is planned to provide a cardiology service for children of all ages. A comprehensive paediatric cardiology and cardiac surgery service will be developed over time at a pace to be kept under review by the Welsh medical committee.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Escaped Prisoners

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the present number of (a) men and

(b) women who have escaped from prisons in England and Wales and were still at liberty on 31 October; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Reliable information is not available for the period before 1981. Of those adult prisoners who escaped from within a closed prison between 1 January 1981 and 30 September 1988 (the latest date for which figures are currently available), 52 men and one woman were recorded as being unlawfully at large on 30 September. A further 140 men and 17 women who absconded from within open prisons were also recorded as being unlawfully at large at that date. All such escapes are of course reported to the police immediately.

Prisons (Hygiene)

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to encourage all prison governors to allow inspection by local authority environmental officers so that they can provide guidance on measures required to achieve hygiene standards similar to those in organisations and institutions not protected by Crown immunity from prosecution.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The prison service has its own internal arrangements for inspecting prison kitchens. Inspections are considered to be of a standard equivalent to those that would otherwise be carried out by local authority environmental health officers. The arrangements do not preclude calling on local environmental health officers for advice if necessary. More generally, prison medical officers are encouraged to establish a relationship with environmental health authorities and to invite local authority officers to visit prisons in an advisory capacity.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will invite the Institution of Environmental Health Officers to give him the names of the prisons visited by members of the institution which had kitchens with standards of hygiene so low that they would warrant prosecution were it not for Crown immunity; and if he will arrange for a further joint inspection by his internal inspectors and those of the institute;

(2) when he received a copy of the report "Food Hygiene in H. M. Prisons" by the Institution of Environmental Health Officers; what response he made; and what action was taken regarding the finding that the kitchens of 13 of the 21 prisons inspected were found to be below the standard of the Food Hygiene (General) Regulations 1970.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: A letter has recently been sent to the institution requesting further details of the background to the survey and the names of prisons visited. A full response to the institution will be made after consideration of all the relevant material. A copy of the findings of the survey conducted by the institution was received in the prison department on 29 August 1988.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will make it his policy to maintain hygiene conditions in prison kitchens at a level that would comply with the standards that have to be met by organisations and institutions which do not have Crown immunity from prosecution.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Our policy remains that prison kitchens should meet the standards laid down in the Food Hygiene (General) Regulations 1970.

Terrorism (Broadcasts)

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the directions he issued on 19 October to the IBA and BBC relating to the broadcasting of statements by Northern Ireland terrorist organisations and their apologists are intended to prohibit the broadcast of words spoken by an hon. or right hon. Member.

Mr. Renton: The directions prevent the broadcasting of direct statements by persons representing, or purporting to represent, supporting, or inviting support for, the organisations named in the notices. They include such words spoken by an hon. or right hon. Member, unless spoken in the course of proceedings in Parliament. Words spoken by or in support of a candidate at a parliamentary, European parliamentary or local election pending that election are also excluded from the directions.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will amend the terms of his directions issued on 19 October to the IBA and BBC relating to the broadcasting of statements by Northern Ireland terrorist organisations and their apologists so as to exclude from its terms words spoken by an hon. or right hon. Member.

Mr. Renton: We have no plans to introduce such an amendment. Those words spoken by an hon. or right hon. Member in the course of proceedings in Parliament are excluded from the directions, as are words spoken by or in support of a candidate at a parliamentary, European parliamentary or local election pending that election.

Right of Abode

Mr. Michael Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to introduce a charge for the processing of applications made in the United Kingdom for certificates of entitlement to the right of abode; and what publicity arrangements he has made.

Mr. Hurd: As part of our general policy of charging for services, a fee of £12·50 will be payable from 15 December 1988 to cover the actual cost of processing in the United Kingdom applications posted on or after that date. Letters announcing this have today been sent to the heads of the Commission for Racial Equality, the National Association of Community Relations Councils, the United Kingdom Immigrants Advisory Service, the Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants and the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux. An announcement will also be made in the ethnic press.

Aerosols

Mr. Fry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many deaths have been reported as a result of inhaling from aerosols in the current year and in each of the preceding three years.

Mrs. Currie: I have been asked to reply.

The most complete data available come from a continuing study carried out by the department of clinical epidemiology and social medicine of St. George's hospital medical school, London. This study—the national study of deaths associated with the abuse of volatile substances—collects data from a variety of sources, including death registrations and a survey of coroners' findings.

The data for both 1987 and 1988 should be regarded as provisional.

Year	Number
1985	10
1986	14
1987	27

English Language Schools

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the outcome of his Department's discussions with representatives of the English language school industry about the difficulties experienced by foreign students in obtaining entry to the United Kingdom to study English.

Mr. Renton [holding answer 14 November 1988]: Home Office officials have regular contact with various organisations representing the interests of foreign students studying in this country, and the colleges they attend, both about questions of policy and on individual cases. A useful meeting with the Association for Recognised English Language Teaching Establishments in Britain and other bodies was held in July, when matters of common interest were discussed. A follow-up meeting is to be held next month.

Visitors' Visas

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of applications (a) made and (b) refused, for visitors' visas in (i) New Delhi, (ii) Bombay, (iii) Karachi, (iv) Islamabad and (v) Calcutta, for each year from 1980 to 1987 and for each month of 1988.

Mr. Renton [holding answer 11 November 1988]: The information requested is given in the table.

ENVIRONMENT

Water Industry (Privatisation)

Sir Anthony Meyer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which organisations will be consulted in the preparation of the code of practice on recreation and access to which the private water companies will be subject after privatisation; and if they propose to publish the draft code when the Bill is published.

Mr. Moynihan: The draft code of practice will be made available during Committee stage of the Bill to privatise the water industry. I shall consult widely on its provisions.

Unidentified Flying Objects

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what reports he has received within the past four weeks from the south-east about flying objects emitting strong blue lighting; and if he has any information on the origin of the objects.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Torbay Council (Housing Sales)

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he intends to grant permission to Torbay council to sell off its housing stock to two housing associations.

Mr. Trippier: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Drinking Water

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the number of people whose drinking water is above the recommended EEC level of nitrates.

Mr. Moynihan: I shall write to the hon. Member.

HEALTH

NHS Staff

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will state the average work week, in hours, for National Health Service staff for 1970, 1979, 1984 and 1988, respectively.

Mr. Mellor: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will state the percentage of pay that is overtime in the National Health Service for administrative clerical and staff grades for the years 1960, 1970, 1979, 1983, 1985 and 1988;

(2) if he will state the percentage of pay that is overtime in the National Health Service for nurses and midwives in 1960, 1970, 1979, 1983, 1985 and 1988;

(3) if he will state the amount paid to nurses and midwives, as a total, and as an average salary for 1960, 1970, 1979, 1984, 1988; and if he will also state the average working week in hours for nurses and midwives for those years.

Mr. Mellor: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will state (a) the number of persons and (b) whole-time equivalents for the National Health Service grades of (a) medical and dental, (b) nursing and midwifery, (c) professional and technical, (d) works, (e) maintenance, (f) administration and clerical, (g) ambulance and (h) ancillary for 1979, 1984 and 1988.

Mr. Mellor: Such information as is available is shown in the table. Figures for 30 September 1988 are not yet available.

Source: Department of Health (SR7) Annual Censuses of National Health Service medical and non-medical manpower.
Notes:
[1] All figures are independently rounded to the nearest one hundred (100) whole time equivalents.
[2] Figures include staff in "other statutory authorities" (eg Public Health and Laboratory Service and the Health Education Authority) not previously collected in Annual Manpower censuses. (Around 2,700 whole time equivalent staff in total are thus included for the first time) Figures are therefore not directly comparable with those for earlier years.
[3] Part of the reduction in staff is attributable to the effects of competitive tendering in ancillary staff groups.

Midwifery Sisters

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the number of midwifery sisters within each health authority and the number within each of the new salary grades in each area.

Mr. Mellor: I shall write to the hon. Member.

AIDS

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is the minimum and maximum incubation period for acquired immune deficiency syndrome;

(2) what is the current number of acquired immune deficiency syndrome sufferers in the United Kingdom; and at what rate this is increasing;

(3) what is the period within which the incidence of immune deficiency syndrome is currently doubling;

(4) what is the latest projection, on the basis of the current state of medical advice and knowledge, of the likely number of acquired immune deficiency syndrome sufferers in each year up to 2000.

Mr. Mellor: By the end of October 1988 1,862 cases of AIDS had been reported in the United Kingdom, an increase of 66 per cent. over the corresponding figure in 1987. The doubling time for cases is about 14 months. The incubation period between infection with HIV and the development of AIDS can vary from months up to many years, with the average at present thought to be about seven to eight years. Making accurate predictions of future numbers of AIDS cases is difficult, even in the short term. An expert group set up under the chairmanship of Sir David Cox to consider future prevalence has recently submitted its report which we are now carefully considering.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is the estimated total annual cost to public funds for treating acquired immune deficiency syndrome sufferers in the United Kingdom; and what is the total amount being spent on research into the disease;

(2) what level of resources his Department plans to devote to combating acquired immune deficiency syndrome in each yar till 1995; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what steps he has taken to satisfy himself as to the adequacy of the level of resources currently devoted to combating the threat posed by acquired immune deficiency syndrome; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We carefully monitor the work of the Health Education Authority, Medical Research Council and the National Health Service in relation to HIV infection and AIDS.

The Government have committed substantial extra resources towards the cost of treatment and for research. It has not been possible to separate fully the total costs of treating people with AIDS, particularly because the effects of AIDS and other HIV-related conditions on individuals can vary widely. An additional £76 million was made available to health authorities and boards this year. Following the statement by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State announced that an extra £68 million would be made available for AIDS-related services in England next year. Between 1984-85 and 1987-88 £13·8 million of Government money was spent on research. For 1988-89 the Government are spending around £13 million including £5 million for the Medical Research Council's directed research programme into vaccines and drugs. A further £23·5 million has been committed to the Medical Research Council's directed programme in 1989-90 to 1991-92. Research is also being funded by university departments and by pharmaceutical companies.

Dental Services

Mr. Sean Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of the revenue from dental charges was accounted for by dentures in the calendar years 1984, 1985, 1986 and 1987.

Mrs. Currie: The estimated proportion of revenue from dental charges accounted for by dentures is set out in the table. Separate data for England are not available.

England and Wales

Year	Per cent.
1984	24
1985	23

The hon. Member may be aware that the alternatives to dentures for many patients are crowns and bridges, demand for which in England and Wales went up by 20 per cent. and 23 per cent. respectively between 1984 and 1986-87.

Hospital Beds

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will state the National Health staff-to-bed ratio for 1985 and 1988 and projected figures for 1989 and 1992 and the percentage change for each of those years relative to the previous year;

(2) if he will state the ratio of National Health Service beds to staff, and the average number of beds unoccupied in the National Health Service daily for 1960, 1970, 1979, 1984 and 1988, respectively.

Mrs. Currie: Such information as we have for England is shown in the tables.

My hon. Friend should be wary of making simple ratios from these figures. Staff within the NHS cover a wide range of Health Service activity inside and outside hospital, some of which is not related to bed use. "Staff in post" figures are taken from a census on 30 September annually, whereas numbers of beds are based on a daily count averaged over a full calendar year.

We have given figures for 1986, the latest year for which figures for both staff in post and numbers of beds are available. Between 1984 and 1985 staff in post fell by 0·8 per cent. and by 1·4 per cent. between 1985 and 1986. Numbers of occupied beds fell by 2 per cent. and 3·5 per cent. respectively in those years. We have no appropriate projections for 1989-1992 as we do not use "staff per bed" for planning purposes.

[1] The count of occupied beds excluded beds reserved for psychiatric patients on short leave.

Notes
[1] Figures have been rounded to the nearest hundred.
[2] Staffing figures for 1960 and 1970 are not available on a basis comparable with later years.
[3] Part of the reduction in staff is attributable to the effects of competitive tendering in the ancillary staff group.

Cochlear Implants

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when cochlear implants will be available on the National Health Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: Cochlear implants are an exciting new development which may help some profoundly deaf people, and one which we would expect to become more widely available than at present. It is, however, for health authorities to determine the pace at which new developments, including cochlear implants, become available locally. No doubt they will take into account medical opinion as to the benefits of this treatment as against other forms of treatment for sensorineurally deaf people, as well as their assessment of local needs and priorities and available resources.

Psychiatric Hospitals (Closures)

Mr. Irving: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether there are plans to close any psychiatric hospitals involving discharge of patients to the eight health districts which are without community psychiatric nurses.

Mrs. Currie: The Government's long-standing policy is that people with mental illness should have access to all the services they need as locally as possible. We would expect the appointment of community psychiatric nurses, in the eight districts to which my hon. Friend refers, before patients are discharged there in any numbers from the relevant mental hospitals.

Eye Tests

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he will publish in the Official Report a table for each financial year since 1973 and his estimate for the current year of the number of ophthalmic tests carried out under the National Health Service and the number of new eye glasses prescribed, the cost of the tests and the glasses prescribed, the number for which payment had to be paid in whole or in part and the estimated average percentage contribution to the total cost in such cases and the number of free treatments for (a) children, (b) pensioners and (c) other beneficiaries, together with the numbers qualifying for such treatment and the cost; and what is his estimate of the average number of treatments given to a married manual worker, his wife and two children, together with the amount charged for those treatments.

Mr. Mellor: The information available is given in the table. It does not enable us to estimate the number of sight tests, spectacles and charges for a manual worker and his family.

Prescription Charges

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the estimated cost to the Revenue of exempting the elderly from prescription charges; and what would be the revenue gain from limiting the exemption to (a) those who qualified for supplementary benefit and (b) those who would qualify for income support by raising the ceiling on means by 50 per cent.

Mrs. Currie: We estimate that the cost of exempting people over state pensionable age from prescription charges is about £300 million a year. It is not possible to estimate reliably the cost of exempting only those pensioners in receipt of income support (formerly supplementary benefit) or who would qualify by raising the ceiling on means by 50 per cent.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his estimate is of the total number of people entitled to claim exemption from prescription charges on grounds of low income.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 11 November 1988]: We estimate that about 6 million people are automatically entitled to exemption from prescription charges because they are in receipt of qualifying benefits. (Some will also be exempt on other grounds.) We are unable to estimate the numbers of people not in receipt of such benefits who are entitled to claim exemption on grounds of low income.

Ethnic Monitoring

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will take steps to introduce a classification on the basis of ethnic origin to the general household survey, earnings survey, and census, in order that comparative data may be collected.

Mrs. Currie: Plans for the 1991 census were announced in the White Paper "1991 Census of Population" Cm. 430 published in July 1988. The Government propose to include a question on ethnic group in the 1989 census test and to study the results before deciding whether to include such a question in the 1991 census.

The general household survey has included a question on ethnic group since 1983 and the labour force survey has included one since 1979. The same classification is used in both these voluntary surveys but it is slightly different from that proposed for the census question. If the 1991 census does include a question on ethnic group, consideration will be given to using a similar classification in voluntary surveys, to ensure comparability of data from different sources.

Drug Addicts (Needles)

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish in the Official Report a list of those centres which operate needle exchange schemes for drug addicts.

Mrs. Currie: I regret that we do not collect centrally details of all the needle exchange schemes operating in England as they do not need to refer to the Department before starting. It is estimated that there are currently at least 60 schemes in operation, run by health and local authorities, non-statutory services and pharmacies.

Community Care

Mr. Irving: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has anything to add to his statement to the House on 16 March, Official Report, column 615, that he was not aware of any health authority which had closed facilities without the provision of appropriate alternative services in the light of the evidence from his Department recorded in the report on "Community Care Developments" from the Committee of Public Accounts.

Mr. Mellor: We are seeking to further improve our monitoring of the development of community care services, but are not at present aware of any such closures.

Health and Medicines Bill

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what timetable he is proposing for consultation with professional bodies on the regulations to be made under clauses 13 and 14 of the Health and Medicines Bill following the Royal Assent.

Mr. Mellor: We propose to start the consultation on these regulations shortly after Royal Assent with the intention of completing the process in time to implement the sight test changes with effect from 1 April 1989.

Pharmaceutical Products

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has anything to add to the statements made in the First Standing Committee on European Community Documents on Wednesday 9 November concerning the rights of Her Majesty's Government in respect of legislation for trade in pharmaceutical products.

Mrs. Currie: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Health Authorities

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will set out in the Official Report a table showing the income, expressed on a per capita basis, for each of the regional health authorities of England and Scotland and for Wales for the years 1983-84 to 1986-87.

Mr. Mellor: Cash-based information for health regions in England is shown in the table. Questions about health authorities in Scotland and Wales are matters for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

(b) Mid-year estimates of resident population—1983 to 1986.

Notes to the table:

1. The total cash resources for each region are those used for all revenue and capital purposes and cash drawn from the Department. Local income and payments made centrally or by other authorities on behalf of the authorities within each region is also included.

2. The population figures make no allowance for persons resident in one region who receive treatment in another or for differences in age/sex structures and morbidity.

3. Resources employed by family practitioner committees to meet payments to doctors, dentists, pharmacists and others contracted to provide family practitioner services are excluded.

Abortions

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he intends to take any action to ensure that those doctors currently performing abortions on babies of 23 weeks or more gestation are made aware of the protection afforded by the Infant Life (Preservation) Act to all babies capable of being born alive; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: The provisions of the Infant Life (Preservation) Act are made clear in the report on foetal viability and clinical practice which was issued, in September 1985, to all fellows and members of the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists, and to all private sector places approved to carry out abortions beyond 20 weeks' gestation. The publicity given to recent consideration of proposed legislation both in this House and another place have highlighted these provisions to the medical profession and we see no need for further action at this time.

Spinal Cord Injury

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has on the number of people in the United Kingdom who are suffering from spinal cord injury; and what representations his Department has had since June 1987 from the international spinal research trust.

Mrs. Currie: I regret that we do not hold information centrally on the numbers of people suffering from spinal cord injury. Since 1987 the Department has received no representations from the international spinal research trust.

Nurses (Regrading)

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what information he has as to whether health authorities are using the same criteria of specialist knowledge in their regrading processes for staff nurses and sisters;

(2) what information he has as to how many health authorities in England (a) are and (b) are not treating the orthopaedic area as a specialist area for trained nurses and are thus in their regrading taking account of the specialist qualification; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The agreed grading definitions do not refer in terms to specialist knowledge or specialist qualifications, although they are designed to recognise and reward clinical skills and knowledge in all areas of nursing and midwifery. The Department has been working closely with health authorities to ensure that grading is carried out consistently in line with definitions, but it is for authorities themselves to decide how the grading definitions should apply in particular posts or areas of work.

Rape

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he intends to change the statutory HSA4 notification form in order to make provision for the specific notification of rape when this has preceded a legal abortion; whether he intends to notify all doctors that they should voluntarily put this information on the form in order that accurate and complete statistics can be obtained; whether there has ever been a suggestion to doctors that they should provide that information when a pregnancy has been legally terminated following rape; and what steps he has taken to assess the number of unreported rapes.

Mr. Currie: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Speech Therapists

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he will instruct his representative on the management side to offer speech therapists a salary increase commensurate with increases with those offered to the professions allied to medicine; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Pay negotiations are a matter for the appropriate Whitley council.

Glaucoma

Mr. Tom Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what arrangements he has now made for identifying and advising close relatives of sufferers from glaucoma.

Mrs. Currie: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Health Authorities (Expenditure)

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what figures he has for the total expenditure by health authorities on (a) rates, (b) water rates, (c) electricity and (d) national insurance, for each year from 1987-8 to 1989-90.

Mr. Mellor: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Nurses (Pay)

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether he has received any representations in respect of the North East Thames regional health authority about the adequacy of its allocation for the nurses' pay award; how much he has allocated to that region in respect of the nurses' pay award, expressed in cash and in terms of the percentage of the region's nursing budget; on what basis he made this allocation; if he has any contingency plans if the cost of the outcome of the clinical grading review exceeds the sum allocated; what is the current regional expenditure on nurses' pay; and what advice he has given that region about how it should keep the cost of the outcome of the clinical grading review within the sum allocated to that region for the nurses' pay award;

(2) whether he has received any representations in respect of the North West Thames regional health authority about the adequacy of its allocation for the nurses' pay award; how much he has allocated to that region in respect of the nurses' pay award, expressed in cash and in terms of the percentage of the region's nursing budget; on what basis he made this allocation; if he has any contingency plans if the cost of the outcome of the clinical grading review exceeds the sum allocated; what is the current regional expenditure on nurses' pay; and what advice he has given that region about how it should keep the cost of the outcome of the clinical grading review within the sum allocated to that region for the nurses' pay award;

(3) whether he has received any representations in respect of the Oxford regional health authority about the adequacy of its allocation for the nurses' pay award; how much he has allocated to that region in respect of the nurses' pay award expressed in cash terms and in terms of the percentage of the region's nursing budget; on what basis he made this allocation; if he has any contingency plans if the cost of the outcome of the clinical grading review exceeds the sum allocated; what is the current regional expenditure on nurses' pay; and what advice he has given that region about how it should keep the cost of the outcome of the clinical grading review within the sum allocated to that region for the nurses' pay award;

Sir Keith Bright and Dr. Tony Ridley

Mr. Prescott: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the entitlements for a full and unprejudiced settlement arising out of the employment contracts of Sir Keith Bright and Dr. Ridley after their resignation from London Regional Transport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: I have arranged for copies of the terms of appointment of Sir Keith Bright (which apply by virtue of section 70(1) of the London Regional Transport Act 1984) and of Dr. Ridley to be placed in the Library of the House. Mr. Peter Bottomley: Construction of the Bedford bypass is scheduled to start in 1990. This is subject to completion of statutory procedures. Measures to alleviate traffic congestion in the town have been carried out in recent years. There is little scope for further improvement prior to the completion of the bypass.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I will write to the hon. Member.

Severn Bridge (Tolls)

Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the public inquiry into proposed tolls increase at the Severn bridge will be held.

ENERGY

Marchwood Laboratories

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement about the proposed ownership of the Marchwood, Berkeley and Leatherhead laboratories.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have asked the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board to write to my hon. Friend.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Wives (Earnings)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each year since 1978 and his forecast for 1988 (a) the number of wives electing to have their earnings taxed separately (b) the number paying higher rate tax on their earnings and from 1985 only (c) the number under (a) and (b) with (i) investment income aggregated with their husband's income for tax purposes or (ii) claiming mortgage interest relief; and if he will add figures showing the cost to the revenue in the cases requested together with the average amount of investment income and the average mortgage on which relief is claimed.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Available information is in the tables. Estimates for years up to 1985-86 are based on the annual surveys of personal incomes. Estimates for later years are based on a projection of the 1985-86 survey of personal incomes and are provisional.

Public Bodies

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what was (a) the total number of persons in the United Kingdom employed in central Government Departments and in local government for 1960, 1970, 1979, 1984 and 1988, (b) the percentage of the total population and total work force these figures represent for those years, (c) the value of the total salaries and employment costs of these two groups for the same years and (d) the percentage of gross domestic product these sums represent for those years; and if he will give any information he may have as to equivalent figures for France, West Germany, the United States of America and Japan;

(2) if he will list all those public bodies which in 1979 were included in the public sector and have now been privatised, denationalised or in some way removed from the public sector; and how many persons each such body employed at the time of transfer from the public sector.

Mr. Major: I regret that it has not been possible to provide an answer before Prorogation. Therefore, I shall write to my hon. Friend and place a copy of the letter in the Library.

Age Allowance

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for 1978-79 and his forecast for the current financial year (a) the number of aged married couples and single persons, (b) the amount of the age allowance for those aged above and below 80 years, (c) the age allowance ceiling, (d) the post-tax income of a tax unit on the threshold of the clawback of the age allowance in each case, (e) the amount of the state pension, (f) average earnings, (g) the maximum level of income support payable to those on a state pension and (h) the income below which income support would not be payable.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Available information is in the table. There was no ceiling to the amount of income support payable and no set income level above which it was not payable.

[2] Total income less allowable deductions.
[3] Forecast, based on increase in average earnings assumed in Autumn Statement 1988, Chapter 3, for purpose of assessing national insurance contributions.

Inflation

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current and forecast rate of inflation on a 12 months' basis; what it was in the month in which he took office; what was the rate in each succeeding 12 months; to what extent the change in each case was due to (a) higher interest rates and (b) a higher exchange rate; and if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the increase/reduction in each period in (i) interest rates, (ii) the rate of exchange against the deutschemark, (iii) the relative export price of United Kingdom manufacturers, (iv) the terms of trade for finished manufacturers and (v) the increase in unit labour costs in manufacturing and non-manufacturing.

Mr. Major: Information on the latest RPI increase and my right hon. Friend's forecast are given in the Autumn Statement (HC 695). The remainder of the information requested can be derived from Economic Trends, Financial Statistics, the Employment Gazette and the Monthly Review of External Trade Statistics.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to what extent the increase in interest rates is intended to curb inflation by (a) raising the exchange rate, (b) reducing the real disposable incomes of mortgagees, (c) making other forms of consumer credit more expensive and (d) curbing takeovers and other forms of asset speculation.

Mr. Lilley: Monetary conditions need to be considered as a whole and it is neither sensible nor possible to give precise estimates of the effects of interest rate changes working through each individual channel.

National Insurance Fund

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of (a) the likely increase in the income of the national insurance fund and reduction in expenditure as a result of a reduction in unemployment to the 1973 level and (b) the increase in other public revenues and reduction in public expenditure nationally and locally from both the reduction in unemployment and the increase in employment.

Mr. Major: It is not possible to make any meaningful estimates.

Welfare Benefits

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the percentage of public expenditure spent centrally or through local authorities in the United Kingdom, Germany, France and Sweden on (a) health services, including dentistry, and so on, (b) pensions, (c) child benefit, (d) unemployment benefit and (e) other welfare benefits in the latest year for which figures are available together with figures showing the amount collected in income tax and the amount paid in social security as a percentage of gross domestic profit compared to 1978-79.

Mr. Major: The information asked for is not available on a comparable basis across countries. That which is available on a comparable basis is given in the table, which uses OECD definitions and categories of public expenditure and taxes. These definitions do not precisely match those used in the public expenditure White Paper or the financial statement and Budget report. For instance, "social assistance grants" includes payments to enterprises as well as individuals, and "taxes on income" includes capital gains and corporation tax.

Earned Income

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the amount of income tax payable on earned income in the current financial year as a percentage of earned income and in 1978-79; and what are the corresponding figures for West Germany.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Tax liability on earned income as a percentage of earned income is estimated to be 19 per cent. in 1978-79 and 15 per cent. in 1988-89. This calculation takes earned income as the bottom slice of income. I regret that corresponding figures for West Germany are not available.

Income Tax

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, pursuant to his reply of 19 October, Official Report, columns 927-28, relating to the number of tax units and tax liability, he will revise the table to include lower limits at £1,000 intervals to £15,000 and at £17,500, £25,000 and £40,000.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The estimates in the table referred to by the hon. Member are based on a projection of the 1985-86 survey of personal incomes, a survey in tax offices of about 70,000 taxpayer records. As estimates for 1988-89 are based on sample data projected forward three years they are subject to uncertainty. Further disaggregation of the information in the earlier reply would lead to estimates that were subject to a large degree of uncertainty and possibly misleading.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total number of people employed in each of the following organisations in 1979 and at the time each organisation was privatised (a) British Aerospace, (b) Cable and Wireless, (c) Britoil and Associated British Ports, (d) Enterprise Oil, (e) British Telecom, (f) British Gas, (g) British Airways and (h) Trust Ports (GB).

Mr. Norman Lamont: The information is as follows:

Numbers employed 000s

	Mid-1979	At time of privatisation
British Aerospace	73	73
Cable and Wireless	1·9	2·0
Britoil	[1] ..	2·5
Associated British Ports	11	10
Enterprise Oil	[2] ..	negligible
British Telecom	240	240
British Gas	103	89
British Airways	58	36
Trust Ports (GB)	17	10

.. Not available.

[1] Britoil commenced trading on 1 August 1982, previously being part of the British National Oil Corporation. Total numbers employed in the latter organisation at mid-1979 were 1,400.

[2] Enterprise Oil became a nationalised industry on 1 September 1983 previously being part of British Gas. Numbers employed at the time of privatisation were negligible.

Unit Trusts

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will examine ways in which income accruing from overseas portfolio investments and deposits could be subjected to income tax; and what representations he has received seeking action to equalise the treatment afforded to United Kingdom unit trusts in comparison with other European countries' unit trusts.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Income from overseas investments and deposits is generally subject to income tax or corporation tax in the hands of United Kingdom taxpayers. Representations have been received from the Unit Trust Association and others about the comparative tax treatment of United Kingdom unit trusts and similar investment vehicles in other European countries. These representations are being considered.

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will examine the tax position of registered British unit trusts to bring them into line with the tax position of unit trusts offered by European Community member companies.

Mr. Norman Lamont: We are examining a number of representations about the relative tax treatment of United Kingdom unit trusts and other European investment vehicles.

National Debt

Mr. Ground: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the national debt, including foreign currency debt but excluding official holdings, outstanding at the end of March in each of the years 1987 and 1988, as a percentage of gross domestic product, average measure, at current market prices centred on 31 March.

Mr. Lilley: The national debt, including foreign currency debt but excluding official holdings stood at £168·2 billion (41·6 per cent. of GDP) at end-March 1987 and at £177·9 billion (40·1 per cent. of GDP) at end-March 1988. Further details are given in the November 1988 Bank of England Quarterly Bulletin, which also gives estimates of net public sector debt which is nowadays a more useful concept than the national debt.

Savings Ratio

Mr. Michael Morris: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what financial holdings form the savings ratio.

Mr. Lilley: The savings ratio is the ratio of personal sector net savings to personal disposable income. The most important financial holdings within personal savings are those held in life assurance and pension funds, bank and building society accounts, share ownership and national savings.

Women (Incomes)

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what his estimate of the average income of women of working age with (a) no dependent children, (b) at least one dependent child under five years and (c) children aged five to 16 years giving for (b) and (c) the average number of children per family.

Mr. Norman Lamont: This is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security.

EC Expenditure

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total public expenditure on the EC in pounds sterling of (a) all member states and (b) the United Kingdom (i) as a percentage of total public expenditure and (ii) as a percentage of gross domestic product for 1973 and each subsequent year.

Mr. Major: United Kingdom expenditure on the EC is measured as net payments to European Community institutions. Comparable information for the other member states is not available. The table compares the United Kingdom's own resources payments (after abatement) with the total of own resources payments for all EC member states, as a percentage of GDP and of the current and capital expenditure of general Government on EC definitions. Information covering years before 1981 is not readily available.

Public Sector Expenditure

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he will publish a table showing the total expenditure and total estimated expenditure on wages, salaries and pensions in the public sector for 1970, 1979, 1984 and 1988; and what percentage of (a) gross domestic product and (b) public expenditure these figures represent.

Mr. Major: The latest available information on expenditure on public service pay (including pensions), which is consistent with figures published in the 1988 public expenditure White Paper (Cm. 288), is given in the table. Corresponding figures for years prior to 1982-83 are not readily available on a consistent basis. Although some estimated outturn figures for 1988-89 were published recently in the autumn statement a breakdown of these figures by economic category will not be available until the publication of the 1989 White Paper.

Retail Prices Index Error

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what amount of money was paid to charities following the discovery of an error in the retail prices index; how it was allocated amongst the charities; in how many instalments it is to be paid; how much revenue will accrue to the Treasury from the interest on money not paid immediately; and if he will make it his policy to add this interest to the amounts allocated to the charities.

Mr. Lawson: I have nothing further to add to the written answers of my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General on 3 May at column 400 and my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security on 3 May at column 422 and 29 June at column 273.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Manufactured Goods

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what has been the total percentage increase from 1981 to 1988 in the volume of United Kingdom exports and imports of manufactured goods, respectively.

Mr. Alan Clark: Between the first nine months of 1981 and the same period in 1988 the volume of United Kingdom exports of manufactured goods on a seasonally adjusted balance of payments basis increased by 36 per cent. The corresponding increase in the volume of imports was 93 per cent.

Scottish and Newcastle Breweries (Bid)

Mr. Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether the investigation by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission into the bid for Scottish and Newcastle by Elders IXL will also cover the shareholding by Elders in Scottish and Newcastle.

Mr. Atkins: When the reference was made, Elders had some 13·7 per cent. of Scottish and Newcastle's share capital. In the course of its investigation the MMC is obliged to consider any subsequent acquisitions by Elders of Scottish and Newcastle shares.

European Community

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) what was the United Kingdom's deficit with the European Economic Community in 1972 and in the most recent year for which figures are available;

(2) what was the percentage of United Kingdom exports which went to the 11 present members of the European Economic Community in 1973; what is the current percentage; and if he will give details of the amount of both figures which represented goods and services.

Mr. Alan Clark: I shall write to my hon. Friend as soon as possible and place a copy in the Library.

British Coal

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the number of households to which promotional literature about the sale of British Steel has been sent; and what has been the cost.

Mr. Atkins: I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as possible and place a copy of my reply in the Library.

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) what is his estimate of fixed investment by manufacturing industry by size of establishment for establishments with (a) over 2,000 employees, (b) 500-2,000 employees, (c) 100-500 employees and (d) under 100 employees for the first and second quarters of 1988; and what is the percentage increase over the equivalent period for 1987 in real terms;

(2) what was the fixed investment by manufacturing industry for the first and second quarters of 1988 for each of the G7 countries; and what was the percentage increase over the equivalent period for 1987 in real terms.

Mr. Atkins: I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as possible and place a copy in the Library.

SCOTLAND

Students

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will provide an estimate of the number of students on courses specially designated for the adult unemployed in further education colleges and adult education centres in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested is not available centrally.

Legal Aid

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what costs have been incurred in each of the last 10 years in respect of the printing and publishing of (a) civil legal aid forms and (b) criminal legal aid forms, encompassing forms used for the purposes of making applications for legal aid, and also those forms used by solicitors for the purposes of submitting accounts.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is not available.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report for each of the last 10 years how many persons have received (a) advice and assistance under the civil advice and assistance scheme, (b) advice and assistance under the criminal legal aid scheme, (c) legal aid under the section 1 legal aid scheme, (d) legal aid under the criminal legal aid scheme, (e) legal aid under the ABWOR scheme, and (f) legal aid under any other legal aid schemes; and if he will state the total costs of legal aid in each of the last 10 years, with the totals shown broken down as between the foregoing categories.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Advice and assistance on criminal matters is and has been given under the legal advice and assistance scheme rather than the criminal legal aid scheme. Assistance by way of representation did not commence until 1987-88. The information is as follows:

Mountain Rescue Teams

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report for each mountain rescue team in Scotland the current levels of life assurance cover pertaining where fatality of a member or associate member occurs on a rescue or training exercise; and if he will make a statement on what proposals there are to ensure that a uniform specified sum, reviewed annually to take account of inflation, will be applicable to all such fatalities.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It is for each police authority to determine the level of insurance cover to be provided for civilian members of mountain rescue teams in its area. However, to help achieve a measure of uniformity, the Association of Chief Police Officers (Scotland) carries out an annual review of levels of cover and makes recommendations on any increases considered desirable in the light of inflation. The current recommended level of cover in consequence of a fatality is £65,375 and I understand that this figure has been adopted in all Scottish police force areas except that of the Northern constabulary where the sum is £100,000.

Criminal Injuries Compensation Board

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to review the present policy of the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board following the decision in an English case before the Court of Appeal (Regina v Ex Parte Berry) that copies of precognitions obtained from witnesses be made available to the applicant only on the day of the hearing itself.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No. This practice reflects the obligation upon the board to protect witnesses' precognitions from improper use; the board's procedures ensure that applicants are given adequate time, by way of an adjournment if necessary, to study precognitions before their case is heard.

Legal Aid

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what record is kept of the time period which elapses between the date of arrival at the offices of the Scottish Legal Aid Board of applications submitted by solicitors for section 1 legal aid applications, and the date of acknowledgement of such applications by the Scottish Legal Aid Board.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No such record is kept. Generally applications are acknowledged by the board within two days of receipt.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which forms used in the processes of application and submission of accounts in all legal aid schemes both civil and criminal by solicitors and the Scottish Legal Aid Board have required to be replaced following the establishment of the Scottish Legal Aid Board; what additional costs have been incurred with regard to the framing and printing of the new forms; and what costs have been incurred as a result of the amendment of forms following the establishment of SLAB.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: All the forms used under the previous legal aid arrangements have now been replaced to provide for references to the Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986, and to the Scottish Legal Aid Board. The additional costs are not separately recorded.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will ask the Scottish Legal Aid Board to review its current practice of refusing to divulge its fax number to solicitors.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No. The Scottish Legal Aid Board is an independent statutory body responsible for the day-to-day administration of legal aid in Scotland and such an operational matter is for its decision.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will discuss with the Scottish Legal Aid Board the possible review of the requirement in section 1 legal aid applications in cases where the applicant has, prior to provision of corroboration, already obtained a court decree since court proceedings have been raised as a matter of special urgency.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Yes.

Personnel Statistics

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the total number of persons employed in education in England for each of the years 1960, 1970, 1979, 1984 and 1988; and if he will break these figures down into (a) lecturers and teachers and (b) non-teaching staff.

Mrs. Rumbold: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Expenditure

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what (a) amount and (b) proportion of total public spending on education is accounted for by local authorities for each year since 1967-68 projected to 1990-91 in 1987-88 prices.

Mrs. Rumbold: Data in the form requested are readily available only from the 1979-80 financial year and are listed in the table. All figures from 1987-88 are provisional estimates. The figures quoted cover education spending for which my right hon. Friend has responsibility.

Teacher Training

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his policy towards the recent recommendations from Her Majesty's inspectorate for more concentration on practical aspects of teacher training; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: I assume that the hon. Member is referring to the HMI report, "The New Teacher in School." As I explained in my reply to the hon. Member on 1 November at column 604, the Government have taken a number of steps to improve the quality and content of initial teacher training since the teachers surveyed in that report were trained. I also said that we would be reviewing the course approval system. Although training has to meet more stringent criteria now, we are not complacent. We intend to raise the quality of teacher training still further and the review will be aimed at putting that intention into practice.

Students (Loans)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what estimate he has as to the number of students on part-time and non-mandatory courses in further or higher education who are in receipt of (a) housing benefit, (b) income support and (c) unemployment benefit; and to which of these benefits such students will lose entitlement under the provisions of the White Paper on top-up loans for students (Cm. 520).

Mr. Jackson: Information on students' benefit claims is not collated in this form. The Department's estimates derive from a survey undertaken in 1986-87, to which a correction is applied in respect of the adjustments to the benefit regime in April. The estimates are projected forward to 1990-91, when the policies of the White Paper "Top-up Loans for Students" are to come into effect.

The Department estimates that in 1990-91 there will be some 145,000 full-time students on courses of further or higher education outside the scope of the mandatory awards regime. Of those, some 15,000 would be in receipt of income support or unemployment benefit if the White Paper policies did not take effect, and some 45,000 would be in receipt of housing benefit. Students who have no dependants and are not disabled will lose entitlement to all three benefits: full-time students in higher education will, however, be eligible for the proposed loan. However, students who are single parents or disabled, and students' families will not lose benefit. The Department estimates that some 2,000 of the students in receipt of income support or unemployment benefit will thus continue to receive it, and some 14,000 of those in receipt of housing benefit, either individually or by virtue of their dependants.

The benefit entitlement of part-time students is not affected by the policies set out in the White Paper.

Adult Education

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will provide an estimate of the number of students on courses specially designated for the adult unemployed in further education colleges and adult education centres in England and Wales.

Mr. Jackson: The information requested is not available centrally.

21-hour Courses

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his best available estimate of the cost of 21-hour courses to local education authorities in England and Wales.

Mr. Jackson: The information requested is not available centrally.

Occult Teaching

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will conduct an inquiry into the teaching of the occult in schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has no evidence which would justify such an inquiry.

Schools (Violence)

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what measures he is taking to overcome violence in schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: Responsibility for taking measures to minimise the risk of violence occurring in schools rests with the head teacher and governing body, as part of their responsibility for maintaining discipline. My right hon. Friend has set up a committee of inquiry to recommend action which can be taken by all concerned to promote good discipline in schools. He expects to receive the committee's report shortly.

Education Reform

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans for testing of pupils at 16 years in national curriculum subjects which they will not be taking in GCSE.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Education Reform Act requires that arrangements be made for assessing pupils at or near the end of each key stage of the national curriculum. The Government intend that the GCSE and equivalent examinations should form the means of assessing the level of attainment in the national curriculum foundation subjects of all pupils who are prepared for and take such examinations at the end of their fourth key stage. My right hon. Friend will be considering in due course what supplementary assessment arrangements may be necessary to ensure that all pupils to whom assessment arrangements are intended to apply without modification are assessed against attainment targets in all the foundation subjects.

Full-time Education

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will publish the latest available figures for staying on in full-time education at the age of 16 years.

Mr. Jackson: Provisional figures on the percentage of 16-year-olds in full-time education at maintained schools and further education establishments in England for the academic year 1987-88 were as follows:

	Per cent.
Maintained schools	27
Further education establishments	20
Total England	47

School Places

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many schools in England and Wales have spare capacity in relation to standard admission numbers of more than 20 per cent. of total places available.

Mr. Butcher: This information is not collected centrally.

Teacher Training

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what proportion of teacher training college syllabuses contain the study of economic awareness as a mandatory requirement;

(2) what steps the Government are taking to monitor the level of practical training in classroom management offered by teacher training colleges.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Government's criteria for initial teacher training courses set out in the Department's circular 3/84 include a requirement that all courses should provide students with the skills of classroom management. They also require that students have an understanding of society's economic and other foundations. The Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education was set up by the Government to review all courses to ensure that they meet the criteria. Her Majesty's inspectorate has also inspected all initial teacher training institutions and will of course continue to carry out periodic inspections of teacher training provision.

Engineering Qualifications

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many people achieved a recognised engineering qualification at degree or post-degree level in Britain in 1987; and what the comparable figures were for France and West Germany.

Mr. Jackson: The latest readily available information is for 1983 and is given in the table together with qualification rates. Higher education below degree level is included because the assignment of courses between the degree and sub-degree categories tends to vary from country to country.

[1] May include a small number of students from abroad completing programmes in trade, craft and industry.

[2] Some below degree level data estimated.

[3] Includes estimates for professional qualifications at public sector institutions. Excludes private sector institutions.

[4] To aid comparison, the qualification rate used is the percentage of successful completions relative to a derived single year group. The latter is calculated by taking the total populations for the ages providing at least 70 per cent. of the qualifiers and dividing by the number of ages involved. For the United Kingdom this is the population of ages 21 to 24 divided by 4. OECD recommend this procedure.

NERC (Report)

Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has received the annual report of the Natural Environment Research Council for 1987-88; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The annual report of the Natural Environment Research Council for 1987-88 has been submitted to me under the requirements of the Science and Technology Act 1965, and a copy is being laid before the House today.

I was most interested to study the report and, in an eventful year for the council, I was particularly encouraged to note:

(i) the latest advances in knowledge by the British Antarctic Survey concerning the pattern of continental break-up in part of the Antarctic peninsula, formerly a critical margin of Gondwanaland; and of the effects elsewhere of acid deposition in polar ice—the so called "acid flush";

(ii) the launch of the Polar Anglo-American conjugate experiment involving collaborative research with the John Hopkins university in the USA in the processes at work in the earth's space environment from both polar regions simultaneously;

(iii) further research on the increased severity of the ozone hole in 1987; and progress with commissioned studies into the influence of the greenhouse effect of changes in temperature, rainfall, carbon dioxide and ultra-violet radiation on the Earth's eco-systems;

(iv) pioneering work by the British Institutions reflection profiling syndicate on deep crustal studies —particularly including the first recognition, anywhere in the world, of spectacular mantle events; the identification of ancient plate boundaries; and increased knowledge about the deep structure of ancient mountain belts and the evolution of sedimentary basins. I understand that data secured in this way now make the British Isles the world's best known lithosphere (crust and mantle) with structures imaged throughout the 30 km thickness of the crust and a further 50 km down into the upper mantle;

(v) the development by a team at the Institute for Marine Environmental Research of a new method for assessing the relative pollution of communities of bottom-living marine invertebrates.

I congratulate the council on these and other achievements and look forward to further exciting scientific achievement in 1989.

English Language

Dame Jill Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects his proposals for attainment targets and programmes of study in English for pupils aged five to 11 to be published for consultation.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I have now formulated our proposals for attainment targets and programmes of study for English for pupils aged five to 11, in the light of the first report from the national curriculum English working group. We are very grateful to the working group for its prompt and helpful report.

I have today referred our proposals to the National Curriculum Council to start the consultations required by the Education Reform Act in England. My right hon. Friend will be initiating consultations as required by the Act in Wales. I have asked the council to report to me on the outcome of the consultations, with advice and recommendations, by 24 February 1989. I have placed a copy of our proposals and of the working group's report, with my letter to the council, in the Library.

School Meals

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what advice he has received about the benefits to children at school from taking school meals; and what research is being undertaken or is available concerning the medical benefits of school meals.

Mr. Butcher: From time to time my right hon. Friend receives representations about the nutritional and other benefits to children from taking school meals, although these matters are mainly for local authorities to consider. He notes that many authorities have introduced changes to their school meals service in response to medical advice, but does not have a complete list of all current and recent research.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received about increase in school meal charges in Bradford schools.

Mr. Butcher: None.

Secretary of State (Overseas Visits)

Mr. Jack Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list in the Official Report all overseas trips made by him since he became Secretary of State, showing in respect of each trip, their dates, location and purpose, the names of every school visited, and the total cost to the public purse of each trip, including the costs of officials.

EMPLOYMENT

Women Workers

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will initiate a study of schemes that will utilise the skills of the 20 per cent. or so of returning women workers who must accept jobs at a reduced skill level if they wish to work less than full time.

Mr. Nicholls: No. Considerable research has already been carried out, both in this country and abroad, into the growth of part-time work and into initiatives such as job sharing and child care facilities which will increase the availability of employment for women workers. I see no need to add to that body of research at this time.

Through employment training, the Government are making available new and better opportunities for those returning to the labour market to receive good quality training, including a facility for part-time training in certain circumstances.

Mr. Sean Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the latest figures for the Training Commission in the London pay area of the number of vacancies by grade and the proportion this is of the grade complement in London.

(2) what are the monthly statistics between May 1988 and September 1988 showing (a) entrants in each monthly period, and the number of cumulative entrants since the scheme started, (b) a breakdown of entrants which shows how many were male and female, the length of time they had been out of work, their ethnic backgrounds and whether or not they had any disabilities, (c) the number of trainees in each monthly period who entered work placements and the cumulative total of how many are in work places at the latest available date, (d) trainees who left the scheme in each monthly period, and the cumulative number of leavers since the scheme started, (e) for all those trainees who have left the scheme how many found work, failed to attend, went on to another course of training or education, completed the course, left for sickness or went back into unemployment and (f) the total number of currently filled places;

Mr. Cope: I will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the local education authorities in England which participate in compact schemes.

Mr. Cope: The following local education authorities are participating in compact schemes which are supported by the Department of Employment:

Cleveland	Dudley
Leeds	Coventry
Humberside	Shropshire
Kirklees	Walsall

Unfair Dismissal

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) how many unfair dismissal claims were made in the United Kingdom during the year 1 April 1987 to 31 March 1988; and what proportion of these were successful;

(2) how many unfair dismissal claims were made in the west midlands region during the year 1 April 1987 to 31 March 1988; and what proportion of these were successful;

(3) how many unfair dismissal claims were made in the county of Shropshire during the year 1 April 1987 to 31 March 1988; and what proportion of these were successful.

Mr. Nicholls: I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Race Relations

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment to how many employers his Department's race relations employment advisory service has given specific advice and encouragement on the adoption of the recommendations of the Commission for Racial Equality's code of practice; and how the race relations employment advisory service encourages the greater use of the positive action provisions of the Race Relations Act.

Mr. Nicholls: Specific advice and encouragement on the adoption of the recommendations of the Commission for Racial Equality's code of practice forms an integral part of all my Department's race relations employment advisory service's contacts with employers. As I previously indicated in my reply to the hon. and learned Member on Tuesday 1 November, Official Report, column 611, in the year ended 31 March 1988, advisers made 1,082 visits to employers. In the period from 1 April—30 September 1988 a total of 529 visits have been made. The service encourages the greater use of the positive action provisions of the Race Relations Act by discussing and promoting the provisions during all visits to employers, and by including a reference to positive action in all training seminars and encouraging employers to develop a positive action strategy as an integral part of their overall equal opportunities policy.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment for how long the race relations employment advisory service's research project to investigate benefits which accrue from the introduction of ethnic monitoring systems will continue from 1 January 1989; and who will conduct this research project.

Mr. Nicholls: The project will be undertaken by the ethnic minority employment research group of the department of sociology at the University of Leicester and will take 12 months.

Nottingham

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will meet representatives of Nottingham city council to discuss joint action to reduce unemployment and improve job training programmes.

Mr. Nicholls: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has no present plans to meet representatives of Nottingham city council. However, we will continue to give priority to the sound economic policies that have encouraged growth and reduced unemployment in Nottingham and elsewhere. Employment training, the new programme for unemployed adults, was successfully launched on 5 September. It provides many worthwhile training opportunities for unemployed people in Nottingham to help them back into jobs.

Community Programme

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide (a) the gross cost of community programme for the last year, (b) the net costs of community programme for the last year and (c) a breakdown of how the net costs were calculated.

Mr. Nicholls: In 1987-88 the gross cost of the community programme was £1,110 million and the net cost of the programme was estimated to be £508 million. The net costs of the community programme are the gross costs of the programme less the estimated flowbacks in the form of net savings in benefit and net inflows from taxes.

Young People (Nottingham)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people aged 16 and 17 years who left school in Nottingham in the current year have (a) accepted a YTS place (b) got a job and (c) not joined a YTS place or a job and receive no income.

Mr. Cope: Of the 16 and 17-year-olds who left school in Nottingham this year, it is estimated that 6,720 have accepted a YTS place and about 2,370 have got a job. Information on the number who have not gained a YTS place or a job and receive no income is not available. Child benefit is being paid to the parents of those young people who left school this summer and who have applied for a YTS place but have not yet been placed.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many 16 to 17-year-olds have lost benefit following the eight-week period allowed as a result of refusing or not being found places on training schemes (a) in Nottingham as a whole and (b) in the Nottingham, North constituency.

Mr. Cope: I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Employment Training

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many employment training trainees were in training at the latest available date; how many of these had started in project-based places; and how many had started on placements with employers.

Mr. Nicholls: At 4 November 1988 there were 73,000 trainees on employment training all of whom were receiving employment training allowances. Information on the number of trainees starting on project-based training places or on training placements with employers is not available. However, statistics are being collected on the number of trainees in training on project-based places and on placements with employers and the first comprehensive information should be available in January.

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish his Department's operating statistics for each completed month of employment training for each United Kingdom region, specifying (a) the end of month profile for each region, (b) the actual number in training in each region, (c) the number of starts in each month in each region, (d) the number of leavers each month, (e) how many of the trainees are on employment training training allowance and (f) how many are still receiving wages from the community programme.

Mr. Nicholls: I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have started on employment training in inner city areas; how many have left; how many were in training at the latest possible date; how many of those in training were on project-based places; and how many had been placed for training with local employers.

Mr. Nicholls: Figures for the number of people starting and leaving employment training in inner city areas are not available. Comprehensive information about the number in training in inner city areas should be available at the end of January.

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to repay the travel costs of employment training and YTS participants in (a) inner city areas, and (b) rural areas.

Mr. Nicholls: Help towards the travel costs of people participating in employment training and YTS is already available. The present arrangements, which apply throughout Great Britain, reimburse trainees all their travel costs over £5 per week in the case of employment training, and £3 per week for non-employed trainees on YTS.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list those local authorities that are acting as managing agents for employment training and those which have declined to do so.

Mr. Nicholls: I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

YTS

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North on 9 November, he will estimate the cost of establishing the number of YTS applicants without places in each region on a fixed date.

Mr. Cope: Only the local careers services will know the number who have applied for a YTS place at any one time. In order to establish a national figure, each careers office would have to be contacted to gather the information and to ensure that they were counting in the same way and on the same day. Figures would then have to be checked back with the local offices and inquiries followed up. The information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North on 9 November, he will define the steps taken to fulfil the guarantee on YTS places for all 16 and 17-year-olds, in the absence of information about how many of them there are without such places, on any given date.

Mr. Cope: Joint planning takes place at local level between the careers service and the relevant Training Agency area office to estimate the flow of applicants and range of occupational interests, and to provide a corresponding flow of places, with an overprovision of places so as to allow choice. If a local careers office indicates subsequently that more places are needed, the Training Agency area office arranges for such places to be made available.

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will publish a list showing how many YTS places were available in each travel-to-work area; and how many of those places were taken in each month since January until the latest available date.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 14 November 1988]: This information is not available by travel-to-work area. The number of YTS places available and the number of young people in training in each region for each month since January is shown in the table.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list those constituencies in which the number of people out of work and claiming benefit declined by less than 20 per cent. between August 1984 and 1988; and if he will state the percentage reductions and the current levels of unemployment as a percentage and in real terms.

Mr. Lee: The following information is in the Library. The table shows the parliamentary constituencies in Great Britain where the number of unemployed claimants has fallen by less than 20 per cent. between August 1984 and August 1988 together with the number of unemployed claimants in each constituency at the requested dates. The figures are affected by the change in compilation of the count in March 1986 to reduce over-recording.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list (a) the number of alterations to the method of calculating unemployment statistics between August 1984 and August 1988, (b) the net effect of each alteration and (c) the percentage reduction in unemployed claimants attributable to the changes in the method of calculation.

Mr. Lee: There has been only one significant change to the method of calculating the unemployment figures since August 1984. From March 1986 the compilation of the unemployment figures has been delayed by two weeks. This removed mistaken over-recording caused by the late arrival of information about the status of claimants. The estimated effect at the time was an average reduction of 50,000 or −1·5 per cent. in the recorded number of unemployed claimants.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment of the vacancies currently listed at the Oxford jobcentre, what is the breakdown by (a) sector of employment, (b) whether full-time or part-time and (c) remuneration offered.

Mr. Lee: The following is the available information. The table shows the number of unfilled vacancies by industry at Oxford jobcentre on 5 August 1988, the latest available date for this analysis. Of the 1,500 unfilled vacancies on that date, 1,016 were full-time and 484 were part-time. The statistics are not available by level of renumeration offered.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures he intends to use to reduce unemployment in Liverpool.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 14 November 1988]: Last Friday the High Court ruled that the action by Liverpool city council to prevent unemployed people from taking part in employment training was unlawful. I hope that the council will now abandon its attempts to prevent voluntary bodies and employers in Liverpool from helping unemployed people get back into work.

My Department, through its employment service and Training Agency, operates a wide range of employment, enterprise and training measures. During the 12 months to September 1988 unemployment in Liverpool has fallen by almost 13,000, 13·6 per cent. of the September 1987 figure.

Conference Industry

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is his estimated contribution of the conference industry to the economy; what are the numbers employed in the industry; and what is the current level of grant from his Department.

Mr. Lee: The British tourist survey carried out by the British Tourist Authority–English tourist board showed that in 1987 expenditure on business and conference tourism by British residents was £1·7 billion.

The ETB estimates that over £220 million worth of major construction work for the conference market was under way or completed in the period January-June 1988. Since April 1988, almost £2 million has been offered by ETB from the section 4 innovation fund towards the costs of developing conference facilities. No information is available on the total number employed in the conference industry.

Correspondence

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when the letter from Mr. M. Davies of 14, March way, Coventry, CV3 2QY, sent to the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Lee) on 2 August, will be answered.

Mr. Lee: I will write to the hon. Member.

Bridging Allowances

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many persons are in receipt of bridging allowances.

Mr. Cope: I will write to the hon. Member.

Job Vacancies

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish in the Official Report the full findings of the research carried out by IFF into job vacancies mentioned in his February 1988 White Paper on training.

Mr. Fowler: I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Engineering

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if further to his letter of 27 October to the hon. Member for Linlithgow, he will set out the steps being taken on a number of fronts to improve access and to encourage more young women to enter engineering.

Mr. Nicholls: I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Semtex

Mr. McCusker: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many deaths in Northern Ireland during the past year have resulted from the use of Semtex explosive; and what percentage this represents of total Irish Republican Army killings in this period.

Mr. Needham: For the period 28 October 1987 to 28 October 1988, some 51 persons, including suspected terrorists, died in Northern Ireland as a result of the use of explosives. It is not possible to state with accuracy, in every case, which type or types of explosives were used.

Housing Benefit

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many Housing Executive tenants were in receipt of housing benefit at the Executive's offices at Downpatrick, Kilkeel, Newry district 1, Newry district 2, and Banbridge between 1 April 1987 and 31 March 1988.

Mr. Needham: I am advised by the chairman of the Housing Executive that the number of beneficiaries varies from week to week. The relevant figures for 1 April 1987 and 31 March 1988 were:

NIHE District Office	1 April 1988	31 March 1988
Downpatrick	3,267	3,175
Kilkeel	956	930

Social Fund

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland with regard to the social fund, how many people have repaid loans and how many are outstanding to the social security offices in Downpatrick, Ballynahinch, Newcastle, Kilkeel, Newry and Banbridge.

Mr. Needham: The information at 31 October 1988 was:

Social Security Office	Number of Applicants
	Loans repaid	Loans outstanding
Downpatrick	79	302
Ballynahinch	17	53
Newcastle	51	101
Kilkeel	9	48
Newry	60	461
Banbridge	23	197
Total	239	1,162

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the budgetary allocations since 11 April in respect of the social fund for the offices in Downpatrick, Ballynahinch, Newcastle, Kilkeel, Newry and Banbridge.

Mr. Needham: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question by the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) on 3 December 1987, at columns 692-94.

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he intends to review the operation of the social fund; and what proposals he has to encourage people to claim benefit to which they are entitled.

Mr. Needham: The operation of the social fund is being monitored on a continuing basis. Health and social services boards and voluntary interests have been reminded about the availability of payments from the fund and the Department will continue to encourage potential beneficiaries to apply.

Social Fund

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many pensioners made applications to the social fund from 11 April to 31 October at each of the social security offices in Downpatrick, Newcastle, Kilkeel, Ballynahinch, Newry and Banbridge; and how many were (a) approved and (b) rejected.

Mr. Needham: The information can be provided only in relation to applicants aged 60 and over and is as follows:

	Applications	Approved	Rejected
Banbridge	70	49	17
Ballynahinch	21	12	6
Downpatrick	63	40	14
Kilkeel	25	24	—
Newcastle	29	21	7
Newry	115	81	23

The balance of applications in each case were either withdrawn by the claimant or are still to be decided.

Social Security (Review)

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he proposes to undertake a review of the operations of new social security legislation implemented on 11 April.

Mr. Needham: The operation of the reformed schemes is being monitored on a continuing basis, some changes having already been made in the light of experience of the effects of the new legislation.

Agricultural Development Programme

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applications have been made to the agricultural development programme since July; and how many have been approved and how many rejected.

Mr. Viggers: For the period up to 28 October 1988, 3,613 applications for grant have been received. 3,190 of the applications have been acknowledged by the Department which enables applicants to proceed with the work if they so wish. Of these, 585 applications have been formally approved and 29 have been rejected.

EC (Food Aid)

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which organisations are assisting with the distribution of European Community free foods in South Down.

Mr. Viggers: The following organisations which have been designated to operate the European Community free food scheme are assisting with distribution of the food in South Down.

Hillsborough Elim Pentecostal Church
Banbridge Combined Community Organisation Ltd.
Friends of the Elderly, Newry
Rathfriland Traders and Residents Association
Children of Ireland Foundation, Armagh

Milk Quotas

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the relative impact of the milk quota scheme in Northern Ireland on small farmers; if he will carry out a review of the operation of the milk quota; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Viggers: A review of the operation of the milk quota regime was carried out last year. The relative impact of milk quotas on small farmers (for this purpose those with under 200,000 litres of quota) was ameliorated by a small producer award of approximately 11 per cent. of their quota, and for those small producers who successfully applied for additional quota on development grounds an award of 95 per cent. of tribunal determinations as opposed to the 64·7 per cent. award for large producers. The latest available data demonstrate that the profitability of milk production has been maintained by producers whether large or small.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland does not propose to conduct a further review.

Family Credit

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people were in receipt of family credit since 11 April to 30 September in the social security offices in Downpatrick, Ballynahinch, Newcastle, Kilkeel, Newry and Banbridge; and what was the total financial payment during that period.

Mr. Needham: Family credit is administered centrally and information is not available in the precise form requested. However, it is estimated that the number of families getting family credit in each social security office area at 31 October 1988 was:

	Number
Downpatrick	318
Ballynahinch	111
Newcastle	204
Kilkeel	128
Newry	833
Banbridge	266

The estimated total amount of family credit paid in Northern Ireland up to 31 October 1988 is £16·5 million. It is not possible to give a breakdown by individual office area or for the period requested.

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the estimated number of families with children who will be above the entitlement ceilings for 1989-90 family credit, but whose net resources defined as in "Low Income Families" are within (a) 140 per cent. and (b) 200 per cent. of their income support level.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 10 November 1988]: The information is not available.

Private Developers (Bonds)

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will take steps to prevent private developers building outside the areas for which they have provided bonds.

Mr. Needham: Under the terms of article 24 of the Private Streets (NI) Order 1980 it is an offence if a developer starts building work prior to the provision of a bond in respect of the related street works. Enforcement action may be deferred from time to time on the basis of an assurance by the developer that a bond will be obtained. However, where developers fail to provide the necessary bond, prosecution proceedings are taken.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if, where the Department of Environment has allowed housing development to take place without a bond from the developer in respect of street works, it accepts responsibility for making good the necessary street works when a liquidation or bankruptcy occurs.

Mr. Needham: Where housing development has taken place without a bond as required by the Private Streets (N.I.) Order 1980 the owners of the premises fronting the street are responsible for the related street works in accordance with article 36 of the order.

Industrial Growth (South Down)

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what recent discussions he has had on the promotion of industrial growth in South Down.

Mr. Needham: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland is kept informed of progress on industrial development in all parts of Northern Ireland both through regular briefings and by a programme of visits which include discussions with a wide range of individuals. Since April 1987 IDB has promoted almost 600 new jobs in South Down involving total investment of over £20 million. In the same period LEDU promoted 816 new jobs in the Down, Banbridge and Newry and Mourne district council areas.

Telephone Reconnection Charges

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people who reside in Housing Executive property and who have been displaced due to rehabilitation works have had to pay telephone reconnection charges in (a) the south-east region and (b) the southern region in each year from 1984-85 to 1987-88 and from 1 April 1988 to 31 September 1988.

Mr. Needham: This is a matter for the chairman of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive who has advised that the information requested is not available.

Rehabilitated Properties

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to introduce increased payments to tenants who have been displaced from their properties due to rehabilitation work; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: The Department recently approved proposals from the Housing Executive for increased payments from 1 May 1989 to tenants displaced because of rehabilitation works. I understand that the Housing Executive also intends to increase other payments to tenants which do not require the Department's approval, for example, redecoration grants. All the Housing Executive's proposals are subject to the implementation of a revised tenancy agreement and I have asked the chairman to write to the hon. Member with full details of the position.

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received about telephone reconnection charges in Housing Executive rehabilitated properties.

Mr. Needham: One letter from the hon. Gentleman.

Improvement Grants

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will list the reasons for refusal in respect of improvement grants in each year from 1980-81 to 1987-88, and from 1 April 1988 to 30 April 1988 at (a) Lisburn and (b) Newry office;

(2) how many applications for improvement grants have been (a) made and (b) rejected in each year from 1980-81 to 1987-88 and from 1 April 1988 to 30 September 1988 at (a) Lisburn and (b) Newry office.

Mr. Needham: I will write to the hon. Gentleman.

Housing Unfitness Programme

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has for dealing with the housing unfitness programme in each of the housing regions in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: This is a matter for the chairman of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive who has advised me that the executive plans to deal with housing unfitness in Northern Ireland by the implementation of a new house building programme to replace unfit dwellings, a programme of improvements to acquired stock, and through the executive's renovation grants scheme which is designed to assist the improvement and repair of qualifying dwellings in the private sector. The executive's planned activity levels are subject to the availability of public finance and the executive will be consulting each district council through the medium of district plans about the programmes for meeting housing need in its area.

Repair Grants

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the reasons for refusal in respect of repair grant applications made in each year from 1980-81 to 1987-88 and from 1 April 1988 to 30 September 1988 at (a) Lisburn and (b) Newry office.

Mr. Needham: I will write to the hon. Gentleman.

Telephone Charges

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received about the refusal to pay for the installation of telephone and rental charges for the elderly, disabled and infirm in the Southern health and social services board; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: The hon. Member is the only public representative to have raised the matter with me, although several representations have also been made to the chairman of the Southern health and social services board.

I understand that the board has reversed its earlier decision to discontinue the payment of rental charges for existing elderly, disabled and infirm claimants in its area. The board is now considering an alternative proposal that, in the case of all new applicants, financial assistance will be given for installation costs only.

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applications for financial assistance with the installation of telephones and rental charges in (a) the Newry and Mourne unit of management and (b) the Banbridge unit of management (i) were made, (ii) were successful and (iii) were unsuccessful in each financial year from 1980-81 to 1987-88 and from 1 April 1988 to 30 September 1988.

Mr. Needham: The information is not available in the form requested. However, the table shows the number of cases assisted by the Southern health and social services board up to December 1986, the latest date for which information is available.

1980	27	114	141
1981	54	193	247
1982	47	238	285
1983	45	256	301
1984	33	267	300
1985	41	272	313
1986	32	286	318

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will list the reasons for refusing to financially assist the elderly with the installation and rental charges in (a) Newry and Mourne unit of management and (b) Banbridge unit of management.

Mr. Needham: Decisions about individual applications for financial assistance to meet the costs of telephone installation and rental charges for disabled people are matters for the health and social services boards.

Royal Ulster Constabulary

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the inquiry involving Royal Ulster Constabulary officers and allegations concerning immigration matters is complete; how many Royal Ulster Constabulary officers have been disciplined; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart [holding answer 8 November 1988]: I will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list separately for the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the Royal Ulster Constabulary Reserve, the Ulster Defence Regiment and Army, the number of members and ex-members of these forces charged with, and the number convicted of, scheduled offences committed, or allegedly committed, by members of the security forces while using firearms in the current year.

Mr. Ian Stewart [holding answer 1 November 1988]: The information is as follows:

1 January-24 October 1988
Number of charges/convictions of members of security forces where firearms were used

	Charged	Convicted[1]
Regular Army	2	0
Ulster Defence Regiment	6	7
Royal Ulster Constabulary and Royal Ulster Constabulary Reserve	2	0

[1] Convicted but not necessarily charged in 1988.
Note: Of the 10 persons charged during the period two have been convicted, one case has been withdrawn and the rest are still to come to court.

Security Forces

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will publish in the Official Report the names of members of the security forces murdered by terrorists in Northern Ireland since 1974.

Mr. Ian Stewart [holding answer 26 October 1988]: I shall write to my hon. Friend giving the details he requested and will arrange for a copy of the letter to be placed in the Library.

DEFENCE

Nuclear Waste

1. Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received concerning his Department's decision to dump military nuclear waste materials in Plymouth, Devonport.

Mr. Sainsbury: Intermediate level radioactive waste produced as a result of the refitting and supporting of nuclear submarines has been stored at Devonport since 1972. The present proposal is to build a special facility to store the waste until it can be disposed of elsewhere. We have received representations from around 20 local residents and from four hon. Members.

Search and Rescue Services

2. Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the deployment of search and rescue services in Scotland, Wales and the south-west of England.

5. Mr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has now reached a decision on the deployment of military search and rescue services in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller), the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell), my hon. Friends the Members for Torridge and Devon West (Miss Nicholson) and Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) on 14 November 1988.

6. Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many representations he has received on the deployment of search and rescue helicopter services.

Mr. Freeman: During 1988 the Ministry of Defence has received some 2,100 representations on the deployment of search and rescue helicopters.

Royal Ordnance Factories

3. Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects his Department to complete its inquiry into the sale of the Royal Ordnance factories.

Mr. Sainsbury: My Department is conducting no such inquiry. We shall however be co-operating fully in the further examination which we understand the Comptroller and Auditor General is undertaking. How long this will take to complete is a matter for him.

Nuclear Weapons (Transportation)

4. Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what specialist personnel are available for accident response purposes when nuclear weapons are transported by road.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Our contingency plans for responding to accidents involving nuclear weapons in transit cater for the rapid availability of all relevant specialist personnel from the MOD nuclear accident response organisation. While it is not our normal practice to discuss the details of that organisation, I can confirm that those immediately to hand would include personnel for fire fighting, first aid and radiation monitoring, and the provision of appropriate advice to the police and civil emergency services.

Royal Navy

7. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he intends to review the ability of the Royal Navy to meet its commitments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Government are satisfied that the Royal Navy has sufficient resources to meet its current commitments.

Low-flying Aircraft

8. Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent representations he has received regarding the problem of low flying of Royal Air Force jets in rural areas.

Mr. Freeman: During the month of October a total of 352 inquiries and complaints about military low flying were received. It is not possible without disproportionate effort to determine which of these concerned rural areas.

11. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will now commission an independent review of Her Majesty's Government policy on low flying.

Mr. Freeman: No.

Procurement Costs

9. Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his estimate of the annual procurement costs within his Department; and what proportion of this is obtained from (a) Wales and (b) south-west England, respectively.

Mr. Sainsbury: The defence estimate of total procurement expenditure for 1988-89 is £9,139 million. Of the Ministry's procurement expenditure in the United Kingdom on equipment in the financial year 1986-87 (the last year for which regional figures are available), 2 per cent. is estimated to have been spent in Wales and 13 per cent. in the south-west region of England.

These figures are based on the location of final suppliers to the Ministry of Defence. They do not take account of the different location of sub-contractors or of suppliers to the main contractors.

Dispersal

10. Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his estimate of the maximum savings which would arise from moving certain of his Department's establishments away from the south-east.

Mr. Sainsbury: It is not possible to provide any meaningful estimate since much would depend on such basic factors as the choice of provincial location and whether expensive specialist facilities needed to be reprovided at the new site. The Department is, however, conducting the review announced by my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General on 31 March 1988 at column 610-11.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans his Department have for in-flight entertainment on the trooping flights to the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Freeman: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Sean Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will describe the distribution system for perishable foodstuffs for service personnel stationed on the Falklands Islands.

Mr. Freeman: Bulk food items are transported to the Falklands from the United Kingdom by ship each month. Fresh provisions are delivered twice weekly by the RAF trooping flight. A small quantity of salad is bought locally. All foodstuffs are kept in specially constructed secure buildings at Mount Pleasant and distributed to service personnel by specialist catering staff as required. Personnel working in remote locations are resupplied regularly by helicopter.

Mr. Sean Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether there has been any official investigation into the distribution system for perishable foodstuffs for service personnel stationed on the Falklands Islands.

Mr. Freeman: No. However, the means of delivery, storage and distribution of foodstuffs are kept under constant review.

Mr. Sean Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what arrangements exist on the Falklands Islands for the disposal of perishable foodstuffs that are surplus to service requirements.

Mr. Freeman: The quantities of food supplied to the Falkland Islands garrison take account of shelf life, consumption rate and storage facilities and are managed in such a way that there is no surplus. There is a regular and controlled turnover of all food stocks in the Falkland Islands and fresh produce is generally consumed within a few days of arrival in theatre.

National Service

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has as to the number of people in the armed forces and engaged in national service for France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Sweden, Switzerland, the United States of America and the United Kingdom, and as a percentage of each nation's population for 1970, 1979, 1984 and 1988.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I regret that the information is not available in the precise form requested. The number of military personnel in the armed forces of France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the United States of America and the United Kingdom for 1970, 1979, 1984 and 1988 and the percentage which this represents of each nation's total population for the relevant years are shown in the table.

	1970	1979	1984	1988
Armed Forces (Military Personnel only) in Thousands
France	571	578	570	559
Federal Republic of Germany	455	492	488	495
United Kingdom	371	314	326	316
United States of America	3,294	2,033	2,222	2,275

	1970	1979	1984	1988
Total Armed Forces (Military only) as a percentage of the population
France	1·1	1·1	1·0	1·0
Federal Republic of Germany	0·7	0·8	0·8	0·8
United Kingdom	0·7	0·6	0·6	0·6
United States of America	1·6	0·9	0·9	0·9

These figures are based on data compiled by the NATO statistical analysis service. Figures for 1988 are estimates.

We do not have information on the size of the armed forces of Sweden and Switzerland, or on the numbers engaged in national service in France, Germany, Sweden, Switzerland and the United States for these years. There were no national service men in the United Kingdom in the years in question.

RAF Firing Range

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any proposals for extending and expanding the Royal Air Force firing range in the Wash.

Mr. Freeman: No.

Aldermaston

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many times the emergency alarm at Aldermaston has gone off in the last five years; of these, how many were false alarms and how many were emergencies; and what procedures there are for informing and safeguarding the public in the Aldermaston area when the alarm goes off, falsely or otherwise.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the answers given to the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) on 8 November at column 137.

Courts Martial

Mr. Sean Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) officers and (b) other ranks have been convicted by court martial of fraud, theft of service property or misuse of service property in the last 12 months; how many officers convicted of such offences have been discharged from service in the last 12 months; how many other ranks convicted of such offences have been (a) discharged from service or (b) reduced in rank as a result in the last 12 months.

Mr. Freeman: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Guns (Disturbance)

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what information he has as to the arrangements made by other European Community countries to compensate civilians for disturbance by military guns;

(2) what information he has as to the arrangements made in other European Community countries to provide financial assistance for the installation of double glazing and other insulation materials to counteract the effect of disturbance by military guns.

Mr. Freeman: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Ethnic Monitoring

Sir Barney Hayhoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he is now able to publish the results of the first year of the ethnic monitoring survey of applicants and recruits to the armed forces; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: A copy of the provisional results of the first year of ethnic monitoring of formal applicants and recruits to the armed forces, together with a statistical commentary, have today been placed in the House of Commons Library. The main conclusions that can be drawn from the statistical analysis are:

(a) there is a substantial under-representation of the ethnic minorities amongst applicants to join the services. Overall ethnic minorities accounted for 1·6 per cent. of applicants whereas estimates indicate that they form some 5·7 per cent. of the total Great Britain population in the 15-24 age range. The difference can only partly be explained by regional effects;

(b) amongst applicants for entry as service men or women, blacks have a significantly higher application rate than Asians and those from other ethnic minority groups. For officer applicants there is little difference between the ethnic minority groups;

(c) the Army has a significantly higher proportion of ethnic minorities amongst applicants for service men and women entry than the other services. For officer applicants any differences between the services are not significant;

(d) the success rate of ethnic minority applicants is lower than for white applicants. Overall 28·2 per cent. of applicants were successful; the rate for whites was 28·4 per cent. whereas that for the ethnic minorities overall was 19·1 per cent. The difference is statistically significant for service men and women applicants to the Royal Navy/Royal Marines and Army but not for service men and women applicants to the Royal Air Force or for officer applicants;

(e) there is no significant difference in success rates between black and Asian applicants. The success rate for the small number of applicants from other ethnic minority groups is significantly higher and close to that for whites.

The Department is studying these results and considering, in the light of them, what more can be done to attract young people from the ethnic minorities into the armed services, as we shall need to do over the next few years.

Strategic Defence Initiative

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether the recent contract placed by his Department with the physics and space sciences and the University of Kent for research on a light gas gun facility for hyper-velocity impact studies is entirely funded by his Department; and if he will explain the relationship between that contract and the United States strategic defence initiative;

(2) what is (a) the total number of contracts placed with British universities for research in connection with the United States strategic defence initiative, (b) the total value of such contracts and (c) how many universities have signed such contracts.

Mr. Sainsbury: I shall write to the hon. Member.

United States Aircraft

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether the United States military authorities are required to give notification of, or seek permission for, low flying or other exercises by B52 aircraft in the United Kingdom;

(2) how many times United States B52 aircraft have been brought to the United Kingdom in 1988;

(3) if he will list (a) those bases in the United Kingdom at which United States B52 aircraft have landed in 1988, (b) the number of such visits and (c) the average number of aircraft involved.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Aircraft and Helicopters

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the total cost of the replacement of (a) fixed-wing aircraft in every category lost or damaged since 1979 and (b) helicopters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman [holding answer 14 November 1988]: It is now our practice not to publish unit production costs of equipment. For information on the costs of major equipment projects I refer the hon. Member to table 3.2 of volume 2 of the "Statement on Defence Estimates 1988" (Cm. 344-II).

The table provides information on current major equipment projects and covers work approved up to 31 March 1987, adjusted to take account of decisions since taken and other expenditure which is in clear prospect. In order to make the table suitable for publication in its entirety, the in-service dates have in a number of cases been expressed in broad terms and some cost figures have been rounded.

SOCIAL SECURITY

National Insurance Fund

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he will publish in the Official Report tables showing (a) the current holdings of cash, securities and other revenue-generating assets of the national insurance fund in relation to 1978 and 1968, (b) the annual surplus/deficit each year since 1968 as a percentage of aggregate earnings to two places of decimals, (c) the accumulated fund as a percentage of the current year's estimated aggregate earnings and (d) his forecast for 1989.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information is as follows:

Pensioners

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the average percentage increase since 1978-79 in occupational pensions payable to those now aged 75 years; and what was the comparable increase in (a) the state pension and (b) the pension payable to the pensioner retiring in the current year who was on the (i) upper and (ii) lower limit of SERPS on retirement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I regret that the information is not available in the form requested.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been the average percentage increase in rent and rates payable before and after relief by those aged over 75 years, over the past three years and the percentage increase in their state pension; and by how much their rent and rates/poll tax is expected to increase or decrease in the next three years.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Including the November 1984 uprating and the April 1988 uprating the basic state retirement pension rose by 14·9 per cent. The rest of the information requested is not available.

Benefits

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing (a) the increases and reductions since 1973 and May 1979, respectively, in entitlement to universal benefits and allowances paid nationally or by local authorities, including the provision of school meals at less than cost, and (b) the increases in rent and rates for the type of accommodation inhabited by most married manual workers with two children; what is his estimate of the net effect in each case of the changes in terms of the median earnings of an adult male manual worker; and what effect the changes have had on the retail prices index.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The available information is as follows. Table 3.1 of "Abstracts of Statistics for Index of Retail Prices, Average Earnings, Social Security Benefits and Contributions" August 1988, copies of which are in the Library, provides, for various family types at various earnings levels, estimates of net income, after the receipt of benefits and the payment of housing and other costs, at current prices. The period covered is April 1978 to April 1987. Earlier information of a similar kind is not available. For information on the impact of benefits or of housing costs on the retail price index, I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he will publish the latest results of his monitoring of the new social security arrangements to show the latest rate of take-up compared to the rate under the previous arrangements together with his assessment of the number of gainers and losers under the new arrangements and their distribution by size of gain or loss; and if under the new arrangements the beneficiary will be fully compensated for any increase in (a) rates and (b) rates and other charges.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) on 26 October 1988 at columns 207-8. Take-up estimates for the reformed system will not become available until after the 1988 family expenditure survey is completed. I also refer the hon. Member to "Impact of the Reformed Structure of Income-Related Benefits", a copy of which is in the Library. Claimants receiving housing benefit will be fully compensated in future for reasonable increases in rent, providing their income does not change, and compensated for 80 per cent. of any increases in rates.

Benefits

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will give the procedures being undertaken by his Department to monitor the number of claimants of benefits who are receiving transitional protection payments from April 1988; and if he will give for April 1989 (a) the total estimated number of transitional payment recipients, (b) the estimated number in each of his Department's regions, (c) the estimated number for each of his Department's offices and (d) the various transitional payment bands;

(2) if he will estimate the number of claimants of benefits who are receiving transitional protection payments; and if he will give (a) the total estimated number of transitional payment recipients, (b) the estimated number in each of his Department's regions, (c) the estimated number for each of his Department's offices and (d) the various transitional payment bands;

(3) if he will describe the procedures being undertaken by his Department to monitor the number of claimants of benefits currently in receipt of transitional protection who will continue to receive transitional protection payments in April 1989.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Community Care

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what percentage of community care loan applications have been approved at his Department's Hyde and Ashton offices in the current year;

(2) what is the average grant paid to community care applicants at his Department's Hyde and Ashton offices in the current year;

(3) what is the percentage and amount of the grant budget for community care that has been spent at his Department's Hyde and Ashton offices in the current year;

(4) what percentage of community care loan budgets at his Department's Hyde and Ashton offices have been spent in the current year;

(5) what percentage of applications for a community care grant has been approved at his Department's Hyde and Ashton offices in the current year.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Information on numbers of applications for social fund loans and grants received, processed and awarded, listed by local office, including information on budget allocations and expenditure, is in the Library.

Pensions

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the cost to the Revenue in the current financial year of an increase in pensions to the same proportion of earnings as applied in (a) Germany and (b) France.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: It is not possible to make simple comparisons of very different pension schemes. Unlike the United Kingdom, Germany and France do not pay a flat-rate retirement pension which can be expressed as a proportion of national average earnings.

Housing Benefit

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will provide his best available estimate of the percentage of housing benefit likely to be lost by YTS trainees living away from home in their second year of training;

(2) whether he will consider disregarding the increase in allowance for YTS trainees in the second year of training for housing benefit purposes.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: As housing benefit is an income-related benefit, the normal rule is that all income available to the claimant should be taken into account in assessing entitlement. YTS allowances are subject to these rules. We cannot estimate the percentage reductions in housing benefit arising from increases in the allowances because we have no information on the particular rent and rates paid by YTS trainees living away from home.

Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of council tenants have received housing benefit in (a) Glasgow, (b) Manchester, (c) Stockport, (d) Bristol and (e) Barnet, for the years 1985, 1986, and 1987; and what the cost to the Exchequer has been in each case.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Child Benefit

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the number of families in Scotland receiving child benefit in the following annual gross income categories: (a) under £5,000, (b) £5,000 to £10,000, (c) £10,000 to £15,000, (d) £15,000 to £20,000, (e) £20,000 to £25,000, (f) £25,000 to £50,000, and (g) above £50,000.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Estimates for Great Britain as a whole were given in the reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) on 17 June 1988 at columns 371-72. These estimates were based on the family expenditure survey which does not allow separate analyses for Scotland, Wales and particular regions to be prepared on a statistically reliable basis.

Spending and Benefits

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will publish tables, similar to those in his Department's tax/benefit model table, showing net weekly spending power for each of a single wage married couple (a) with two children aged four and six years and (b) with three children aged three, eight and eleven years; earning (i) £60, (ii) £70, (iii) £80, (iv) £90, (v) £100, (vi) £110, (vii) £120, (viii) £130, (ix) £140, (x) £150, (xi) £160 and (xii) £170 under the benefit system as uprated in April 1989;

(2) if he will publish figures, similar to those in his Department's tax/benefit model tables, showing net weekly spending power for a lone mother with two children aged four and six years under the benefit system as uprated in April 1989 and in each of following circumstances (a) not working, after one year on benefits, (b) earning £20 a week from part-time working and (c) working full-time and earning (i) £60, (ii) £70, (iii) £80, (iv) £90, (v) £100, (vi) £110 and (vii) £120 per week;

(3) if he will publish a table showing the levels of gross earnings in April 1989 at which (a) a single householder, (b) a married couple, (c) a married couple with two children aged four and six years and (d) a single parent with one child, aged three years, will lose housing benefit, assuming full take-up of family credit, average rent and rates and other assumptions, as in his reply to the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay) Official Report, 1 December 1987, column 566;

(4) what was the real value of the basic retirement pension for a single person and for a married couple in November 1979 and April 1988, at April 1988 prices.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Family Credit

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Devon, North of 7 November Official Report, column 98, what steps he will take to offer guidance to potential claimants of family credit who may be of average or less than average clerical ability.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Income Support

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the number of claims for income support which will be made in the current year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The latest forecast of claims to income support in 1988-89 is 3·9 million.

Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much full uprating in 1989-90 of the illustrative rates of income support personal allowances, as published in the technical annex of the White Paper on the reform of social security, in line with the retail price index less housing in 1988-89, would cost.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 7 November 1988]: Increasing the illustrative rates of the income support personal allowances, as published in the technical annex of the White Paper, in line with the retail price index less housing, results in rates all of which are less than those already announced for April 1989. If we had adopted that approach there would have been a saving not a cost.

School Meals

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many children are entitled to free school meals in (a) first schools, (b) middle schools and (c) upper schools in Bradford; and if he will show these numbers as a proportion of the total in each case and list the comparable figures for each year since 1983;

(2) what estimate he has made of the numbers of parents in Bradford who have lost their entitlements to free school meals for their children since the social security changes last April.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: This is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science.

Personal Social Services

Ms. Harriet Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what (a) amount and (b) proportion of total public spending on personal social services is accounted for by local authorities for each year since 1967-68 projected to 1990-91 in 1987-88 prices.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: This is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Health.

Christmas Bonus

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioner couples will receive only one £10 bonus this Christmas.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I will write to the hon. Member.

Household Incomes

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will give the percentage rise in real household income for the average broken down by family type between 1979 and 1985 in the manner of his answer to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, South, Official Report, 29 July, columns 819-20;

(2) if he will publish a table showing the rise in real household incomes between 1979 and 1985 for all decile groups broken down by family status in the manner of his answer to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, South, Official Report, 29 July, columns 819-20.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 27 October 1988]: A table providing this information has been put in the Library. It should, however, be noted that the principal objective of the "Households Below Average Income" statistics is to measure improvements in living standards in different parts of the income distribution for the population as a whole. The tables are not designed to measure the living standards of individual family types within each decile of the population. Although compositional figures by family type are included in the main "Households Below Average Income" statistics, the hon. Member is advised that the information on real income increases for individual family types within each decile provided in reply to this question does not provide a meaningful guide to improved living standards.

Benefits (Upratings)

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much of the real increase in social security expenditure since 1979 is due to benefit upratings in excess of price increases; and in which years and for which benefits these occurred.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 7 November 1988]: The Government are pledged to protect pensions and linked long-term benefits against inflation. There is no commitment to uprate benefits by more than the rise in prices, but there are three instances where an uprating in excess of prices continues to affect benefit expenditure:

Benefit	Year of uprating	Amount by which uprating exceeded inflation	Effect on expenditure[1]
Supplementary benefit child scale rates	1980	£2·25/£3·55	£48 million
Mobility allowance	1981	£0·70	£28 million
One parent benefit	1983	£0·25	£11 million

[1] Effect on expenditure in 1988-89.

Increases in social security spending are attributable to a range of factors in addition to upratings, for example, the extension of invalid care allowance to married women (increased expenditure of around £100 million in the current year), the restructuring of the benefit system, and the maturing of the state earnings-related pension scheme. Real growth in incomes is not dependent on social security benefits alone: the control of inflation and the growth of occupational pensions, including the maturing of SERPS, are reflected in the fact that between 1979 and 1986 the total incomes of pensioners rose by 23 per cent. in real terms.

Residential Care Allowance

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if his Department's residential care allowance is to be paid in future using a flexible scale of allowance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 11 November 1988]: Support from social security for people in residential care will be looked at as part of the Government's consideration of the report on community care produced by Sir Roy Griffiths.

Family Statistics

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give figures showing, in 1988 prices, the average income from all sources for a lone parent family, their average disposable income, and their average expenditure per household in 1979 and 1987, or the most recent available date.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 24 October 1988]: The table shows average gross and net income for lone parent families in 1979 and 1986 (the latest available year) expressed at July 1988 prices. Expenditure data in the family expenditure survey relates to households and cannot be apportioned among the income units within a household.

Lone parent families—average income

	£ per week July 1988 prices
	1979	1986
Gross income	109·7	124·4
Net income	99·5	115·7

Notes:

1. Figures derive from the Family Expenditure Survey and are subject to sampling error.
2. Income repriced to July 1988 prices uses the RPI.
3. Gross income is income from all sources before deductions. Net income is gross income minus income tax and national insurance.

Housing Rental Purchase

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if his Department has plans to bring forward any measures with regard to housing rental purchase.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [pursuant to his reply, 25 October 1988, c. 157]: The review of benefit arrangements for help with rental purchase agreements has now been completed. We considered carefully both the current position and the likely impact of possible changes in the light of new housing policies shortly to come into effect. We concluded that payments under these agreements should continue to be eligible for housing benefit.

In individual cases it will remain a matter for local authorities to decide on the level of weekly rent (including rental purchase payments) which should be taken into account in calculating entitlement to housing benefit. In addition, the new assured tenancy provisions contained in the Housing Bill which will enable landlords to charge market rents should make the establishment of rental purchase schemes less attractive. We will, however, continue to monitor developments after these new arrangements are in place.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 140

SESSION 1987–88

7th November–15th November 1988

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc, between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There are, however, the headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one can find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc, under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Mr. Speaker and his deputies are brought together under the heading Speaker's rulings and statements.

Other contributions by Mr. Speaker and his deputies appear under the heading Speaker.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates etc (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R = first reading, 2R = second reading, Money res = money resolution, Com = Committee stage, Rep = Report stage, 3R = third reading, amendt/amendts = amendment/amendments, * = matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of each daily part or volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
